The gentleman from Massachusetts the other day asserted that the Committee on Ways and Means had received no petitions from farmers asking a reduction of the present rate of tariff taxation, but that hundreds and thousands of names of mill operatives had been sent to them asking that no reduction be made. Mr. Chairman, that question or assertion brings out the whole case. It tells us plainly who is demanding that this present rate be continued. The farmers of this country are ill-prepared to furnish petitions to Congress on any subject. They live isolated from each other, and the securing of a thousand names of farmers to a petition would require days of labor at a great sacrifice of time and considerable expense that would necessarily have to be borne by persons unable to make the sacrifice, whereas mill operatives can be reached by the score and by the hundred in a few minutes, or hours at most, without any cost or sacrifice to any one, for the reason that they always live in closely-settled communities and have leisure hours after the day's work is over.

Farmers have no leisure hours, for they must work incessantly from "early morn till dewy eve" each day in the week in order to make sufficient money to buy the scantiest necessaries of life and pay tribute to manufacturing monopolists. It is not the mechanical laborer that is the recipient of this tribute paid by the American farmer, but it is the owners of the factories. The only evidence necessary to prove this true is the fact, patent to all, that the owners of the protected industries have grown enormously rich, while the laborers in these industries find themselves so poorly paid and hard pressed to support themselves and families that strikes have been resorted to in every manufacturing center in the East. American farmers are not and can not be protected, because they produce more of every one of the staple products than can be consumed in America. They must go abroad to find a market for the surplus. That surplus is large enough to fix the price of the whole amount produced. It is sold in foreign markets in direct competition with the much-dreaded "pauper labor" of Europe. But the protectionists say, "Build more factories, bring more people to work in them, and thus create a market for the farmer's produce."

Pray tell me where you will sell the manufactured goods. You must sell the product of the factory or it can not run. Already we have more manufacturing capacity than we have people to consume the product; and when the markets will take no more the mill shuts down, and the operatives are discharged or locked out. But we are told we must find other markets for our manufactured articles besides American markets. Already our reaping-machines, sewing-machines, and many other things are finding sale in other countries, and, strange as it may seem, are being sold to European farmers for less money than to American farmers. European farmers have their capacity for producing increased in the same ratio that the American farmer does; but his profit on his wheat sold at the same price is fully double that of the American farmer, leaving labor out of the question, because he has bought his American manufactured plows, harrows, drills, reapers, mowers, and thrashing-machines for less money than the American farmer, and then he is near the market, while the American must pay railroad freights across the continent and ocean freights to Europe.

Farmers can not strike for higher prices, because constant, unremitting toil is necessary to prepare the land, plant and cultivate and harvest and market their crops. Failing in any one of these means failure in all and consequent suffering and want. Not so with the manufacturer. He can shut off his power, discharge his labor, and let his mill stand still for six months, and when he is ready to resume operations has only to hire the necessary people, turn on the power, and begin where he left off, with everything in working order. If protection has benefited labor why is it that during the last ten years, in which we have had the highest protective tariff ever known to this country, that greater dissatisfaction has manifested itself among all classes of laborers than ever before? Why is that labor has been compelled to organize to protect itself from want and poverty?

Why is it that farmers have grown less prosperous than in the past? I well remember, and I know it is within the memory of every member of this Congress who has lived out of a city, when farmers in every community were money-lenders, and furnished money at reasonable rates to the young men of the country to enable them to embark in business. All of you know that state of things, as a rule, exists no longer, but farmers have become large borrowers of money, giving mortgages on their real estate to secure the loan. They are not less industrious; they are not less frugal; they are not less enterprising than in the past. But, Mr. Chairman, after all their efforts they are forced to see at the end of each year their incomes reduced and their labor less rewarded.

Then away with this deluding cry of protection to American labor. It has been used and is still being used to deceive, hoodwink, and blind labor to the real situation. Protection is only furnished to capital. The product of the factory is protected against the importation of like articles from foreign countries, but the importation of labor is free. No duties are imposed on labor that comes to compete with American labor, but on the contrary bounties in the way of free transportation are paid to foreigners to come to America to swell the army of those who are seeking labor. Notwithstanding the strikes, lockouts, and other evidences of the depression of the labor market, almost every railroad corporation, every State and Territory, has its immigration bureau, filling all the world with highly colored pictures and graphic descriptions of the prosperous condition of labor in America.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of protecting American labor by striking from its hands the unnecessary burdens imposed on it. [Applause.] It is the labor of this country that makes it prosper. Then why make labor's burdens heavy? Why require those upon whose shoulders rest all the burdens of maintaining the Government to contribute unnecessary sums to the Treasury of the country? It has been proven beyond cavil that for every dollar that goes into the Treasury from tariff taxation four dollars go into the coffers of the manufacturer of this country on account of the tariff. No man in this country objects to paying his just proportion toward defraying the necessary expenses of government, but the people do complain at taxation that accumulates a surplus. Nor would the accumulation of a surplus be so objectionable if the channels of commerce were not disturbed, but every dollar locked up in the Treasury is taken from circulation, thus increasing the purchasing power of money and reducing the price of the products of labor.

But the hardest burden of all for labor to bear is the tribute it pays on account of the present tariff laws, which never reaches the Treasury. But take it for granted that the tariff as it now exists does protect the labor employed in manufacturing enterprises, is it right or in any manner defensible to tax one class of laborers to support another class? Does it accord with the spirit of our institutions? Is it carrying out that great principle upon which our system of government must rest, "equal rights and exact justice to all?" Most surely it is not. But the labor engaged in manufacturing industries is not protected, for other reasons than those already stated. Manufacturing has been unnecessarily stimulated until the mills and factories can not be run constantly and the operatives must be idle much of the time.

Trusts, pools, and combines are formed to prevent more goods being manufactured than can be sold at great profits, and the custom-house officials stand at our ports with our tariff schedule in their hands to hinder anybody from interfering with the prices fixed by the combine. So with tariff laws, framed professedly to protect labor, and the legitimate offspring of those laws, to wit, trusts, pools, and combines, the laborer is fleeced while capital is being protected. But, Mr. Chairman, there is a class of persons in this country whose energy, enterprise, muscle, and brain furnish all the sinews of the contest. That class is composed of the American farmers.

The farmers of America are the mainstay of the Government. Their labor furnishes the material out of which comes all the taxes, just or unjust, that are collected. Their labor furnishes the articles of commerce that make it profitable to build railroads and steam-boats, and to build factories and machine shops. It is the toil of the farmer that makes it possible for all the industries of the country to exist and sell their products, protected by a tariff rate of 47 per cent. As I look at the beautiful cities of America and our wonderful transportation facilities, our banking institutions, and, in fact, all of the magnificent evidences of prosperity in our land, I realize the fact that the foundation stone upon which it all rests and makes it at all possible is the brain and brawn of the people who till the soil, blessed by the Giver of all good with bright sunshine and gentle showers.

Strike down the farmer, and ruin to all our interests and enterprises follows. It seems, though, as if every other interest has adopted or is desirous of adopting the sentiment expressed a few years ago by a leading railroad corporation in defining its rule as to rates on wheat and corn from the West to New York, which was "all that the traffic will bear." The farmers are getting their eyes opened to the true situation. They realize that they are being made "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for all mankind. They have borne for long years uncomplainingly all the impositions put on them, and whatever of prosperity has attended them has been in spite of and not by any tariff law. Two reasons have operated to keep them quiet. The first is that farmers have had but little time to spare from arduous labor to organize and keep up their organizations. The second is that, living separated from each other, an exchange of ideas has been limited and infrequent. But at last there seems to have arisen a spirit of determination among them. Pools, trusts, combines, and monopolies have become too common and effective.

In many sections of the country the Farmers' Alliance, the Grange, the Agricultural Wheel, and various other organizations of farmers have organized for mutual protection against the rapid encroachments of the powers that are sapping their life-blood. What are they demanding? They demand a reduction of taxes, economy in the administration of governmental affairs, and that pools, trusts, and monopolistic power be broken up; that the shackles of burdensome taxation be taken off and their earnings be left with them; that useless squandering of the people's lands and money be stopped; believing that all a man's earnings over and above just and economical Government expenditures are his own, and that while laws may be made to take more from them the laws are criminally unjust and burdensome. These demands may now seem as the passing breeze to the country, but I warn you now that they will be heard in tone of thunder in the legislative halls of this country before many more administrations shall come and go.

Farmers are not anarchists. They do not propose by force to remedy these evils, but the political party that fails to heed their demands will not long receive their votes. But in advocacy of protection we are told that farm wages are higher in some sections than others. But these doctrinaires fail to tell you that taxes are higher, rents higher, and therefore living higher than in other places. It has also been shown that in the protected industries wages are higher for the very same work in New York than in Maine. Protection for protection is heralded as the "American idea." It is not an American idea. It is wholly un-American; so much so that it had become a fixed institution in the Old World before this Government was established. Much has been said about the "Cobden Club" and "free trade." I have heard no one advocating free trade.

The Democratic party is not a free-trade party. You can only tell what the principles of a party are by its published declarations in its party platforms and its votes. The Democratic party has announced time and again, in the plainest terms, its adhesion to the idea of tariff taxation, but only for revenue, with such incidental protection as that would afford. That is the principle of the party to-day, as is plainly shown by the bill under consideration. This bill also shows that the Democratic party is opposed to making a reduction of the tariff a purely revenue basis at one blow, but is willing that reduction shall take place gradually, so that the various industries may adjust themselves to the changed schedule. Since this bill has been under consideration about every protected industry in the land has appealed by circulars to the members of this House to vote to exempt that particular industry from the operation of the provisions of the bill, and predicting utter ruin and disaster to the business and the depriving of hundreds of people of work.

Only this morning the National Iron Roofing Association, of Cincinnati, has placed on our desks protests against the placing of tin-plates on the free-list, and I find one of the names signed to that circular to be J. D. TAYLOR, of Cambridge, Ohio, now a member of this House. But that circular is unfortunate in its language, in that it defeats its own argument by acknowledging in the following words that the advocates of tariff reform are correct in asserting that the consumer pays the tax:

> After Mr. Shaw had told us of the cleanliness, economy, and other advantages of hermetically sealed cans, which has never been disputed, he goes on and refers to the burden that falls on his constituency in the annual payment of $171,000 duties on tin-plates made into cans, but gives no tangible reason why it is so. In what manner does this matter burden his people when it costs them nothing?
> Every dollar and more is returned to them by the consumer. There is no special hardships nor vicissitudes caused by this. It is nothing more nor less than the ordinary business expenditure. All shippers require packages. It is a necessary part of their domestic economy. The consideration of packages is not vital to the conduct of a business, and success or failure are not influenced thereby. When and where has the consumer complained of this excess of one-fourth of a cent on the can caused by duties? He is not mentioned, but the canner to whom he returns the duty without objection, laments the "heavy burden."

Some years ago Hon. James A. McKenzie, of Kentucky, secured the passage of a bill taking the duty off quinine. The manufacturers of quinine howled and predicted disaster for the industry and an increase of the price of quinine to the people of America. What is the result? The price is one-sixth what it was then. So that in this case the decrease in price and consequent increase in consumption has created a demand that has vastly multiplied the factories and people employed in its production. Taking this as an example, would it not be the wisest kind of statesmanship to reduce duties, decrease price, thus increasing consumption, thus making greater production necessary, so that the thousands of people who are idle or working only part of the time can find employment?

I have heard no one attempt to defend the surplus. But when complaint is made of the accumulation of a surplus in the Treasury the protectionists say "if you reduce the tariff the increased importations will increase the surplus." Very well; suppose it does bring more money to the Treasury, it will take less to the coffers of the monopolist, and will be a long step in the solution of this question, for that will show that with more of their earnings left in their hands the people will become more prosperous and will purchase more, and consequently require greater production. Excessive taxation brings excessive revenues, and the surplus thus created brings schemes for excessive and extravagant appropriations, as everybody knows. Of the hundreds of extravagant propositions made to this Congress for the useless expenditure of money not one of them but what has been urged on the ground that the Treasury had a large surplus and the Government could afford it.

This excessive taxation and useless locking up of the money of the people in the Treasury and piling up fortunes for the few as against the many is the cause of this persistent demand on the part of the people for a reduction of the revenues. It is in direct opposition to the principles on which our Government was founded to collect more money than is needed for defraying the expenses of the Government. The Republican party boasts that it is the friend of free labor, and points to the abolition of negro slavery. Give that party full credit for striking down that institution by which four millions of colored people were made free, but do not let the shouts raised by them over that fact blind you to the fact that protection has made slaves of twenty millions of laborers in America by requiring them to pay an unjust and unwilling tribute to monopoly.

Let us no longer persist in keeping on our statute-books laws that make unjust discriminations between the people. Let us strike from the hands of labor every single hindrance to its complete success. Let us, indeed, make every man or woman who toils free to enjoy to the fullest extent every cent of their earnings. [Applause.] Let us no longer keep them bound by this unreasonable load of taxation, but follow with willing step the suggestion of that brave-hearted, noble champion of the people's rights, Grover Cleveland, President of the United States, and remove all unnecessary burdens from the shoulders of the people, so that the race for prosperity and happiness may be unimpeded and equal to all.

As the South was wedded to slavery so now is the Republican party wedded to this phantom of protection. The South clung to the one till it went out in blood and sorrow and gloom, but it is gone and the South has risen like a young giant from her desolation. The North yet worships at the shrine of protection, but the handwriting is on the wall and that idea is doomed to pass out of the list of American idols, not as the other did, but peacefully and quietly by the votes of the people. Then with labor free and hands unfettered the North and the South, the East and the West united in one common bond of brotherhood, and all striving for the greatest prosperity, will move on to success beyond the dream of the extremest enthusiasts. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, as I listened a few days ago to the impassioned eloquence of the gentleman from Michigan in his peroration, in which he spoke so tenderly and beautifully of the South, it seemed as if one could see that grand section of the country like a trained racer, with eyes flashing with intelligence and anxiety, muscles well developed and ready for action, conscious of its own power and fleetness, eagerly, nervously waiting to have the clogs and weights removed, the rein slackened, and word given for the real work to begin. Indeed, the South does feel a thrill of possibilities beneath her feet. Strike off the clogs and weights of useless taxation and burdensome tribute that bind the hands and cramp the efforts of her people, and her achievements and success in all that goes to make a people and a country great will challenge the admiration of the world.

Kentucky has been so forcibly and eloquently defended from the aspersions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it seems useless to say more in her praise. My colleague, who has been her honored governor, has shown how that in the great race for prosperity her colors float very near the head of the column, but he fails to call your attention to the fact that, surrounding circumstances considered, no State in this Union has equaled her during the twenty years just passed.

From 1861 to 1865 Kentucky was a camping-ground for hostile armies. Her homes gave up her gallant sons to both armies; her horses and mules, for which she had grown famous, were taken to mount the cavalryman and draw the artillery and wagon trains; her flocks and herds were taken to feed the contending forces; her system of labor was entirely destroyed; her shops were silent; her farms were devastated; her implements of agriculture stood idle, and desolation reigned supreme. During all this time the States that are now paraded here as examples of greatest prosperity were enjoying unprecedented success to all their industries. The supplies needed for army purposes were bought by the Government and paid for at prices that were enormous.

These machine-shops and factories were actively at work day and night turning out supplies and munitions of war. Far removed from the theater of battle, no devastation was wrought, but instead vast fortunes were accumulated and prosperity came to them like magic. So that at the close of the war the States now in advance of Kentucky in general prosperity were already rich and fully equipped for the march of progress. Kentucky, with all her industrial appliances destroyed her fields devastated, her bins and granaries empty, and with bereavement and sorrow in almost every household for loved ones who had laid down their lives in the bloody conflict, stood desolate and sad. Her sons from both armies had returned to begin the battle of life over again, but to all the outlook was gloomy.

Fierce passion commenced to swell in the breasts of many non-combatants, and it looked for awhile as if bitterness, ill-feeling, and feuds were to be the ruling order. Then it was that Kentucky's true chivalry was shown in its best light. A Legislature sitting while war was flagrant had passed an act depriving all Kentuckians who had entered the Confederate army of their rights as citizens. But the governor of the State, who had been a gallant officer in the Federal Army, manifested such a disposition toward reconciliation and peace that at the first session of the Legislature convened after the war closed that law was repealed.

Then the ex-Federal and ex-Confederate joined hands and entered earnestly and manfully on the work of rehabilitating their State and rebuilding their ruined homes. With heads erect and aspirations high, forgetting the past except to profit by the lessons it taught, they began the march to prosperity. How they have succeeded the facts presented by my colleague [Mr. MCCREARY] tell. Kentucky a laggard? Never! Her sons have made the pages of history blaze with glory. Her soldiers have written her name in the highest niches of fame. Her agricultural productions have challenged the admiration of the world. Her cattle have gone to England—the home of their ancestors—and been given the highest awards for superiority of their kind.

From poverty twenty years ago Kentucky is rapidly advancing towards the front of the column of States in general prosperity. But her advance has been hindered and delayed by the fact that, as an agricultural State, she has been compelled during all these years to pay tribute to the manufacturing States and cities of the East. Strike the shackles from her hands, require her to pay only so much as may be her share of the necessary expenses of government, so that the earnings of her people may be left with them for use in business and supplying their needs, and leave them free in deed as they are in name, and she will demonstrate the fact that her past success has not been by the aid of but in spite of the tariff. [Great applause.]

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague be extended for fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that that extension can be granted without interfering, as the Chair is informed, with the arrangements of gentlemen upon the other side who are to follow.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

[Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, resumed and concluded his remarks as above.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 1325) providing for the purchase of additional ground in the city of Indianapolis, Ind., adjoining the post-office site, and for the improvement of the building thereon, and providing $150,000 therefor; and

An act (H. R. 7218) for the erection of a public building in the city of Duluth, State of Minnesota.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LANE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, House bills of the following titles, namely:

A bill (H. R. 1275) for the erection of a public building at Columbus, Ga., and appropriating money therefor;

A bill (H. R. 1645) to limit the hours that letter-carriers in cities shall be employed per day;

A bill (H. R. 2928) granting a pension to William Lemon; and

A bill (H. R. 4358) to increase the limit of cost for the public building in course of erection at Charleston, S. C.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, namely:

A bill (S. 437) for the relief of Claude H. Mastin, surviving partner of the firm of Le Vert & Mastin, of Mobile, Ala.; and

A bill (S. 2039) for the relief of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company.

THE TARIFF.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. GROUT Mr. Chairman, the question involved in this debate is, how shall we deal with the surplus, and how shall taxation be reduced?

The surplus which accumulated in the United States Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, was $55,567,849.54, the receipts having been $371,403,277.66, and the expenditures $315,835,428.12.

The estimated surplus for the fiscal year to end June 30, 1888, is $60,128,214.42, the estimated receipts being $383,000,000, and the estimated expenditures $316,817,185.48.

There is already a large amount of money in the Treasury not required by law to be there, and the Secretary in his last annual report says "that a careful estimate shows that the surplus will be $140,000,000 at the close of the present fiscal year."

None of the national debt will fall due till 1891, when $230,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds will mature. Notwithstanding that none of the debt is now due, the Secretary ought not to have allowed this immense surplus to accumulate and lie idle while business enterprises are languishing for the want of money. He should have used it under the law of March 3, 1881, to purchase and cancel the outstanding bonds of the Government, and thus have stopped interest thereon and at the same time kept the money in the channels of trade. This law is as follows, and is so plain that he who runs may read:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds: Provided, That the bonds so purchased or redeemed shall constitute no part of the sinking fund, but shall be canceled.

Approved March 3, 1881.

Under this law previous administrations have purchased and canceled bonds to the amount of $183,241,750; and it is perfectly clear that every dollar of the present surplus might have been so employed, and that should disaster come to the business of the country, because of the withdrawal of this immense sum of money from the circulation, upon the administration must rest the responsibility, though it seems that, after having been spoken to twice upon the subject by Congress, it has at last entered upon the purchase of bonds. But while it is clear that we need have no surplus at this time, it is also equally clear that the revenues are in excess of our current expenditures and should be reduced.

This is admitted by all. The only question is, how shall the reduction be made, and to what extent?

The average surplus for the last two fiscal years was a little over $60,000,000. But the surplus for the fiscal year to end June 30, 1889, as estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury, will be $56,469,206. This would leave the average for these three years a little less than $60,000,000, and I assume that to be about the sum in excess of the present rate of current expenditure. But here let me say that could I have my way this annual surplus would be less. I would appropriate $10,000,000 annually for the next ten years for the defense of our great seaboard cities, and no longer leave them at the mercy of whatever power may send a gunboat against them. I would also appropriate $10,000,000 annually for the next eight years for the education of the 6,239,958 American citizens who can neither read nor write, but in whose hands is the future of the Republic. I would also increase the appropriations for pensions at least $10,000,000 annually, by passing the dependent-pension bill and taking from the poor-houses of the country the brave but unfortunate defenders of the Union, and by passing, also, the bill for the relief of those who endured the horrors of Southern prisons. And, if not now, at the latest, when a quarter of a century shall have elapsed from the close of the war, a time now near at hand, I would give every Union soldier a service-pension of $8 per month.

These several items would amount to at least $30,000,000, and there would then be an annual surplus of only $30,000,000, which I would obviate by cutting that amount from the internal-revenue taxes.

The tobacco tax for 1887 amounted to $30,108,607.13. Repeal this tax and make the appropriations above specified, every one of which is demanded by the public welfare, and the problem presented by the surplus is solved. Then let the tariff be revised in the interest of American industries and the whole subject is disposed of.

REPUBLICAN POSITION.

Now, while there has been no formal programme agreed upon on the Republican side of the House, it may be fairly claimed that this is the Republican plan for disposing of this great financial and industrial question which now agitates the country. But the Democratic majority do not approve this plan. In the last Congress the Republican Senate put an amendment on the fortifications bill appropriating $6,000,000 for coast defenses, but the Democratic House struck it out. Three times has a Republican Senate passed the Blair educational bill with a view of lifting into intelligent citizenship the illiterates of the country, and twice has it been strangled in a Democratic House; and this third time it lies chloroformed in a Democratic committee, and if reported will never be allowed consideration, for should it come to a vote it would pass. The dependent-pension bill of the last Congress received every Republican vote in both House and Senate, but enough Democrats in the House agreed with the President's veto to defeat it.

The Republicans tried in the last Congress to repeal the tobacco tax, and have introduced bills for that purpose in this, on the ground that a reduction must be made somewhere, and that though the world might be better off without it, as some think of tea and coffee, "the cups that cheer but not inebriate," yet tobacco is a comfort and by habit equally with tea and coffee a necessity, and to no one more than to him who lives by daily toil. But the Democratic majority in the House stand in the way of all these measures, and through their Committee on Ways and Means, composed of eight Democrats to five Republicans, bring in a bill which reduces the duties on imports to the amount of $53,720,447.22, dealing with almost every article of merchandise known in the markets, thereby affecting for the time the value of every one of them, and throwing the business of the country into a state of excitement and alarm on account of threatened evil, only a little less confusing and disastrous than the evil itself.

And this is among the first fruits of the Mills bill. The business of the country to-day stands paralyzed with fear at this proposition to give foreign merchandise brought into our markets an advantage of $54,000,000 annually in round numbers over what it now enjoys; and every mail from every quarter of the country brings to the members of this House remonstrances and protests from almost every industry in the country, from manufacturers and artisans and agriculturists and laborers, against this surrender of our markets, the best in the world, to the half-paid, half-starved labor of Europe. And whether this shall be done is really the question presented by this bill; not that it proposes a complete surrender at this time, but it is the initial step in the work of overthrowing the principle of industrial protection which came in as the national policy with Lincoln's administration, and under which the country has increased in wealth and population as never before, and the substitution therefor of free trade.

Now I do not say this because all but two of the majority of the committee who reported this bill are from the late Confederate States, whose constitution declared for free trade, nor alone because these gentlemen were all ardent adherents and valiant defenders of that constitution and still believe in the superior excellence of free trade as an economic policy, though these are indeed suspicious circumstances, but because the bill itself discloses its hostility to the protective principle from the fact that it takes away $54,000,000 protection annually from American products, when the reduction could be made from revenues which in no way protect American industries, but are an absolute tax upon the American people and upon them alone. I refer, of course, to the internal-revenue taxes. I have already shown that were certain much-needed appropriations made and the tobacco tax repealed no further reduction would be necessary, and before I close I will indicate other methods still for solving the problem before us, and such, too, as shall in no way disturb our industries.

ATTENTION TO THE ISSUE.

But just now, for a moment, I want to hold the attention of the House and the country to the fact that the contest precipitated by this bill is between our present protective system and its insidious foe, free trade, or tariff for revenue only, which is the same thing, for there is no such thing as absolute free trade. All free-trade nations, so called, lay tariff duties on imports, free-trade England raising almost $100,000,000 annually, and free-trade Norway and Sweden each about one-third of their revenues from that source. The distinguishing feature of the free-trade or revenue-tariff policy is to lay duties on foreign goods without any reference whatever to the protection of domestic industries, but solely for revenue, and this, in contradistinction from a protective tariff, which, while it raises revenue, protects domestic products, is called free trade. Hence a tariff for revenue only, a revenue tariff, and free trade are equivalent terms.

Nowhere in the literature of this subject is there a better statement of what is meant by this kind of tariff than that found in Article II, section 8, of the constitution of the late Confederate States. It is as follows:

The Congress shall have power:

To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, for revenue necessary to pay the debts, provide for the common defense, and carry on the government of the Confederate States; but no bounties shall be granted from the treasury, nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid, to promote or foster any branch of industry; and all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the Confederate States.

A revenue tariff has long been a favorite dogma of the Democratic party. It was contended for by that party before the war, when the old Whig party, led by Clay and Webster, stood for protection, and since the war tariff reduction has been the constant cry of that party, who have told us in seductive phrase of the advantage of buying and selling in the markets of the world, and this is the burden of their song to-day.

They have also frequently told us what is meant by a revenue tariff, but nothing can tell us better than this clause in the Confederate constitution. By forbidding the protection of domestic industries it expresses the very sublimation of the doctrine of free trade. Now, if instead of free trade and as the result, two or three great agricultural products, the South had believed in protection and had diversified her industries by the manufacture of iron and woolen and cotton and other goods, so that from her own resources, known to be immense, she could have provided herself with arms and the supplies and munitions of war and at the same time with all the necessaries and comforts of life, who will say what might have been the fortune of the Confederacy, for a braver set of men never shouldered muskets?

Thus provided the blockade would have done them no harm, for they could have lived within themselves.

Who will say that it would have been possible to have conquered and brought into obedience to the laws 11,000,000 of people on their own ground, and as united and determined and capable as they were, had they possessed a full line of manufacturing industries, the legitimate result of protection?

But they believed in a revenue tariff. They despised protection, and thought they had no use for manufactures. And as the result their iron and coal lay undisturbed in the mountains. Their rivers, utilized by no industrial wheel, swept on unvexed to the sea. They believed cotton was king; but when shut in from the rest of the world they soon found that raw cotton left them both naked and hungry, and as the result in a capitulating frame of mind. Like Samson, they were shorn of their strength by the Delilah of free trade, and finally yielded, no more to superior numbers than to a superior economic and industrial system.

EFFECT OF THE PROTECTIVE TARIFF.

At the same time that the Confederate States planted themselves upon this delusive and enfeebling doctrine of free trade the United States raised the banner of protection. Relieved for a time of the bulk of these free-trade advocates the Republican party was left free to do its perfect work, and within thirty days from the inauguration of Abraham Lincoln the Morrill tariff was a law—a high-protective tariff which, with increased protection added from time to time, carried us triumphantly through the war, and, in spite of all its havoc and waste, left us at its close a far richer people than at its beginning. Now, without stopping to ask what might have been the outcome of the rebellion had the United States, instead of building their financial system upon the rock, like the Confederacy, built upon the sand, let us for a moment see what this system has done for the American people. It took the country in the midst of civil war with an empty Treasury, made such by a Democratic revenue tariff, and with the national credit so low that in the last year of Buchanan's administration a 6 per cent. United States bond, sold to meet the current expenses of the Government—think of it; not money enough from the public revenues, and sold to meet the current expenses of the Government—brought only 89¼ cents on the dollar.

This is a fair indication of the financial condition, not only of the Government but of the people as well, especially manufacturers and laborers. I suppose the friends of this bill, like the Pharisees of old, will refuse to "be persuaded though one rose from the dead."

But here is the testimony of such an one, and it ought to be received by them, for he was of their household of faith. James Buchanan in his first message, in 1857, said:

The earth has yielded her fruits abundantly and has bountifully rewarded the toil of the husbandman. Our great staples have commanded high prices, and until within a brief period our manufacturing, mineral, and mechanical occupations have largely partaken of the general prosperity. We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, our country in its monetary interests is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions, and in all the elements of natural wealth, we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want.

Remember, this was among the early results of the free-trade tariff of 1846, under which we are constantly told the country was so prosperous. And it was in this state of affairs, with—the monetary interests of the Government in a deplorable condition, with manufactures suspended, and thousands of useful laborers out of employment and reduced to want—that the era of protection was ushered in.

The stress of circumstances at once placed us under a high protective tariff, and, as if by magic, our industries revived. The young men went down to the field of strife, but the old and the middle-aged relighted the fires of furnace and forge, which had been put out by the tariff of 1846.

Everywhere was heard the sound of hammer and spindle and loom, and labor was no longer "out of employment and reduced to want." Heavy duties on imports sent streams of money into the Treasury, ury, and the cold corpse of our national credit was slowly but surely brought back to life. Thus did the Morrill tariff, supplemented, of course, by internal taxes—but protection was all the while the "head of the corner"—put the country on the high road to prosperity at the same time that it furnished the sinews for a war that grew into enormous proportions. It has since provided thousands of millions of dollars in payment of principal and interest upon the public debt, and has at last brought the national credit to such a pitch of health and vigor that nearly $1,000,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds are to-day worth 125 cents on the dollar and capitalists the world over want them.

Now place right alongside this fact the further fact that those 6 per cent. bonds that sold for 89 cents on the dollar in Buchanan's time were only $7,146,875 in amount, and you have a fair view of the comparative credit of the Government then and now. Then, after fourteen years under a revenue tariff, and now, after twenty-seven years under protection. And which picture fills most with pride the American heart? [Applause.] Nor is this all.

BALANCE OF TRADE.

In 1860 there was a balance of trade of $20,060,062 against us, which took out of the country that amount of gold and silver; for, remember, our foreign exchange is always in coin. In 1880, after twenty years of protection, the balance of trade was $167,683,912 in our favor, thereby bringing that amount of coin from foreign countries into our own. More than anything else the balance of trade indicates the general prosperity of a country. As with an individual so it is with the whole people, with the nation.

It is a very simple proposition. If the American people buy of foreign nations $20,000,000 more than they sell, it is quite plain that at the end of the year they are owing that amount and must part with the money, in this case hard cash, to settle the account. Now, if instead of this they sell to foreign countries $167,000,000 more than they buy, they then not only not have to part with the $20,000,000, but they will receive from outside themselves $167,000,000, and thus will be $187,000,000 better off; will have that amount more of circulation, thereby making money easier, the rate of interest lower, and the whole country richer by that amount. But this only represents the result for a single year; and for a fuller comparative view of the workings of these two systems take the last ten years under the tariff of 1846, from 1850 to 1860, in every one of which but one the balance of trade was against us. The total balance against us for those years was $327,547,695, thereby taking that amount of money out of the circulation of the country.

The reason for this is obvious. Manufacturers, as Buchanan tells us, "were suspended," and as the result we had to buy our textile fabrics and our implements and utensils of iron also abroad, and not sending enough of our agricultural products, the only thing we had to sell, to equal our large purchases we were compelled to send this immense sum in gold to square the account.

Only for one thing this constant drain upon the gold of the country must have been disastrous in the extreme. That one thing was the discovery of gold in California in 1848, early in the era of free trade. From her mines came a supply, between 1850 and 1860, of $526,000,000, and this enabled us to meet this constant demand and avert wide-spread disaster.

Only for this, more serious still, not only to manufacturers but to every American industry, would have been the revenue tariff of 1846.

Now, over against this sum of $327,447,695 of coin which went out of the country in ten years under free trade, let us set the result for the last ten years, from 1876 to 1886. The balance was every year in our favor, and amounted to the grand total of $1,578,996,786.

This is an average of over $150,000,000 annually, and explains in part how the mismanagement of the present administration has allowed $140,000,000 to accumulate in the Treasury and yet work no serious disaster to business. To those who think our currency too restricted, let me say, here is a perfectly legitimate way of inflating it.

Continue to add $150,000,000 annually of foreign coin to our circulating media, as has been done for the last ten years under our protective system, and the present prosperity of the country will be continued also.

Not only is the balance of trade thus immensely in our favor, but the volume has been more than doubled.

From the foregoing it will be seen that the advantage to the United States in the matter of the foreign trade for the last ten years under the present protective system over that for the last ten years under the tariff of 1846 amounts to the immense sum of $1,905,654,491, for to the balance in our favor from 1876 to 1886 should be added the balance against us from 1850 to 1860. This is surely a startling conclusion, but it is inevitable from the figures themselves. Here they are, taken from the statistical abstract of 1886:

Value of merchandise imported into, and exported from, the United States; also annual excess of imports or of exports.—Specific values.

INCREASE OF WEALTH GREATER FROM 1860 TO 1880 THAN DURING OUR WHOLE PREVIOUS EXISTENCE.

This comparative view is truly astonishing, but let us take another from a different standpoint. It has been said that increase of population is one of the surest indications of the general prosperity of a people. It certainly is of a town, city, or State, and why not of a nation? The Tenth Census discloses the remarkable fact that for the twenty years from 1860 to 1880 the increase of population was actually greater than for the thirty years previous. From 1830 to 1860 the gain was 18,547,301. From 1860 to 1880 it was 18,712,462, a difference of 165,161 in favor of the twenty years from 1860 to 1880, and remember this twenty years covers the whole period of the war, and that war always works a serious interruption to population, much beyond the number of deaths occasioned by it. Not only does this period outmatch all others in increase of population, but also in the development of industrial enterprises and the advance of values. Look into the census again and you will find that in 1860 the total value of our manufactures was $1,885,861,676. In 1880 the value was $5,369,579,191, an increase of $3,483,517,515. The census of 1830 does not show the value of manufactures, and in fact but little else besides population; but for the sake of the comparison we will not be limited to thirty years back of 1860, but will take the whole period of our previous history. The value in 1860 represents, of course, the whole gain in manufactures from our earliest colonization to that date; and yet the astonishing fact appears that the gain from 1860 to 1880 was nearly twice as much.

In agriculture the comparison is only a little less striking. In 1860 the estimated value of farms was $6,685,045,607. In 1880 it was $10,197,096,776, the gain in these twenty years being nearly as much as in our whole previous history.

The reason why the gain in farm values is not as great as in manufactures is because in a new country agriculture comes first and manufactures later. About the same gain as in farms is shown also in livestock. Take farm products. In 1860 we produced 173,104,924 bushels of wheat; in 1880, 459,483,137 bushels, a gain of 286,478,213 bushels; much larger than during our whole previous existence. In 1860 we harvested only 838,729,742 bushels of corn. In 1880 it was 1,754,591,676, a gain of 916,862,933; actually greater than during our whole previous existence.

Another fact should appear in this connection, and that is, that under the tariff of 1846, our export of breadstuffs, which it was claimed that tariff would particularly help, declined from $68,701,921, in 1847, to $24,472,310, in 1860; but under protection rose from that low figure to $228,036,835, in 1880.

Further comparative statistics could be given, all telling the same story, but one more must suffice. In 1860 our estimated aggregate national wealth was $16,159,616,063. In 1880 it was $43,642,000,000, a gain in these twenty years of $27,482,393,932, thereby showing that the American people under twenty years of protection made greater development in material wealth and greater acquisition of money and values than was made by them in their whole career previous to that time; and when the census for 1890 shall have been taken it will reveal for the present decade a corresponding development of every element of material greatness, and yet our Democratic tariff-reduction friends are sighing for what they call the "halcyon days" of the Republic, under the revenue tariff, of 1846. How strange it is that some people are never satisfied!

THE AMERICAN SYSTEM THE SECRET OF THIS GREAT PROSPERITY.

Now, who fails to see that under the present protective tariff the country has advanced in material growth as never before, and that every industry and every department of wealth has shared in the general prosperity? But gentlemen tell us that this period of great prosperity is not due to our financial policy, but to the enterprise of our people, to the fertility of our soil, the richness of our mines, and the inventive genius which has been stimulated by our patent laws. But was not the same soil, the same mineral wealth, the same patent laws, and the same sturdy Anglo-Saxon stock here before 1860 as since? The fact is, the inventive genius of the American people has received its chief stimulus from the interest created in manufactures as the result of protection, while the patent laws have only furnished the inventor the same protection in the benefits of his invention that the tariff does the American producer in the benefits of American markets. The invention belongs to the inventor and American markets to the American people, and both the inventor and the American people should be protected in what belongs to them. But still the marvelous thrift of the country in these twenty years and its wonderful financial record, absolutely without parallel in the history of the world, and made more notable still by the fact that during these twenty years at least 4,000,000 of our able-bodied workers were withdrawn for a period of four years from among producers, and not only became consumers of the national wealth, but distroyers of untold millions of property and values in a war the most stupendous and destructive in modern times, must in some way be accounted for.

And when the fact stands out in bold relief that notwithstanding this interruption of the war and the incalculable destruction of property on both sides, yet as an entire people, during the twenty years covering the war and all its losses, we actually made greater progress in every department of material greatness than during all the years of our previous existence, the inquiring mind wants to know the reason for it. We have seen that it is not because of our soil, or mines, or patent laws; but credit something to them if you will. Credit something to the improved means of intercourse on account of railways built; and something, also, to the great change in our Constitution which has made us a nation of freemen with no crouching slave in all the land. I say credit something to all these causes, if you will, but the political economist, the man of affairs will demand something more satisfactory; something that shall take a stronger hold upon the substance of things.

But tell him that during these twenty years in which such wonders were performed, the Government was without interruption under a high protective tariff such as was never known before in the history of the country, a tariff under which every American interest was carefully cared for; one in which American products had the benefit of American markets, thereby stimulating production of every kind, especially manufactures, and that as the result the money paid by our people for manufactured goods was paid to themselves and kept at home. Tell him how these manufactures attracted to them the surplus labor of the world; how they built up towns and cities, thereby creating an active home market for the products of the farm, upon which labor also found profitable employment, and better still, found homes; not a few, but millions.

Tell him, too, that, having supplied ourselves with our own manufactured goods and so not owing for them abroad, we have been able from our surplus productions sold to foreign countries to bring into our own circulation over $150,000,000 annually for the last ten years, thereby furnishing capital for new enterprises and new industries; for the building of railways and other public improvements. Tell him, also, that foreign merchandise, except articles not produced by us and so upon the free-list, has to pay before it can enter our markets about $228,000,000 annually now, formerly more, first for revenue, and then for the protection of our own merchandise against articles of the same kind produced by labor paid one-half as much as American labor receives, and he will see for one thing why the American workingman believes in the protective tariff, under which he is so well fed and clothed and housed; under which he has deposits in the savings-bank, and under which the greasy operative of the afternoon is the gentleman in slippers and wrapper by his own fireside in the evening. In short, tell the political economist that since 1860 the financial system of the Government has been what Henry Clay called the "American system;" one in which the American people have taken care of their own interests, and have let England and the rest of the world take care of theirs; and he will then understand how this policy carried us through the war, and has enabled us since January 1, 1866, to pay $1,452,527,701 of principal and more than $2,000,000,000 of interest on the public debt, thus reducing it more than one-half, while the debt of every other first-class power on the face of the earth is constantly increasing.

He will then understand why we are able to pay $80,000,000 annually in pensions, and for current expenditures about $160,000,000 more. In short, he will see why it is that we have been able to handle successfully these bewildering problems in finance and pay these vast sums of money, and at the same time make such mighty strides in the development of the national resources and in the creation of national wealth. It is simply because for those twenty years the national housekeeping was on the American plan, of protection to every American interest; and first of all that of keeping American markets for American products. Like the old housekeeper up in Vermont, we have not let everybody fry in our fat; and as the result we have had fat enough for American doughnuts all the time. [Applause.]

Who will say in view of this unexampled, this almost incredible prosperity of the country under the present protective system that it is not a good one? Who will say that as a national policy it is not a wise one? And who can be so wild as to desire its overthrow? In answer to these questions here are a few declarations from the other side of the Chamber, which, I think, explain the Democratic views and disclose the Democratic purpose in respect of the tariff.

DEMOCRATIC HOSTILITY TO PROTECTION.

The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], in his speech the other day, said:

> Under the scheme of tariff taxation, however, private property is daily and hourly taken, not for public but for private uses, without any compensation and without any excuse or pretext, except such as excites the derision and contempt of every disinterested, unprejudiced man.
> This plan as it is now and has been for years administered in this country is a monstrous perversion of every just principle of taxation.
> But against the perversion of this power of taxation to the unholy and unhallowed scheme erroneously called "protection" I do complain, and shall endeavor to show its illegality and injustice, and, if I can, some of the hollow pretenses on which it is founded and has been so long maintained.
> In fact, protection is founded on injustice, and unless it produces inequality it fails of its purpose, deceives its friends, and belies its very existence.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] said:

> I follow my party upon this great issue, the issue of the hour; and I have no right, sir, to look to any industry in your district or in my district or in the district of any other man in this country when the great fundamental question before the whole country is, whether or not the systematized plan of robbery and plunder which has been in existence so long shall be kept up against the rights of the whole American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]
> Shall we meet the issue, or shall we keep on plundering the people and pocketing the funds? I say the time is past for the discussion of questions of political economy. The people at large are now taking very little interest in abstract controversies upon free trade and protection. The thing that they demand is that the Government shall stop robbing them, and then they will argue the proposition whether the Government has the right to rob them.
> But, Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the Democracy here to stand true to their colors. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I appeal to them to stand up to the traditions of our party. A tariff for anything else than revenue is outside the traditions and principles of our party and at war with its pledges and history. It is foreign to our platform. We have given to the people the assurances of our intention to do this. Let us prove our faith by our works. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let us engrave upon the imperishable tablets of the law the truth of the doctrine we have proclaimed.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANDES] considers it only a mild assault on protection.

He says:

> A tariff for protection is indeed a piece of finesse to persuade men into slavery. I have been taught that the interests of the few should be subservient to the interests of the many. But a tariff for protection has brought about a condition in which the millions own nothing and the few own millions. Millionaires are in "purple and fine linen," while the millions are in fluttering rags. This is the result of protection.
> The bill under consideration is a mild assault on this system of taxation. It proposes to so modify the law as to reduce the revenue to be raised under it about $54,000,000. If it had no other effect than to relieve the people annually of the burden of paying $54,000,000 unnecessarily into the Treasury, it would be a boon of great value, and every Republican on this floor would join us and pass the bill in an hour.
> Mr. Chairman, I have always been opposed to the protective system.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] said in the Forty-seventh Congress:

The first prejudice to be overcome is that so often answered. It is verbal. It relates to the phrase "free trade." "God save us," said an eminent man, "from the evil spirit and from metaphors!" It is idle to explain that freedom and trade in themselves, together or separately, are not obnoxious to any one. No one champions slavery and isolation. Free-traders have but one object: to be rid of that state of affairs which forbids nations to exchange with each other their various products, untrammeled by hostile and prohibitory tariffs. Free trade would remove hinderances. It would do it, while affording proper support, by custom dues, to the Government. All agree that if free trade were universal it would confer great blessings on mankind. It is therefore worth approximating to it, if we can not reach it. Our trade is only free as to exports; on our imports the exactions are laid, and as a consequence their prices are raised.

If, as I claim, free trade thus considered would achieve the greatest production at the least cost, who ought to complain? France, Germany, Russia, and the United States are the victims of the opposite idea, with what results as to population and wealth in comparison with Great Britain the statistics amply demonstrate. Free trade enables a country to obtain commodities which it can not produce at all, or at a disadvantage. It is the most productive employment of the forces of the world. It would have every country produce that which will bring the greatest quantity of commodities. The amount of our losses by protection is to be measured by the excess of the price at which commodities are produced over that at which they can be imported. This can be proved by bills of lading and the expenses and percentages until the consumer receives the article, through many media, from the producer abroad.

* * * * * * *

In 1880, at Cincinnati, the Democracy reaffirmed all the specifications of 1876. They are for revenue only. Upon this, whether my party fail or not, I stand.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARUTH] said:

Mr. Chairman, if I properly understand the derivation of the word "tariff," its origin is not such as to commend it to the admiration of man. At Tarifa the Moors levied their duty and collected their customs from those whose ships, driven by adverse winds, were forced, in order to escape destruction at sea, to suffer robbery ashore. If, as has been charged, this "bantling" brought forth in secrecy and darkness, which has been carried into this House in the arms of the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means, is of unknown parentage, it can be said in its favor that it can not have so base an origin nor be of so foul an extraction as the robber-born idol which our protectionist friends on the other side of the House hug to their breasts and worship with a devotion like that which the sin-cursed Israelites fell down to and adored, the golden calf their hands had made.

This tariff is a most insidious enemy. It works in silence and under cover; and whilst it pretends to be giving us "protection" it is really stealing our substance and destroying our lives. It is not the highwayman who boldly gallops up on the public road and demands "your money or your life," but the sneak-thief who in an unconscious moment filches your purse, or the burglar who robs you of your possessions in sleep's unconscious hour.

* * * * * * *

I think it does not require a student of political economy to know that a "tariff" is a tax, and when we strip the question of the useless garments of show in which it is clad; when we take off the purple and the fine linen, the silks and the satins; when we strip it of the domino in which it has been masquerading there is seen the horrid features which we have been taught to tolerate only on the ground of necessity, but which we can never be taught to court or adore.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, said:

I repel it, sir; it is not American. It is the reverse of American. That policy is American which clings most closely to the fundamental idea that underlies our institutions and upon which the whole superstructure of our Government is erected, and that idea is freedom—freedom secured by the guaranties of government; freedom to think, to speak, to write; freedom to go where we please, select our own occupations; freedom to labor when we please and where we please; freedom to receive and enjoy all the results of our labor; freedom to sell our products, and freedom to buy the products of others, and freedom to markets for the products of our labor, without which the freedom of labor is restricted and denied. Freedom from restraints in working and marketing the products of our toil, except such as may be necessary in the interest of the Government.

* * * * * * *

We should lay taxes to obtain revenue, but not restrict importation.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MACDONALD] quotes approvingly this expression: "A high tariff is legalized robbery."

Speaker CARLISLE, in the Forty-seventh Congress, said:

If the gentleman means to ask whether I recognize a principle that would impose a duty above the revenue point merely for the purpose of giving what is called protection my answer is in the negative.

If we were called upon now for the first time to declare a principle or inaugurate a policy upon this subject I should not hesitate to announce my adherence to that creed which demands the largest liberty in law; that doctrine which opens the channels of commerce in all parts of the world, and invites the producer and consumer to meet on equal terms in a free market for the exchange of their commodities, for I sincerely believe that all commercial restrictions are in the end injurious to the interests of the people.

Another gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] said, in the same debate:

But I assert that a tariff for revenue is a tax, and I assert that a tariff for protection is pillage and robbery.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] denounced the present protective system as "iniquitous," and the President declares it to be "vicious, inequitable, and illogical." As one reads these unmeasured denunciations of the protective system the question naturally arises, how under such "vicious, inequitable, and illogical" laws could the country have been so prosperous? Surely this prosperity must be a fiction or these men be false prophets. There is, however, nothing new in these utterances. They but voice the traditional opposition of Democracy to the principle of protection, and only too plainly show how soon if left to itself it would go back to the husks of a revenue tariff. "Can the leopard change his spots or the Ethiopian his skin?" Why, in 1856 the National Democratic convention said:

The time has come for the people of these United States to declare themselves in favor of free seas and progressive free trade throughout the world.

In 1876 the platform contained this language:

We demand that all custom-house taxation shall be only for revenue.

In 1880 the platform was "for a tariff for revenue only."

ANGLING FOR THE LABOR VOTE.

Now, this was square Democratic doctrine, but the American people notified the Democracy in these two last elections that it was not their doctrine. And in 1884 they threw this bait to the laboring men of America. They said:

The necessary reduction in taxation can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country.

By this device they caught enough laboring men to put the Democratic party in power. And surely labor had a right to feel that when the reduction of taxation came, it would come in a way not to injure the man of toil. The declaration is plain:

The reduction in taxation can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor.

And here, in passing, take notice that the Democratic party recognize that a difference exists between the wages of American and foreign labor. Hence no tables are necessary to prove it. But what of this pledge? How does this bill redeem it? Can the artisan and laborer be made to understand that a reduction of more than one-fourth the total, present amount of customs duties will in no way affect the price of his labor, when the products of foreign cheap labor can then come into our markets relieved from their present burden by that amount and at once go into competition with the products of his own labor? The inevitable result would be, first, to reduce American labor $54,000,000 annually, for every article of merchandise represents a certain amount of labor. Not only is there "no excellence without labor," but there is no value without labor. Everything which makes us comfortable in life, the food we eat, the clothes we wear, the houses in which we live, and the beds on which we sleep, are all the creation of labor, and their value depends upon the amount of labor necessary to produce them.

Now, remember that the cost of ocean freight is but a trifle, especially on vessels in ballast, and when any of these commodities or any part of them produced by the cheap labor of Europe are put into our markets in competition with the products of American labor, relieved of $54,000,000 duties which they now have to pay, does American labor fail to see that it must be reduced that amount to meet this changed condition? Surely this, or the American manufacturer must shut down altogether and leave labor with no employment. I say this will inevitably be the first result, and it will be immediate; and the second stage will be worse than the first.

Our markets thus thrown open will be glutted with foreign products, and there will no longer be a ready American market for American goods, which, as the only alternative, must go abroad "into the markets of the world," as gentlemen sonorously tell us, and there be sold, of course, at the price of the pauper-made products of Europe; and to meet this situation, there must be a further reduction of American wages, even to the European standard. But this the American laborer would never consent to. Labor disturbances would follow, and manufacturing establishments would be broken up and sold under the hammer, as under the tariff of 1846. We should, in short, find ourselves struggling in the mire of free trade, with a constant stream of gold going out of the country to pay for our purchases of manufactured goods "in the markets of the world."

HOSTILITY OF THE BILL TO AGRICULTURE AND LABOR.

This bill is a direct attack upon the nobility of labor, which the present tariff recognizes and protects. It is a clean departure in favor of free trade, which can never become successful as an American policy except by the degradation of American labor, and not of the wage-earner alone, but of all who win their bread by daily toil, and of none more than of him who toils in the field beneath a burning sun—I mean the hard-working, poorly-paid farmer, who feeds and clothes us all. The advocates of this bill tell us that the farmer is least protected of all under the present law; that he deserves better treatment, and yet, strange enough, the bill takes away a large share of the protection he now has. It puts more than thirty articles, the product of agriculture, on the free-list, beginning with wool. Now, that free wool would occasion a great loss to the farmers of the country does not require proof. It is self-evident. The amount, however, is not generally understood. One writer estimates it at $355,000,000, giving great prominence to depreciation in the value of lands now devoted to sheep husbandry, and adapted to but little else. Here would undoubtedly be a great loss, for the industry would be practically destroyed.

This is shown by the slight reduction in the tariff on wool in 1883, since which the number of sheep has fallen from 50,626,626 in 1884 to 44,759,314 in 1887. There would also be a great loss in the reduced sales of fat sheep. But these items are somewhat uncertain, only in amount, however, for it is certain they would exist in some degree. But there are two items capable of quite close estimation. One is the depreciation in the value of sheep now on hand, which could not be less than 50 cents per head, and would amount to $22,379,657. The other is for decreased price of wool, which at 10 cents per pound on 350,000,000 pounds, the annual product, would amount to $35,000,000.

Now, saying nothing of the other large losses, here is the snug sum of $57,376,657 out of the farmers' pockets at once, and the same amount annually thereafter. But the mischief would not stop here. The number of sheep would be speedily reduced. If the slight tariff reduction of 1883 reduced the number of sheep 6,000,000 in three years and raised the quantity of imported wool from 78,000,000 pounds in 1884 to 114,000,000 pounds in 1887, what would be the result of free wool? The average last year's price was 22 cents per pound. The immediate result, if this bill were law, would be to reduce the price 10 cents, which would leave the farmer but 12 cents per pound; and all for the sake of giving the American people a chance to buy wool in "the markets of the world."

For a time they would get it cheaper, but when the American farmer, discouraged and broken down, ceases to produce wool, how easy for a syndicate to raise the price, even above the present figure. Then we would have dear wool and dear mutton; but the American farmer would have neither to sell. Nor is this all.

Instead of the $77,000,000 now paid American farmers for the annual American wool-clip, that amount would go out of the country every year into the free-traders' paradise, "the markets of the world." Thus do we see how free wool would affect unfavorably the general prosperity of the country, but most of all the American farmer; and what does this bill propose to give him in place of the wool industry and the profit of it? It proposes to give him

FREE SALT

There is now a duty on coarse salt of 8 cents per 100 pounds, or $1.60 per ton. The farmer, if a large one, may use 500 pounds, and here would be a saving of 40 cents. The duty on fine salt, used for dairying purposes, is 12 cents per 100 pounds. One pound of salt is usually added to 16 pounds of butter, so the duty on the salt in one pound is one-sixteenth of a cent. If the farmer makes a ton of butter he will use 125 pounds of salt, on which the duty would be 7$\frac{3}{4}$ cents. So the farmer would save on his salt the princely sum of 47$\frac{1}{2}$ cents annually.

PRESIDENTIAL PHILOSOPHY.

But, say the free-traders, under this bill he will get cheaper clothing; and the President, in his message, solemnly tells the American Congress that the farmer who has a flock of fifty sheep which yield 300 pounds of wool on which the duty, if of the best quality, would be $36—this is the President's sum—when he comes to "clothe himself and family for the winter finds more than this tariff profit, swept away as the result of the tariff scheme."

The total annual consumption of wool in the United States for all purposes does not average quite 7 pounds per capita; and if the duty at 12 cents per pound be added to the price it would make 84 cents for each person; and if to that amount be added as much more per pound as duty on the manufactured article, it would make $1.68 tax for each person. At this rate $36 would furnish on an average of our whole population 20 persons with woolen goods of every description, including blankets and everything, for a full year.

But here is the statement of the President, and it can only be accounted for in this way, that when he made that point he had in his eye a very large family. He must have been thinking of a Mormon family. This is rather more than an average free-trade argument, but I expect will not serve to "pull the wool over the eyes" of the American farmer who reads the papers, and, though not given to much talking will tell you next November what he thinks about free wool and "the markets of the world." [Applause.]

FURTHER HOSTILITY TO THE FARMER.

I wish I had time to show still further in detail the hostility of this bill to the great industry of agriculture. How it not only takes away present protection, but fails to make any provision in cases where increased protection ought to be given. Take barley for instance. Last year there were imported into this country 10,000,000 bushels, which Americans ought themselves to have produced. But this bill does not raise the duty on barley to 20 cents per bushel as it ought. In four days in January last, at the port of New York, 149,000 bushels of potatoes were landed from foreign countries. But this bill instead of raising the duty from 15 to 25 cents per bushel, under the head of vegetables, puts potatoes on the free-list. During the last fiscal year about 1,000,000 bushels of beans and peas and 18,000,000 dozens eggs were imported. On all these articles and many others the duties ought to be increased, and thus give protection to the very best representative of American labor, the farmer.

But instead of this the bill opens our markets to foreign agricultural products, on which as entered from Canada alone $1,800,193 duties were paid last year, thereby compelling the American farmer to compete in his own markets with the products of Canadian labor, which is from one fourth to one-third less than in the United States. And this is the way the Democratic party is taking care of the American farmer! This is the way it is taking care of labor and redeeming its pledge that—

Reduction of taxation can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete with foreign labor.

Some one may want to know how the Democratic party came by this Republican doctrine in its platform of 1884. It was borrowed by it to meet the emergencies of the last campaign; but, being found inconsistent with free-trade philosophy, it has been allowed to fall into "innocuous desuetude." The nobility and dignity of labor always has been and is now the battle-cry of the Republican party.

This side of the House claim that taxation "can and must be reduced" in a way not to affect unfavorably American labor or any other American interest. In the beginning of these remarks I indicated a plan for doing this, and will now outline another, upon the ground that the Democratic party will not consent to the appropriations already spoken of.

WHICH SYSTEM SHALL GO?

First, then, we now have two distinct systems of taxation, two sets of officials, and two distinct sources of revenue. One system is by duties on imports, from which we receive about $228,000,000 annually. The other is by an excise tax on alcoholic and fermented liquors and tobacco, from which we collect about $118,000,000 annually. To collect the internal revenue it takes nearly four thousand persons at a cost of $4,065,148.87 in 1887. About the same number are employed in collecting customs duties and at about the same expense.

Now, the economical business man will at once say, unless impracticable, one or the other of these distinct systems should be abolished and one or the other of these vast armies of officials should be disbanded. The only question is, which shall it be?

Gentlemen give as a reason for reducing present tariff duties that they are a war tax. They are only so in degree, for customs duties have been laid since the foundation of the Government. The First Congress, on July 4, 1789, passed—

An act for laying duties on goods, wares, and merchandise.

The preamble of that act was as follows:

Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported.

Now, in passing, let me ask my free-trade friends to notice that here is a declaration by the fathers in favor of a protective tariff which they now denounce as "pillage and robbery."

Washington approved that bill, and Madison and many others who framed the Constitution were members. This was an act worthy of Independence day. It announced a principle, the principle of protection, which shall be as imperishable in the American system as the Declaration of Independence itself. Thus early was custom-house taxation established, and it has been the settled policy of the Government since. No one pretends, not even the free-trader, that this system can be wholly dispensed with. If, in this day of peace, war taxes should be reduced, as they should, then, first of all, reduction should be made of excise taxes, for they are in every sense war taxes.

THE INTERNAL-REVENUE SYSTEM TEMPORARY.

The creation of the present internal-revenue system was a war measure to meet the extraordinary demands of the Government for money, and was understood at the time to be temporary in character, precisely as was the internal-revenue act passed to meet the emergencies of the war of 1812, and that also of 1792, to meet the unpaid expenses of the Revolutionary war. Neither of these old acts were retained a moment longer than the necessity lasted. So should we now hold to the same policy of treating the present internal-revenue system as temporary, and as rapidly as possible dispense with it, and return to productive employment the four thousand men who now feed at the "public crib," and thus save in the expenses of the Government $1,000,000 annually.

This would be conducting the Government on business principles. But to the question of reduction, we must cut off from present revenues $60,000,000. I have already given some reasons for the repeal of the tobacco tax, and others might be given, the principle of which is that it is a home product and consequently a direct tax upon one of our industries. This is $30,000,000 and would reduce the internal revenue force about one-third, and the expense of it probably over $1,000,000 annually.

But what of the other $30,000,000? The tax on distilled spirits and fermented liquors was $87,509,200 in 1887. If this tax were only about $30,000,000 I would make the reduction here.

THE WHISKY RING.

"What," says some one, "take the tax off from whisky?" "Yes." "And have free whisky?" "No; I would have prohibition." But why take the tax off from whisky? Because it has produced a powerful combination, known as the "whisky ring," which has done and is doing more to debauch public sentiment and corrupt political action than all other causes combined. This ring makes enormous profits out of the business, which are prostituted to the worst of purposes. It has a way of strangling temperance and other wholesome legislation, not only here at the national capital, but in the States where it is most powerful. The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows 969 distilleries in operation, which produced, in 1887, 75,974,376 gallons of whisky. This would be an average of 78,404 gallons to each distillery. It is susceptible of perfect demonstration that at least $1 profit is made on each gallon by the distiller. This would give each one $78,404 net profit on an average—some more and some less. This amount of money makes the "whisky baron" capable of much good or evil. On each gallon of whisky the distiller pays to the Government a tax of 90 cents, but not when it is made nor on the amount then made. It is first put into a bonded warehouse owned by the Government, and kept three years at the expense of the Government, guarded by Government officers; and on every barrel of 40 gallons 7½ gallons are deducted for leakage, whether there is any in fact or not, and on the balance, then ripe and mellow for the market, the tax is paid, but not if in the mean time the whisky is destroyed by fire or other casualty. In that case the tax is wholly remitted. All these privileges have been granted at the dictation of the "whisky ring," which has its sentinels on constant duty here at the Capitol to see that no harm comes to its interests. I would have this tax repealed at the first practicable moment, because I do not believe the American people can afford to remain in copartnership with these 969 "whisky barons" in this nefarious business and divide the profits by taking 90 cents as often as the "barons" take $1. The terms is not the point of my objection; it is the character of the business. I am for its repeal, also, because of its neutralizing effect upon prohibitory laws in prohibition States, by granting in these States licenses; thus giving moral support, in fact legal sanction, to license as against prohibition. This is illustrated by the fact that in the State of Vermont, a prohibition State, the United States has 498 licensed retail dealers in spirituous and fermented liquors, and nine wholesale dealers, and collects from them a revenue of $13,150 annually. The effect of this can not be otherwise than demoralizing upon local prohibitory legislation. For these reasons and others that might be given I can not look with favor upon the whisky tax or any part of it, and can tolerate it only so long as absolutely necessary.

But it is suggested by some that this tax on whisky makes it so expensive that less is drank, and to some extent this may be true. It is also apparent that we can not now spare from our revenues the whole of this $87,000,000, and to cut off the necessary $30,000,000 would neither reduce the expense of the system nor mitigate its evils. When touched at all it should be torn up root and branch, and public opinion should be educated up to this point as against the time when it can be done. The fact, also, that whisky is a luxury, and as such a proper object of taxation, naturally raises the question, whether this reduction can not be made on some of the necessaries of life? And this leads up to the sugar question.

THE SUGAR QUESTION.

In 1887 we imported 2,377,729,920 pounds of sugar and 36,817,636 gallons of molasses, which cost us $74,242,279.20. On this we paid $58,016,686.37 duties.

Here is an instance where it is fair to say that to the consumer the duty is added to the cost of the article, for the reason that there is not sufficient production of sugar in the United States to reduce the price, our product in 1887 having been 269,533,920 pounds of sugar and 21,508,734 gallons of molasses.

If to the cost of this importation the duty be added, it presents the sum of $122,258,965.54, which the people of the United States paid for foreign sugars in 1887. The Government does not need that portion of this sum paid into the Treasury, and, if possible without injury to the sugar industry, the people should be relieved of this heavy tax on a food product.

But worse still for the American people is the fact that we send $74,242,279.20 every year out of the country for sugar when we ought to produce every pound ourselves. The development of this industry has been very slow, although all the time protected by a high duty. But the truth is the plant for the manufacture of sugar from cane or sorghum or beets is very expensive. The American people have paid during the last ten years almost $500,000,000 duties on this necessary article of food; and though sugar is quite cheap, because of greatly increased production in France and Germany, yet they justly complain of this heavy tax. And I declare that it is the only duty through the whole tariff schedule of which the people have any right to complain or of which they do in fact complain. Now what shall be done? Shall the duty be removed and the industry be abandoned? I say no; the industry must not be abandoned. It was said on this floor the other day that sugar voted the Democratic ticket. I am sorry for that, it ought to know better; but must be protected just the same. Louisiana has 3,000,000, acres of land suited to cane growing, but now has only 100,000 under cultivation for that crop. Sugar from sorghum is being profitably produced in New Jersey and Kansas, and there are millions of acres in these States and others adapted to the growth of sorghum.

In California the Alvarado Company has already turned out 6,884,336 pounds of refined sugar from the beet at a fair profit, and other similar enterprises are in contemplation in that State, and only await the action of Congress on the tariff. We seem to be on the very point of rapidly advancing to the production of our own sugar. The prospect is indeed flattering, and such as to inspire courage to try the effect, for a season, of more vigorous protection still. The value of American sugar in 1887 was $16,172,834.20. This is an item not to be despised. Yes, the sugar industry must be protected. The question is, how shall it be done with the least possible burden upon the people? And here may it not be possible to learn something from the history of the sugar industry in France and Germany? The discovery of the process of making sugar from the beet was in the time of Napoleon I. The story is an interesting one, but too long to be given here. Its growth from the first was stimulated by heavy bounties. In 1830 4,000 tons only were made, but under liberal bounties its product was doubled every ten years, reaching 448,300 tons in 1886. The bounty now paid is 2 cents per pound on exports, and imports are prohibited. Along with the production of sugar went also the culture of wheat and the fattening of cattle.

In 1870, when Louis Napoleon visited the fair at Valenciennes, a triumphial arch was erected with this incription:

SUGAR MANUFACTURE.

Napoleon I, who created it.	Napoleon III, who protected it.
Before the manufacture of beet sugar the arrondissement of Valenciennes produced 695,750 bushels of wheat and fattened 700 oxen.	Since the manufacture of beet sugar was introduced the arrondissement of Valenciennes produces 1,157,750 bushels of wheat and fattens 11,500 oxen.

In Germany under similar bounties and the prohibition of imports the product rose from 346,664 tons in 1875 to 997,962 tons in 1886. But, says some one, bounties are un-American, and the practice of granting special protection in this way must not be entered upon. I must admit that I share this prejudice against granting bounties out of the Treasury, and believe that as a rule all necessary protection can be given in the simplest and best way by duties on imports. But there are exceptions to all rules. Indeed, it has been said that the exceptions are the best proof of the rule.

The sugar question is exceptional in many particulars. It is exceptional in the large amount of sugar imported; in the great total of duties paid upon importations; in the great expense of the plant for its manufacture; and in the failure of the present duty to stimulate production; and it is the province of real wisdom to recognize these facts and act accordingly. I would consent to bounties only in exceptional cases and to serve a temporary purpose, and not as a permanent policy.

PLAN OF REDUCTION.

Now then, I would dispose of the sugar question and with it the surplus, by taking $25,000,000 off the duties on sugar, and would pay out of the Treasury a bounty of 2 cents per pound on the production of all domestic sugars in quantities not less than 100 pounds, which would amount to about $5,000,000. This, added to the $25,000,000 taken off would reduce the revenues $30,000,000, and would save to the American people $20,000,000 in the price of sugar.

It would give sugar considerably more protection than it now enjoys, and ought to give the industry a start. This bounty could be paid through the present internal revenue bureau without additional expense, and, if granted, I predict it would so stimulate production that within five years we should produce every pound we consume and have sugar to sell. Then, with the industry once established, this bounty could be withdrawn and suitable protection given by customs duties without the present heavy burden upon the people, for then our importations, if any, would be light. Meanwhile I should hope public opinion would gradually, but surely, crystallize into a demand for the overthrow of the "whisky ring" by the repeal of the whisky tax, and we could then return to the settled peace policy of the Government, by raising revenue from customs duties only; and this is how I would reduce taxation and at the same time protect every American interest.

VERMONT AND KENTUCKY.

And here, just a word before I sit down, in reply to my friend, the gentleman from Kentucky, Governor MCCREARY, who, to show the good standing of his State, compared her to the little State which I have the honor in part to represent. How so large a boy as Kentucky could expect any very great credit by pitching into such a little fellow as Vermont I could not then understand and shall have still to leave to the gentleman from Kentucky to decide for himself. The point he made was that Vermont came a little first into the Union, had been a protection State, and now had but two members on this floor, while Kentucky had eleven. And hence, if Kentucky had been a laggard, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Judge KELLEY, charged, Vermont was another, and a worse one.

To begin with, let me say, as accounting in part for Kentucky's superior numbers in this body, that it will be seen that with less than five times the population of Vermont she has one more than five times the members. This is because Vermont has a large unrepresented remnant, while the remnants of Kentucky are all here. The question raised by the gentleman as to the comparative standing of these two States can not be confined to area and population alone. If that were all, it would be disposed of by saying: Behold! Forty thousand square miles is more than 9,135, and 1,648,690 population is a greater number than 332,268. This in itself would carry but little information. The real question is, according to her area and population, is Kentucky more or less of a State than Vermont? Certain figures from the Tenth Census are full of instruction on this point. They may be found in the subjoined table.

From them it appears, among other things, that with four and one-third times the area of Vermont, Kentucky has only three and one-half times as many acres of farm lands, which are worth only two and eight-tenths times as much. In other words, Vermont farm lands are valued at $33 per acre, while Kentucky farm lands are valued at only $27 per acre. It also appears that Vermont is greater, not relatively, but actually greater in grass than this blue-grass State of Kentucky, for in 1880 she cut five times as many tons of hay, and considering the great fame of the blue-grass lands of Kentucky, this ought to speak fairly well for the hillsides of Vermont.

Not only is Vermont ahead in grass, but she is a long way ahead in the production per acre of corn, wheat, and oats. The average, as shown from the ten years from 1876 to 1886, is as follows:

1880.	Vermont.	Kentucky.
Bushels of wheat per acre	14.8	9.6
Average home price per bushel	$1.10	.72
Average value per acre	$20.91	8.03
Bushels of corn per acre	35.5	26.7
Average home price per bushel	.66	.34
Average value per acre	$21.66	$8.58
Bushels of oats per acre	34.5	20.2
Average home price per bushel	.37	.32
Average value per acre	13.34	6.72

In passing, let us hastily draw one or two conclusions from these figures: Moral No. 1 is that Kentucky and every other free-trade State should profit by this better style of farming in a State where the people believe in protection. That they should develop their resources and create for themselves home markets for the sale of their agricultural products. Moral No. 2 is that Vermont farmers should understand that they are doing better than is done in States the fame of which is far greater; that they have a right to be proud of Vermont, and, to save her from the reproach of a small delegation in Congress, should stick by her and help swell her population.

Mr. McCREARY. Will the gentleman from Vermont allow me——

Mr. GROUT. I can not yield, because my time has almost expired, but will listen to a question.

Mr. McCREARY. I wanted to make a single statement in justice to myself. On the 1st of May I was replying to the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY]——

Mr. GROUT. I can not yield to the gentleman to interject a speech into mine, but will yield for a question.

Mr. McCREARY. Will the gentleman inform me whether you have any public fund for education in Vermont, and whether you have any institution for the deaf and dumb? I assert you have none.

Mr. GROUT. I can not yield, but will say Vermont has a school fund, but needs no institution for the deaf and dumb. Her people all talk and frequently hear more than they want to.

Mr. McCREARY. Or whether you had an insane asylum in Vermont until 1836?

Mr. GROUT. There is no better asylum for the insane any where in the United States than at Brattleboro, Vt. It has patrons from all over the country, and I presume some are there from Kentucky. It would be a good place for free-traders.

Mr. McCREARY. I want to ask the gentleman from Vermont one more question.

Mr. GROUT. Very well; I yield for a single question.

Mr. McCREARY. If the population of Vermont at the beginning of the century was 152,000 and that of Kentucky 158,000, and if now the population of Vermont is 332,000 and that of Kenuckty 1,648,000, do you not concede that those figures show greater progress in Kentucky than Vermont?

Mr. GROUT. It shows, perhaps, that the people are more prolific in Kentucky, though I am hardly willing to admit that. The true ground, aside from area, on which to account for this difference in population is that large numbers of our people go West. We have, in fact, a larger population outside of Vermont than in it, and I have constituents all over the West. Only yesterday I was called on by two gentlemen, one a Vermonter in Illinois, another in Wisconsin, who, though strangers to me, have not lost their interest in Vermont.

Mr. McCREARY. I want to ask the gentleman from Vermont a very short question. It is this: Does not protection reach Kentucky as well as Vermont?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. GROUT. I want only a few minutes more, and will then answer any questions.

Mr. McCREARY. I ask that the gentleman have additional time.

There was no objection.

Mr. McCREARY. Now, if the gentleman will permit me to repeat my question, I ask him if that protection he speaks of, and which he says has done so much for Vermont, does not prevail in Kentucky and all over the United States?

Mr. GROUT. Certainly, only you do not believe in it; do not improve your opportunities. But I am only giving you facts and figures, and on your own ground, too, for you said Vermont had all the time been a protection State, but was behind. All I have to say is that these figures show what a people who believe in protection and practice its economy can do.

Mr. McCREARY. But we believe we have prospered so well with protection that without the robbery which protection brings we would be more prosperous. But I deny that your figures and comparisons are correct.

Mr. GROUT. The figures are taken from the Tenth Census. Those relating to the relative corn, wheat, and oat crop came from the Agricultural Department, and those relating to the late war from the War Department There is no escape from the figures.

Another noticeable thing in the table below is, that though Kentucky has instead of one and one-half times as many, say, almost twice as many, milch cows, yet Vermont actually makes the most butter and cheese—one and a half times as much butter and twenty-seven times as much cheese. In Vermont 115 pounds of butter are made from each cow, in Kentucky 60 pounds. This shows the difference between a people who believe in protection and one that believes in free trade. As explaining this in part, the table shows that Kentucky has one hundred and ninety-five dealers in oleomargarine, while Vermont has none.

Instead of stripping her cows and making butter and cheese, Kentucky eats oleomargarine and grows eloquent over "the markets of the world." [Laughter.]

Not only do Vermont fields wave with grass and grain and the cows give down their milk in that protection State, but the sheep also know their friends, and yield 5¾ pounds per head of wool in Vermont, but only 4 pounds per head in Kentucky, whose statesmen think the place for wool is on the free-list. Thus far Vermont is ahead, but candor compels me to admit that there are three things in which Kentucky takes the lead, namely: illiterates, saloons, and mules and asses. [Laughter.]

Vermont's per cent. of illiterates is 8.68; Kentucky's, 36.79. In Vermont there is one saloon for every 667 population; in Kentucky one for every 445. Vermont has 283 mules and asses; Kentucky, 116,153. [Laughter and applause.]

These figures also show that with one-fifth the population Vermont has more than one-half the capital in manufactures. And yet she is an inland, mountain State, with neither coal nor iron. Give her the one-hundredth part of the coal and iron of Kentucky and she would show what could be done with it. Think of it! Ten thousand square miles in one coal field. A larger area than all Vermont, and 4,000 in another. This ought to make Kentucky mistress of the Southwest. Some one has said that coal is empire, and on this formula, that coal is heat, heat is power, and power is empire. Let but Kentucky set herself about the development of her iron and coal and the creation of home markets for the sale of her agricultural products, and a more than regal crown awaits her in the day of her industrial activity, now near at hand. Indeed, the light is already breaking on her hilltops and she is stirring herself for the morning. She already has three Republican members on this floor who are staunch believers in the doctrine of protection as taught by that great Kentuckian, Henry Clay, and the returns are still coming in. [Applause.] Another thing shown by this table is that the per capita wealth is $270 in Vermont and only $213 in Kentucky.

Thus far do these comparative figures show for Vermont superior results and superior quality, and quality is often a far better test of merit than quantity. These figures, however, only relate to the material side of things.

But attention might be called to other fields, in which Vermont would not suffer in comparison with Kentucky. Take, for instance, the other end of the Capitol, where the little State of Vermont, in the persons of her Senators, is at the head of the two great committees of the Senate. The one, Finance, presided over by the distinguished author of the Morrill tariff, by which his name has become imperishably set in history, and who, full of years and full of honors, can look back through a third of a century of honorable service at this Capitol, the last twenty-seven years of which, under the tariff of his name, presents the very brightest chapter in all our history. The other, the Judiciary, first in importance in that judicial body, presided over by the first lawyer in this great country, whose great ability, great learning, and great good sense easily make him the admitted chief, the noblest Roman of them all. So much for Vermont in the United States Senate. In a scale of one hundred Vermont claims 100 points. How many does Kentucky claim? Here again the test is one of quality, not of quantity.

Mention might also be made of another great Vermont lawyer, whose great name so recently brought him dangerously close to the highest judicial honor in the land. And the only hope of Vermont is that the one selected may bring to that high seat the learning and culture and judicial sense which so distinguishes the gifted Vermonter, whose only fault is that he is a Democrat. But the motto of Vermont is to do even a bad job well, and so she turns out first-class Democrats, and the minister at the court of St. James is first of his class. [Applause.] If not going back too far, I would give the gentleman from Kentucky the name of Ethan Allen, whose statue Vermont has placed in Memorial Hall, and who, with a handful of Vermonters, to the surprise of military men the world over as to how it could have been done, as well as to the garrison, captured from the British, in 1775, Fort Ticonderoga, demanding its surrender in the darkness of night by the light of a burning taper "in the name of the great Jehovah and the Continental Congress."

Here again it was quality and not quantity. I would also give him the name of Stannard, who, with his brigade of Green Mountain boys, in the very nick of time fell upon the flank of Pickett's charging column at Gettysburgh and turned the tide of that great and decisive battle in the late terrible struggle for the preservation of the Union, over the blessings of which all tongues are now eloquent. [Applause.] Let me also here call attention to another fact, namely, that in that bloody contest for the supremacy of the old flag, Vermont laid upon the altar of her country a larger sacrifice than any other State of those killed in action, which is the supreme test of devotion in that supreme moment when battles are lost or won. In other words, the per cent. of her troops killed in action was greater than that of any other State. The per cent. between Vermont and Kentucky is as follows: Vermont had one killed for every thirty-two and two-thirds men in the service; Kentucky had one killed for every fifty-four men in service. But this estimate includes colored troops. If white troops alone are taken Kentucky's per cent. would be one for every thirty-seven, which leaves Vermont four and one-third points ahead. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to pursue this comparison further, and will leave with my friend, the gentleman from Kentucky, who is a good judge of facts and figures, to say whether he thinks Vermont is, after all, very much behind Kentucky. [Applause.]

Mr. SEYMOUR. Mr. Chairman, protection with us is in a large sense a political term. When the colonies organized themselves into a government, the fundamental idea upon which such organization was based was stated to be the protection of life, liberty, and property. When the Constitution was framed the means provided for its maintenance was through the collection of taxes, duties, imposts, and excises to pay the debts and to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, with which was added the clause to regulate commerce with foreign nations. In the practical collection of duties was embraced the principle of so adjusting them as to afford protection to agricultural and manufacturing interests. On January 11, 1790, George Washington, in a speech to Congress, declared that—

> The safety and interests of a free people require that Congress should promote such manufactures as tend to render them independent of others for essential, particularly military, supplies. The advancement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures will not, I trust, need recommendation.

The preamble of the first tariff bill declared that it was for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and encouragement and protection of manufactures. The principle of protection was deduced from the Constitution, approved by the fathers and embraced in the legislation of the First Congress, alternately increased and diminished of its protective character until 1861, when the bill known as the Morrill act was adopted, and became thereafter, with modifications, the fixed policy of the Government. Until the passage of the Morrill bill the tariff legislation of the country was so uncertain in its continuance, and so often the foot-ball of parties, marked by a lack of steadiness essential to the establishment and development of great industries, that capital, timid and cautious, would not largely hazard in uncertain profits its own loss.

The Morrill bill was the result of the nation's judgment and necessities released from the opposition of the representatives of those who, living under a system of forced labor, were not interested in the protection of free labor. In the Southern section cotton was king; not cotton manufactured, not cotton using skilled labor to make it into articles of apparel and use, but cotton unmanufactured, requiring only the crudest, most unskilled, and uneducated labor to place it in the market where skilled, educated, and free labor should weave and work it. The climatic condition of the South was favorable to the cultivation and growth of cotton, and with forced labor prevented by law from education, with a market demanding its entire production, with its own supply limited by the simple increase of its forced laborers, it needed none if any protection, and was restive under the restraint of a protective policy which the interest of free labor was continually demanding of representatives in the American Congress. Subsequently given a fair experiment through the exigencies of war, nursed by a growing favorable sentiment and practical results, the protective system succeeding a depleted Treasury, and kept in operation through phenomenal governmental expenditures until an extraordinary credit, based upon growth and prosperity, had funded at low interest our unpaid debt, so that when the party inaugurating the system had transferred the Government to its successor, one of the first questions presenting itself to the incoming administration as propounded by it was, what shall we do with the surplus?

True to the instincts of an earlier policy, the leader of the party and Executive of the nation proposed to impair by repeal and unnecessary reduction the very system which caused the surplus. Other methods were suggested, other means could be employed to reduce the revenue within the limits of governmental expenditure without destroying the principle through which prosperity had come. Whatever inequality existed might be corrected without impairing its vitality and a sufficient reduction effected by removing burdens of taxation which are individually burdensome and universally borne as measures almost entirely of revenue. The misleading statement that a duty is a tax under all circumstances and conditions is the sophistry by which revenue reform through tariff reduction and repeal is sought to be effected. The customs duty is a barrier against the introduction and sale of foreign merchandise or products within the limits of the territory where the duty is operative. The foreign manufacturer or producer is thus compelled to add the amount of duty to the cost, including his profits, in order to sell his merchandise or products within the protected territory.

The home manufacturer or producer adds to the cost of manufacture or production his profit, and through this addition fixes his price. If the price of the foreign seller is below that of the home seller, then the latter must reduce or omit a profit in order to compete with the former. Naturally if the home seller by a small profit can drive the foreign seller from the market he will pursue this course, and by larger sales equal or increase the sum of his profit. By large sales and increased production the manufacturer or producer will decrease the cost of making or producing, and so it comes to pass that invention enters as a factor, constructs improved machinery, business becomes divided by competition and increased production within the home market, so that cost and price fall below the lowest amount which the article or product could be purchased in the outside market when the duty was laid. The best improved machinery constructed by the foreign and home manufacturer comes to be used by both, and the outside and inside price of each is decreased and oftentimes equalized irrespective of duty.

The duty acts as a barrier in times of depression, preventing the home market from being glutted with auction or bankrupt goods. It thus serves to steady prices and prevents foreign syndicates or trusts from depressing prices below the cost of manufacturing or production in any country, and through such depression in the home market ruin home manufactures, with the expectation of occupying or controlling such market in the future at increased prices. Syndicates and trusts may and do operate as well in a free-trade country as in a protected one. They are not of American origin. They are as old as the history of trade and commerce, and though existing by different names or in different forms, the effect of control, increase of price, or agrandizement is the same. It is a system of profiting without labor, excepting so much as is needed to operate on the necessities, hopes or fears of men; it bore its fruit under the feudal system; it lives beneath the favor of absolutism. Its aggregated wealth seeks out and fattens upon the needs of communities or individuals. It can divine and anticipate a famine or a panic with the keen scent of an expert. Familiar with statistics, it corners a short supply and anticipates an active demand by making the supply shorter. In a country exporting annually over a hundred million bushels of wheat it purchases the surplus and works the hog product in the market for all it is worth. Organizations and unions seek to control capital and labor in free-trade as well as protection countries. Larger profits and less or little capital, less hours and greater pay is the watchword of all in free-trade as well as in protection states. Each taking its own risk, making its own profit, or suffering its own loss, ultimately, through the leveling process of experience, arrive at the common-sense principle of fair equivalents. Behind the ægis of protection small interests are built up, until demand makes them large, cheapening cost until active and threatened ruinous competition makes them combine for mutual protection, and, as they suppose, to ward off destruction or bankruptcy. Such combinations generally prove of short duration, and self-preservation compels each to enter again the arena of competition.

Americans are too earnest and enterprising to remain idle unless absolute disaster threatens. Such production, stimulated and increased by a protective tariff, is a net gain to the nation, and is expressed in the formula: "That the whole price of any article is ultimately resolvable into rent, profit, or wages. Rent, profit, and wages are national net income, and create markets where they are spent;" or, more tersely stated, "the gross value of every product of industry is national net income." When the aggregated or national income is increased by production individual wealth is greater, individual needs are multiplied, and the demand for labor increased. When all these are active and in just proportion, labor is well cared for and paid; for prosperity has come, and in this condition of things the divine precept applicable to labor is complied with: "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn." Were I to give an example of an article cheapened under protection and increased manufacture, I should cite steel rails, the yearly average of the price of which was $158.50 in 1868 per gross ton in this country, and in 1884 was $30.75, and during the month of April, 1885, was $26, and were selling in England in December last at $22 to $23 per ton. The price here is $31 to $32, while the duty is $17 per ton, showing that the difference of price in the two countries is not the difference of duty. It results from the higher price of labor, which begins in the mining of the ore and continues until it ceases with the production of steel rails.

The production of steel rails in Great Britain in 1887 was 1,021,847 tons, and in the United States was 2,101,904 tons. The excess of production of over 1,000,000 tons in the United States over that of Great Britain in a single year would be impossible except under the system of protection. Greater improvements in manufacture, lower internal freights, larger demand, and cheaper labor must be had before the price can be equalized in the two countries. The reduction in price has continued under the Morrill tariff and its modifications till in exceptional cases steel rails have been sold for $26 per ton as stated, which is less than the duty of $28 per ton imposed in 1860.

The affairs of the Jackson Mining Company of Michigan, which are said to have been disclosed through suit, have been instanced in this debate as showing the enormous profits of the iron trade. The business of this company embraced the mining of ore and the smelting of this material in two furnaces. The Jackson Iron Mountain was the site of the first discovery of iron in the upper peninsula of Michigan; easy of development and rich in product, the mine was one of those which, surviving failure, remunerated its subsequent owners.

Exceptional cases of profit do not establish the average rule of gain. The Calumet and Hecla, said to be the largest and richest mine in this country or the world, stands phenomenal amidst deserted claims, abandoned villages, and the waste of fortunes seeking similar profits in the mining of copper. Such examples have lured, in many cases, the investment of capital only to end in bankruptcy. In regard to that entire region, in testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, in 1886, in reply to a question by Mr. Hewitt, "But has not the mining of Lake Superior ore as a whole been profitable to the owners?" Mr. Ely, of Cleveland, replied, "No, sir; not as a whole. I think that more money has been sunk in Lake Superior mines than ever came out of them. I have put more money into that region than I ever got out."

Mr. McMILLIN. I want to ask the gentleman whether it is not true that copper all over the world is controlled by a trust.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The same as whisky.

Mr. McMILLIN. Worse than whisky.

Mr. SEYMOUR. I have not time to yield for interruptions.

Lumber in the Mills bill has been placed on the free-list. Would such action be fair to the people of Washington and Oregon and the Territories of the Pacific Slope, if it is true, as the advocates of free-trade affirm, that lumber would be cheaper by the removal of the duty, to open these markets to the supply of Canadian lumber when the competition between our citizens living amidst vast forests will afford only a reasonable compensation to the labor and capital employed? I do not believe if the duty were removed the price of lumber to the producer in our Eastern and Middle States would be reduced, but the amount which is now paid to the Government as a duty would inure to the benefit of Canadian sellers, inducing the advance of Canadian stumpage and increasing the amount of Canadian business.

Take the article of salt, which is sold in Saginaw at 60 cents for 280 pounds, including the barrel, which is worth 20 cents, leaving 40 cents for the salt. If the President is correct when he says the duty is a tax, or, to use his own words, those who buy domestic articles of the same class pay a sum at least approximately equal to this duty to our home manufacturers, then if the duty is deducted, being at the rate of 12 cents per 100 pounds, over 33⅓ cents, the salt could be produced for 6⅔ cents for 280 pounds. Who would believe that so low a measure of cost could be obtained, but will not rather wonder that salt can now be produced at that price with the duty added, that is, for 40 cents? Let us examine further. The census of 1870 shows the production of 17,606,105 bushels of salt, valued at $4,818,229, while the census of 1880 fixes the production at 29,800,298 bushels, with a less total value, but of the amount of $4,817,630. If such results as these happen, why is it necessary to put salt on the free-list, opening our market to the foreign product, tending to produce unsteadiness in value, with no certainty of producing any result but uncertainty? The price is now sufficiently low, if not below the price of remunerative wages and fair dealing. Prosperity comes through fair wages and reasonable profit on invested capital.

Statistics show that the amount of our manufactured products are increasing, while prices are decreasing. The aggregate value of manufactures produced in 1860 was $1,885,861,676, while in 1880 it was $5,369,579,191. Our customs duties indicating annual variations through different conditions of business and modifications of the tariff yet show, in 1870, a revenue of $194,538,374, and in 1886 $192,905,023, with an average revenue between and including the years named of $174,243,104. This statement indicates as much steadiness in revenue without an excessive average as could be expected from changing conditions of business, increasing population, and occasional modifications of tariff during a period of seventeen years. The ostensible reason given for the attack now made upon our protective system is because, as is stated, we are confronted with a condition, not a theory, "and the necessity stated that"— the simple and plain duty which we owe the people is to reduce taxation to the necessary expenses of an economical operation of the Government, and to restore to the business of the country the money which we hold in the Treasury through the perversion of governmental powers.

The condition referred to is the surplus, and the duty the reduction of taxation to prevent an accruing surplus. Exactly what the "perversion of governmental powers" may mean may be strongly inferred, if not absolutely declared, by the labored argument on the theory and against the protective system, instancing wool and not sugar, and at the same time advising the retention of internal-revenue taxes, which have always been levied as extraordinary or war taxes, and have hitherto been repealed when the occasion for their imposition ceased.

A reduction of these internal-revenue taxes, if not their repeal, would reduce the accumulating surplus, and such action so far as may be necessary would be in accord with the previous policy of the Government, and would leave the question of internal taxation to be adjusted, if desired, by the States.

The repeal of the duty on sugar, which amounts to over $56,000,000, while, if a reasonable bounty were paid on that produced in this country, a saving would occur of over $50,000,000, and, as it is almost entirely a revenue tax, the total repeal of the duty on this article would go very far towards reducing the surplus. Sugar is consumed by every citizen, and the repeal of the duty would be felt by every individual. It might happen that foreign governments would impose an export tax equal to the duty repealed; if this should be done by Congress, and in that case our Government would lose the duty, as in the case of coffee, and the citizen would still pay it. The way is open to reduce the revenues of the Government to the limit of governmental expenditures without impairing the protective system. Whatever irregularities and inequalities may exist in the law should be corrected, but the prohibition by the Ways and Means Committee of any hearing of citizens interested and affected by the changes which the bill proposes, in contravention to the wishes of the minority, would seem to indicate the disposition of the majority of the committee to revise and amend our present tariff laws, the so-called "vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation," in accordance with a "theory."

These latter are strong words and attack a condition, not a theory, charged with a surplus. Would not that condition under lower duties receive greater revenue, and would not less revenue be derived through this bill only by acting on the theory of enlarging the free-list? The reduced duties of the bill will increase the surplus; the free-list or absolute free-trade portion of it will alone decrease the revenue. If this revision should pass it will be in order to inquire how many more of a similar kind will be necessary in order to reach absolute free trade. English sentiment through the English press answered when the London Times said:

This operation may not establish free trade in the strict sense of the term, but it will to a great extent make trade free.

The issue is thus declared joined by foreign public opinion, which desires the destruction of the protective system. Listen to the warning of Blanqui, one of the free-trade economists of France:

Experience has already taught us that a people ought never to deliver over to the chances of foreign trade the fate of its manufactures.

Said Alexander Hamilton—

Though it were true that the immediate and certain effect of regulations controlling the competition of foreign with domestic fabrics was an increase of price, it is universally true that the contrary is the ultimate effect of any successful manufacture. When a domestic manufacture has attained to perfection, and has engaged in the prosecution of it a sufficient number of persons, it invariably becomes cheaper, and accordingly seldom or never fails to be afforded cheaper in process of time than was the foreign article for which it is the substitute.

The experience of the nation during the past twenty-seven years proves the truth of the proposition—greater production and cheaper product.

The nation, largely through the efforts of American labor, repudiating the principle that you should buy or procure where you can buy or procure the cheapest, prohibited the introduction of cheap Chinese labor as destructive to the interests of our industrial classes and antagonistic to the genius of our civilization. The Chinese must go; "cheap labor is not our shilboleth or belief" was the sentiment which chrystallized into a statute, and has become a settled principle in our laws. Humanity has heart and soul in its movements, and the decree went forth that the cold and unfeeling rule of trade, buy labor or goods where you can buy the cheapest, should be moderated by that more humane and Christian rule, "live and let live." Wealth under any conditions of government will not come to all, but comfortable living should be within the reach of each and the reward of reasonable and continued toil.

To promote the general welfare was not an idle or unmeaning phrase in a Constitution so short, concise, and expressive as ours. Through the beneficent workings of that Constitution and the laws made in pursuance of its powers and interpretations our land has become the home of the free and the asylum of the oppressed. It has drawn to its protection all who were willing to be molded by its civilization and assimilated by its citizenship. The Irishman from his bog, the Scottish crofter from his native heather, the English toiler of the same kith and kin of London's vast body of unemployed who but lately advertised their idleness and suffering in Trafalgar Square, have bid adieu to the shadow of the blessings of free-trade England to partake of the substance of American protection, and joined the grand procession which has since 1880, at the rate of half a million of people annually, sought homes within our limits. The term "vicious" can not justly be applied to a system which labor so largely seeks and men in such numbers come to for betterment. Labor believes in the Scripture adage, "By their fruits ye shall know them," and continually comes.

The immediate cause for thrusting the question of the reduction of the tariff so pointedly and strongly upon the attention of Congress to the exclusion of other business was stated to be the necessity for the reduction of the surplus. This condition arose from a policy inaugurated by the party which championed the Morrill bill in 1861. During the years which intervened the triumph of American arms, the success of American financial policy, the increase of American population, the growth of American wealth, the rapid development of American manufactures have been the wonder and astonishment of the world. The deference with which Europeans treat Americans abroad is the highest acknowledgment of their respect and fear. It is the tribute of the oppressed and oppressors of Europe to the integrity and ability of the American people, and the genius and glory of American institutions.

Patrick Henry said:

I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided, and that is the lamp of experience. I know of no way of judging of the future but by the past.

Scrutinized by that light, judged by that standard, the American Government, in all that gives strength, and tone, and character to national life, during the past twenty-seven years of its protective policy stands unrivaled and unexcelled in any other portion of its own or the world's history. Inflexible in the maintenance of its laws, lenient to the disturbers of its peace, just to its creditors, bountiful to its defenders, progressive in the direction and breadth of its policy, protective in the spirit of its internal regulations for the development of its immense national resources, it towers above the nations of the past in the nobility of its aspirations and the grandeur of its achievements.

Cutting out the canker which was gnawing at the vitals of the body-politic, obliterating the element of weakness and decay from its Constitution, the nation whose courage and intelligent action had grappled with the disease and compelled a remedy is now met with the attempt to reverse the policy through which triumph and prosperity came, under the guise of a condition, what shall we do with the surplus? If the solution was sought on the principle of revenue reduction alone it might ere this have been settled by an overwhelming majority in this House. If the method of its solution had not been prescribed in the message which presented the question an agreement of counsel and action might have been more easily secured. But the way was indicated, the course of action was pre-determined.

"The perversion of governmental powers" is a distinct charge. The wool argument is a certain indicator, and the "vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation" is a phrase easily understood. No doubt can exist as to the details of the contest or the nature of the issue presented. If adopted as part of the organic law it would strike with paralysis the growing industries in different sections of this sparsely settled Republic. Beyond the Mississippi the hum of manufacturing industry is but little heard. Capital and enterprise in the future will completely cover, as they have already dotted, it with prosperous settlements and comfortable homes. That largely unoccupied domain needs the fostering influence of the protective system to secure markets for its products, develop its resources, induce rapidity of settlement, and ample means of communication to connect and cement its interests in the indissoluble bonds of commercial and national unity.

May we not turn to that other section lying to the south and east of the territory described, whose representatives upon this floor with their ancient solidity are combating the principle of protection and calling it revenue reform? Was it too much to expect that the people of those States would turn aside from their accustomed solidarity, dividing their strength on the great question of industrial protection, since they are now seeking to develop their natural resources, induce manufacturing, and entering with confident hope in the national lists of industrial and manufacturing prosperity? It is recorded that the growth of the iron interests of the South during the past few years has been the marvel of the age. It is stated, in 1880 the South made 397,301 tons of pig-iron; in 1887, 712,835 tons, and it is estimated that in 1888 the output will be 1,500,000 tons. The immense mountain of solid ore in North Carolina will furnish an almost inexhaustible supply of fine Bessemer ore.

It is enthusiastically predicted that the iron-producing center of the continent will move south of the Ohio. The entire coal area of Great Britain covers only 11,900 square miles, while West Virginia alone has 16,000; Kentucky, 13,000; Alabama, 10,680, and Texas over 30,000 square miles. Twelve years ago the total coal product of Alabama was 10,000 tons, while in 1885 2,225,000 tons were produced, and it is estimated in ten years her output will be 10,000,000 tons. According to Poor's Railroad Manual the actual cost of railroads now in the South, and their equipment, is over $1,300,000,000, against $679,804,000 in 1880. The amount of pine standing in the South in 1880 was 237,141,500,000 feet. The manufactures of Georgia increased from $31,196,105 in 1870 to $41,162,811 in 1880, or an increase of over 30 per cent. With resources like these, only partially stated, the South but lately emerged from the incubus of forced labor, with the results of the triumph and production of free labor so vividly seen, living under a protective policy which has borne the nation during twenty-seven years on the high tide of prosperity, it passes comprehension that the leading opponents of the protective system are the representatives of the South.

Let us trust when these efforts shall fail, when the same power which inaugurated shall in the throes of a terrible struggle again assert supremacy, rising in confident majesty to the support of a system which has produced a condition terrible only in a resulting surplus, and shall brush away by the combined votes of the producer and toiler the theory which would impair and destroy. Then and not till then shall the angel of peace hovering hitherto over the discordant elements of civil, social, and industrial wars spread her white wings over a nation unified through the beneficent results of a protective industrial policy, and welded in the indissoluble bonds of reciprocal interest and social prosperity, until everywhere throughout our broad domain sectional lines and social hate shall fade in fraternal regard for the imperishable union of the sisterhood of States.

Mr. MILLS. I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MCCREARY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the law in relation to the collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS moved that the House take a recess till 8 o'clock, but by request withdrew the motion.

SANDY HOOK SHIP-CHANNEL.

Mr. WISE, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors, to which the accompanying resolution was referred, recommend that the accompanying substitute therefor be adopted and that said resolution lie on the table:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the House of Representatives a detailed statement of the work being done in deepening the Sandy Hook ship-channel, giving the terms of the present contract, the facilities of the contractors for doing the work, the amount of material removed by the said contractors to date, and the estimated amount of material yet to be removed under the contract, and also, at the present rate of progress, what length of time will be required to exhaust the present appropriation of $750,000, and why the work has not been pushed forward more rapidly.

Mr. SPINOLA. I move the resolution reported by the committee be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPINOLA moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider lie on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURTS, MARTINSBURGH, W. VA.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I ask by unanimous consent to take up from the House Calendar the bill (S. 1204) to provide for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States at Martinsburgh, W. Va., and put it upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in addition to the terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States now held in the district of West Virginia, there shall be held, in each year, one term of each of said courts, at Martinsburgh, in said district, on the first Tuesday in August.

There was no objection, and the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

W. S. CARPENTER.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2088) for the relief of W. S. Carpenter, and put it upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is, authorized and directed to pay to W. S. Carpenter, late an employé in the Railway Mail Service, $126.65, the amount of his salary from the 3d day of October, 1882, until the 20th day of November, 1882, for services actually performed; and an amount sufficient to make said payment is hereby appropriated.

There was no objection, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CANNON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES L. BRADWELL.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Speaker, I move by unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5092) for the relief of Charles L. Bradwell, and put it upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Charles L. Bradwell, late of the county of Chatham and State of Georgia, and now a resident of the county of Bartow, in said State, the sum of $3,750, the value of cotton belonging to said Bradwell and delivered by him to the Federal authorities in the winter of 1864 and 1865, under orders issued by General W. T. Sherman; and the amount of money necessary to pay said claim is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, said sum to be in full settlement and payment of said claim.

There was no objection, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLEMENTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SHEPARD & MORSE LUMBER COMPANY.

Mr. MOFFITT. Mr. Speaker, I move by unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7618) for the relief of the Shepard & Morse Lumber Company, of Burlington, Vt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $120.43, being the amount of customs duties improperly collected from said Shepard & Morse Lumber Company at the custom-house at Rouse's Point, N. Y.

There was no objection, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MOFFITT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DR. F. O. ST. CLAIR.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 109) for the relief of Dr. F. O. St. Clair, and that the bill be now put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to refund to Dr. F. O. St. Clair the sum of $97.80, the same being the amount of money paid by him November 24, 1880, for duties and charges on certain cases containing a monument to the memory of Francis J. Townshend, late an apothecary in the United States Navy, and who died on board the United States steamer Enterprise, while in the discharge of his duty, on the Mediterranean station; the said monument having been purchased by contributions from the officers and crew of the said steamer, the shipmates of said deceased.

There was no objection, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOWMAN & CO.

Mr. YOST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6191) for the relief of Lowman & Co., and to put it on its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Lowman & Co., of Long Glade, Augusta County, Virginia, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $271.80, in full for internal-revenue tax collected from them on certain stamps for distilled spirits on or about the 15th day of October, 1878, said spirits having been destroyed by fire before the proper stamps had been affixed.

There was no objection; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. YOST moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of half past 5 having arrived, the House takes a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN, as Speaker pro tempore, who directed the reading of the following:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 15, 1888.

I hereby designate Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN to preside as Speaker pro tempore at this evening's session.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

TARIFF.

Mr. LYMAN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of revenue measures.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair, and resumed consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. ABBOTT. Mr. Chairman, the main object sought to be accomplished by the passage of this bill is to relieve the people of the country from the heavy burdens of taxation now laid upon them by the protective-tariff laws of the Government, and to prevent in future the withdrawal from trade and commerce of vasts amounts of money not required for the support of the Government.

Article I, section 8, of the Constitution of the United States, declares that—

Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

This is a plain declaration of the Constitution conferring on Congress the power to raise a sufficient revenue to support the Government and pay its debts, either by a tariff on foreign importations or by an excise or internal tax, or both, with this limitation only, that imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States. This limitation of power has never been construed to mean that Congress might not levy a higher rate of duty on one class of imported goods than on another. But I believe that it would be more consistent with the spirit of the Constitution if the duty on all classes of imported goods were made as nearly uniform on the basis of value as can be done, considering the nature and character of the imports. But in case any distinction is made, common sense and justice suggest that the higher duty should be laid on those classes of goods which are used by people who are able to pay the same without inconvenience to themselves and not upon those used by the great body of the people who depend upon their labor and that of their families for support. This just method of laying taxes was not observed by the framers of existing tariff laws.

Instead of laying the burden of taxation lightly upon those who labor for their bread, discrimination has been made in favor of those whom fortune has favored. A familiar example of this is the tariff on the manufactures of wool and silk. The duty on such manufactures of wool as blankets, wool hats, balmorals, flannels, and men's, women's, and children's ready-made clothing and wearing apparel, whether composed wholly or in part of wool, averages about 70 per cent., while the duty on silks is only 50 per cent. A still greater discrimination is made between the manufactures of fine wools and the coarser or mixed goods. For instance, the duty on broadcloth and fine worsted trousering is from 50 to 54 per cent., while the duty on reversible diagonal (cotton warp) and reversible nap (cotton warp) is from 167 to 179 per cent.

By the bill now under consideration it is intended to reduce the taxes and correct these inequalities by requiring a uniform percentage on all these classes of goods, and to compel the wealthy who use the finer goods to pay at least the same per cent. on their cost that the poor pay on the coarser. Certainly the rich man, if he chooses to wear fine clothes, has no just ground to complain if the law requires him to pay in proportion to their value the same per cent. it requires his poor neighbor to pay on his less costly garments. The following table is taken from the first annual report of the Commissioner of Labor, page 251, and copied in the majority report of the Committee on Ways and Means:

This table is well worthy of careful study. In examining the figures given in the column headed "price at factory" and the column headed "per cent. of price at factory," which the total duty amounts to, the startling inequalities in the rate of duty to be paid in this country becomes apparent. The highest priced goods named in the table is West of England broadcloth, worth $3.60 per yard in Leeds, the specific duty being 35 cents per pound and the ad valorem duty 40 per cent., making a total of duty of 50.3 per cent. on the value at the factory. This is on a high grade of goods. In looking at the bottom of the table the last entry is for cotton-warp reversible cloth, made in imitation of a better kind. It is worth but 45 cents per yard at the factory. The specific duty is the same as on the West of England broadcloth, 35 cents per pound, the ad valorem duty is 35 per cent., but the specific duty and the ad valorem duty together make the rate on the price at the factory 180.7 per cent. That is to say, the cheaper the goods at the factory the greater is the proportional increment of duty. The column headed "per cent. of price at factory," which shows the percentage that the duty is of the factory price, brings this out clearly.

An inspection of this table will show that a yard of broadcloth that costs $3.60 per yard at the factory in England pays a duty of $1.81, while a yard of reversible nap (cotton warp), which costs at the factory only 44 cents, pays a duty of over 78½ cents. Under the provisions of the bill now being considered the yard of broadcloth will pay a duty of $1.44, while the yard of reversible nap will pay a duty of only 18½ cents, leaving a clear gain to the consumer of 60 cents a yard. Similar inequalities exist all through the present tariff laws, and it is noticeable that the discriminations are, with a few exceptions, made against those classes of goods which constitute the clothing of the laboring masses. These inequalities are to a great extent produced by the system of laying specific duties on certain classes of goods.

An illustration of the operation of the specific-duty system, its injustice, and the hardships it imposes on the consumers of cheap cotton goods is given in the report of Mr. Manning, late Secretary of the Treasury, on the revision of the tariff, February 16, 1886, pages 86 and 87.

It is here shown that cotton goods of low qualities manufactured in Scotland from American cotton pay a duty of from 75 to 200 per cent., while the finer qualities of the same goods pay only about 40 per cent.

It is well known that the value of foreign merchandise depends on many conditions, and that it is subject to frequent and oftentimes unexpected fluctuations in price, which of course affect the per cent. of the duty to be paid under the specific system. For instance, if a yard of tarlatan costs to-day 8 cents, and the specific duty be 4 cents per yard, the tax is equal to an ad valorem of 50 per cent. If, from any cause, the cost should run down to 5 cents per yard, the specific duty remaining the same, the tax would be equivalent to an ad valorem of 80 per cent.

The bill under consideration not only corrects the inequalities of the tariff before mentioned, but fixes a duty on imported goods according to their value, without discrimination.

From the date of the passage of the first tariff act, July 4, 1789, to the date of the present tariff law, March 3, 1883, many changes and modifications took place, not only in the amount of duty laid upon imports but in the methods adopted for levying duties.

After a careful examination of the various tariff acts, and of their practical operations on different classes and occupations, I am confirmed in the belief that an ad valorem tax on imports is the only just and equitable way that this class of taxes can be levied.

Our people will not complain, but will willingly submit to the payment of such taxes as are needed for the support of the Government if they are so levied as to distribute the burden among them as equally as possible. But to tax the necessaries of life, or that class of articles that is in general use among the masses, 100 per cent., and tax luxuries and high-priced articles only 50 per cent., as is done in many instances under the present specific-duty system, is not only a moral wrong, but is a legal robbery; but this is no greater moral wrong than the protective features of the present tariff system, of which I will speak more fully hereafter.

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], who is recognized as one of the ablest and most eloquent advocates of protection on this floor, in his speech the other day sought to leave the impression that the country had been in a greatly embarrassed condition for several years prior to the tariff act of 1824, and that this embarrassment was due to a want of protection to our manufacturing industries, and that the prosperity of the country which followed the passage of said act was the result of the protection given by that act to our manufactures, and he appeals to the truth of history to bear him out in the assertion that the—periods of protection in this coun try have been periods of prosperity, and that eras of free trade or a revenue tariff have been eras of depression and disaster.

A comparison of the tariff act of 1816, under which the revenues of the Government were collected until 1824, with the tariff act of the latter date will show whether history sustains the gentleman's conclusions or not. I select only a few leading articles.

Articles.		1816.	1824.
Sugar	per pound	$0.03	$0.03
Coffee	do	.05	.05
Tea	do	.25	.25
Salt	do	.20	.20
Pig-iron	per cent	20	$30.00
Bar-iron	per ton	$30.00	* 33
Glass manufactures	per cent	20	25
Cotton manufactures	do	25	30
Woolen manufactures	do	25

*And 3 cents per pound.

It will be seen from the foregoing table that the only increase of duty on the leading articles of imports named was on glass manufactures, and 5 per cent. additional on woolen manufactures, and yet the gentleman eloquently refers to the period of time when the act of 1816 was in force as one of great depression and disaster, and to the period following the passage of the act of 1824 as one of great prosperity and happiness, and ascribes the depression of the former period to a want of protection to our manufacturing industries which "went down before a flood of foreign importations," and the "marvelous prosperity" of the latter period to protection.

The gentleman certainly has not forgotten that this country had been engaged from 1812 to 1815 in a second struggle for independence with Great Britain. Our little fleet had been swept from the seas. Our national capital had been sacked and burned. The war with the Creek Indians was in progress. Our long line of frontier was infested with hostile Indians which required an army in the field to beat them back. As a consequence, heavy drains upon the resources of the country had to be made.

Peace came, but found the country with a depleted Treasury and burdened with a heavy debt. Agriculture, commerce, and manufactures alike had suffered. These misfortunes were not the result of free trade or protection. The tariff had nothing to do with bringing them about. "Grim-visaged war" brought the evils, which for a time paralyzed all the industries of the country, and which required time for the recuperative energies of the country to remove.

In his message of December 3, 1822, President Monroe said:

From the best information that I have been able to obtain it appears that our manufactures, though depressed immediately after peace, have considerably increased, and are still increasing, under the encouragement given them by the tariff of 1816 and by subsequent laws.

And in his last annual message, December 7, 1824, soon after the passage of the act of 1824, and before any perceptible change in the amount of revenue derived therefrom could have been made, he said:

Our revenue under the mild system of import and tonnage continues to be adequate to all the purposes of the Government. Our agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and navigation flourish.

John Quincy Adams said two years later, in his message of December 9, 1826:

In adverting to the present condition of our fiscal concerns and to the prospects of our revenue, the first remark that calls our attention is that they are less exuberantly prosperous than they were at the corresponding period of last year. The severe shock so extensively sustained by the commercial and manufacturing interests in Great Britain has not been without a perceptible recoil upon ourselves. Reduced importation from abroad is necessarily succeeded by a reduced return to the Treasury at home. The net revenue of the present year will not equal that of the last, and the receipts of that which is to come will fall short of those of the current year.

Mr. Chairman, I have drawn a comparison between the tariff act of 1816 and that of 1824, and have quoted the official communications of the Chief Executives of the Government, to show that there is not the slightest foundation for the often-repeated declarations of Republican protectionists that whatever calamities befell the country prior to 1824, that whatever retarded its growth and development, were the results of free trade or a tariff for revenue only, and that the protective-tariff act of 1824 was the grand panacea for all the evils that then existed.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that the act of 1816 was the first high protective-tariff act that ever passed the Congress of the United States, and it has been so denominated by all political writers, and the additional duties that were imposed on foreign importations by the act of 1824 were a mere bagatelle, as already shown, and if any depression or disaster resulted from the tariff act of 1816 it was because of the high duties imposed by said act on the necessaries of life. The fact that Great Britain flooded the country in 1815 with importations of her old stocks of goods that had accumulated during the war, and which were out of fashion and salable only at prices far below cost of production, did not affect the manufacturing industries of the country any more than it would have done if the importations had been made in 1825.

Another protective-tariff act was passed in May, 1828, which increased the duties on iron and woolen manufactures. Speaking of said act in December, 1828, President Adams said:

The tariff of the last session was in its details not acceptable to the great interests of any portion of the Union, not even to the interests which it was specially intended to subserve. * * *

In his first message, December, 1829, President Jackson said:

No very considerable change has occurred during the recess of Congress in the condition of either our agriculture, commerce, or manufactures. The operation of the tariff has not proved so injurious to the two former, or as beneficial to the latter, as was anticipated. Importations of foreign goods have not sensibly diminished, while domestic competition under an illusive excitement has increased the production much beyond the demand for home consumption. The consequences have been low prices, temporary embarrassment, and partial loss. That such of our manufacturing establishments as are based upon capital, and are prudently managed, will survive the shock, and be ultimately profitable, there is no good reason to doubt.

On December 7, 1830, the President said:

The present tariff taxes on some of the comforts of life are unnecessarily high.

This was the era of which the gentleman from Michigan so eloquently speaks when he says, in substance, that the protective tariff acts of 1824 and 1828 enthused new life into our languishing manufactures and brought to the country a period of "marvelous prosperity." What industry will not prosper when all other industries are taxed to foster it? While it is undoubtedly true that manufacturing establishments which were based on actual capital and were prudently managed did prosper and accumulate wealth from the protection afforded them, not only by the acts of 1824 and 1828, but by the act of 1816, yet the great agricultural industries of the country, upon which all other interests had to depend, suffered a corresponding depression in the prices of their products; and this fact was so apparent, and so well understood by President Jackson, that in his message of December 4, 1832, which recommended a gradual reduction of tariffs, he said:

Those who take an enlarged view of the condition of our country must be satisfied that the policy of protection must be ultimately limited to those articles of domestic manufacture which are indispensable to our safety in time of war.

It will be perfectly evident to every one who will take the pains to study the political history of the country that nearly all the earlier Presidents regarded it as unjust and inequitable to tax one class of our industries for the benefit of another, and whenever such legislation was recommended it was justified on the grounds of necessity, or to give temporary, not permanent, encouragement to such of our "infant industries" as were not able to compete with foreign manufactures.

But to return, Mr. Chairman, to the bill under consideration, there is one feature of it which should commend it to the favorable consideration of the country. I refer to the fact that it not only reduces taxation on the necessaries of life, but it levies a tax on most articles according to their cost or value, thus removing the unjust discrimination and inequalities of the present law. And I wish to call attention to the fact that this feature of the bill is the one that seems to meet with the united opposition of protectionists.

President Polk, in his first annual message to Congress, December 2, 1845, in recommending a revision and modification of the protective tariff act of August, 1842, said:

I recommend to Congress the abolition of the minimum principle, or assumed, arbitrary, and false values, and of specific duties, and the substitution in their place of ad valorem duties, as the fairest and most equitable indirect tax which can be imposed. By the ad valorem principle all articles are taxed according to their cost or value, and those which are of inferior quality, or of small cost, bear only the just proportion of the tax with those which are of superior quality or greater cost. The articles consumed by all are taxed at the same rate. A system of ad valorem revenue duties, with proper discriminations and proper guards against frauds in collecting them, it is not doubted will afford ample incidental advantages to the manufacturers and enable them to derive as great profits as can be derived from any other regular business. It is believed that such a system strictly within the revenue standard will place the manufacturing interests on a stable footing and inure to their permanent advantage, while it will as nearly as may be practicable extend to all the great interests of the country the incidental protection which can be afforded by our revenue laws. Such a system, when once firmly established, would be permanent and not subject to the constant complaints, agitations, and changes which must ever occur when duties are not laid for revenue, but for the "protection merely" of a favored interest.

In pursuance of the President's recommendations, Congress passed the act "reducing the duties on imports," in July or August, 1846. Under this act an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent. was levied on sugar, 20 per cent. on salt, 30 per cent. on pig-iron, 30 per cent. on bar-iron, 40 per cent. on glass manufactures, 25 per cent. on cotton, and 30 per cent. on woolen manufactures, and a similar rate on other leading articles.

The President in his third annual message, referring to the operations of the act of 1846, said:

The net revenue from customs during the year ending on the 1st of December, 1846, being the last year under the operation of the tariff act of 1842, was $22,971,403.10, and the net revenue from customs during the year ending on the 1st of December, 1847, being the first year under the operation of the tariff act of 1846, was about $31,500,000, being an increase of revenue for the first year under the tariff of 1846 of more than $8,500,000 over that of the last year under the tariff of 1842.

Further on in the same message the President, speaking of the benefits accruing to all classes and pursuits under the equitable system of raising revenue under the act of 1846, said:

The act of the 30th of July, 1846, "reducing the duties on imports," has been in force since the 1st of December last, and I am gratified to state that all the beneficial effects which were anticipated from its operation have been fully realized. The public revenue derived from customs during the year ending on the 1st of December, 1847, exceeds by more than $8,000,000 the amount received in the preceding year under the operation of the act of 1842, which was superseded and repealed by it. Its effects are visible in the great and almost unexampled prosperity which prevails in every branch of business. While the repeal of the prohibitory and restrictive duties of the act of 1842, and the substitution in their place of reasonable revenue rates levied on articles imported according to their actual value, have increased the revenue and augmented our foreign trade, all the great interests of the country have been advanced and promoted. The great and important interests of agriculture, which had been not only too much neglected, but actually taxed under the protective policy for the benefit of other interests, have been relieved of the burdens which that policy imposed on them, and our farmers and planters, under a more just and liberal policy, are finding new and profitable markets abroad for their augmented products.

Our commerce is rapidly increasing, and is extending more widely the circle of international exchanges. Great as has been the increase of our imports during the past year, our exports of domestic products sold in foreign markets have been still greater. Our navigating interest is eminently prosperous. The number of vessels built in the United States has been greater than during any preceding period of equal length. Large profits have been derived by those who have constructed, as well as by those who have navigated them. Should the ratio of increase in the number of our merchant vessels be progressive and be as great for the future as during the past year, the time is not distant when our tonnage and commercial marine will be larger than that of any other nation in the world. While the interests of agriculture, of commerce, and of navigation have been enlarged and invigorated, it is highly gratifying to observe that our manufactures are also in a prosperous condition.

None of the ruinous effects upon this interest which were apprehended by some as the result of the operation of the revenue system established by the act of 1846 have been experienced. On the contrary, the number of manufactories and the amount of capital invested in them is steadily and rapidly increasing, affording gratifying proofs that American enterprise and skill employed in this branch of domestic industry, with no other advantages than those fairly and incidentally accruing from a just system of revenue duties, are abundantly able to meet successfully all competition from abroad and still derive fair and remunerating profits. While capital invested in manufactures is yielding adequate and fair profits under the new system, the wages of labor, whether employed in manufactures, agriculture, commerce, or navigation, have been augmented.

The toiling millions whose daily labor furnishes the supply of food and raiment and all the necessaries and comforts of life are receiving higher wages and more steady and permanent employment than in any other country, or at any previous period of our own history. So successful have been all branches of our industry that a foreign war, which generally diminishes the resources of a nation, has in no essential degree retarded our onward progress or checked our general prosperity. With such gratifying evidences of prosperity and of the successful operation of the revenue act of 1846, every consideration of public policy recommends that it shall remain unchanged. It is hoped that the system of import duties which it established may be regarded as the permanent policy of the country, and that the great interests affected by it may not again be subject to be injuriously disturbed, as they have heretofore been, by frequent and sometimes sudden changes.

During a period of ten years that followed the passage of this act the Government under its operations derived sufficient revenue, not only to meet the current expenses of the Government, but to liquidate over $50,000,000 of the debt created by the war with Mexico. Referring to the general prosperity of the country, and to the necessity of reducing taxation, President Pierce, in his message to Congress, in December, 1855, said:

Derived as our public revenue is in chief part from duties on imports, its magnitude affords gratifying evidence of the prosperity not only of our commerce, but of the other great interests upon which that depends.

The principle that all moneys not required for the current expenses of the Government should remain for active employment in the hands of the people, and the conspicuous fact that the annual revenue from all sources exceeds by many millions of dollars the amount needed for a prudent and economical administration of public affairs, can not fail to suggest the propriety of an early revision and reduction of the tariff of duties on imports. It is now so generally conceded that the purpose of revenue alone can justify the imposition of duties on imports, that in readjusting the impost tables and schedules which unquestionably require essential modifications, a departure from the principles of the present tariff is not anticipated.

Acting on these suggestions and the recommendations contained in his message to Congress one year later, Congress passed the act of March 3, 1857, by which the tax on sugar was reduced to 24 per cent., on salt to 15 per cent., on pig-iron to 24 per cent., on bar iron to 24 per cent., on glass manufactures to 30 per cent., on cotton goods to 19 per cent., and on woolen fabrics to 24 per cent., and a corresponding reduction on other dutiable articles.

Subsequent to the passage of this act came the financial crisis of that year, and it is referred to by the gentleman from Michigan and others as the direct result of the reduction of the tariff duties. This position is not sustained by the history of the times. President Buchanan, in his annual message of December 6, 1858, in referring to the cause which led to the financial crash, said:

When Congress met in December last, the business of the country had just been crushed by one of those periodical revulsions which are the inevitable consequence of our unsound and extravagant system of bank credits and inflated currency. With all the elements of national wealth in abundance, our manufactures were suspended, our useful public and private enterprises were arrested, and thousands of laborers were deprived of employment and reduced to want.

Universal distress prevailed among the commercial, manufacturing, and mechanical classes. This revulsion was felt the more severely in the United States, because similar causes had produced the like deplorable effects throughout the commercial nations of Europe. All were experiencing sad reverses at the same moment. Our manufacturers everywhere suffered severely, not because of the recent reduction in the tariff of duties on imports, but because there was no demand at any price for their productions.

No government, and especially a government of such limited powers as that of the United States, could have prevented the late revulsion. The whole commercial world seemed for years to have been rushing to this catastrophe. The same ruinous consequences would have followed in the United States, whether the duties upon foreign imports had remained as they were under the tariff of 1846 or had been raised to a much higher standard. The tariff of 1857 had no agency in the result. The general causes existing throughout the world could not have been controlled by the legislation of any particular country.

The periodical revulsions which have existed in our past history must continue to return at intervals so long as our present unbounded system of bank credits shall prevail.

Mr. Chairman, the same causes which produced financial distress in Europe so reduced the amount of foreign importations into this country that in 1858 the whole amount received from customs was a little less than $42,000,000. And although the country had not yet fully recovered from the effects of the revulsion in trade, the custom receipts two years later, 1860, increased under the low ad valorem tariff act of 1857 to over $53,000,000.

In 1856, when the estimated population of the United States was a little less than 30,000,000 of people, about one-half of what it is now, the custom receipts under the act of 1846, which levied a less tax than the bill now under consideration, amounted to over $64,000,000, about $14,000,000 more than were then necessary to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government and to pay the interest on the public debt.

Mr. Chairman, during the period of ten years following the passage of the act of 1846, agriculture, commerce, and navigation were never more prosperous, and although many of the principal states of Europe were, during this period, involved in disastrous wars, and struggling under the influences of unprecedented commercial revulsions which destroyed the industries and paralyzed the credit of many nations of Europe, the manufacturing interests of this country were not seriously affected thereby until the depressing effects of these disturbances abroad began to diminish our foreign trade by a reduction of imports and exports, which, coupled with the unsettled condition of our own currency, led to the financial collapse of 1857. In no just sense can the condition of the country at that time be attributed to the operation of the low tariff of that year, as has already been shown. You had just as well say that the war between the States was the result of tariff legislation as to say the financial crash of 1857 resulted from it.

Mr. Chairman, I will not undertake to follow the history of the tariff legislation of the country through that period when one section of our country was arrayed in hostilities against the other, as that legislation may have been necessary to meet the demands of the Government occasioned by the exigencies of the times, and to provide the necessary means for the successful prosecution of the war.

I will pass over this period of tariff legislation, and that which followed the close of the war, with the remark that Congress had levied taxes on domestic manufactures, on incomes, on the receipts of railroad companies, on insurance and express companies, on bank capital, bank deposits, and bank checks, which yielded the Government a revenue of more than $250,000,000 per annum; yet with an interest-bearing national debt that amounted to over $2,000,000,000, and which required over $140,000,000 annually to pay the interest, all of these taxes were swept away, while the taxes on clothing, on food, and implements of labor were left to pay this enormous debt and its interest, as well as to meet the current expenses of the Government. This is the character of legislation that has been enacted under the auspices of the Republican party for the protection of labor.

Mr. Chairman, every speech from the other side of this Hall but one which I have heard has been in opposition to the reduction of duties on imports, and this opposition is based on the alleged ground that such reduction as proposed by this bill will destroy our manufacturing industries, impoverish labor, and bring widespread ruin and desolation upon the country. And yet the distinguished gentleman from Michigan tells us that a duty is not a tax on the consumer; that it adds nothing to the cost of the article; and further says:

There are many things the market value of which is lower than the duty, and how idle, therefore, to say that the duty is added to the cost.

This statement is true as to the cost of many articles in the foreign markets. If such is the case as to these articles in the home market, why not reduce the tariff or remove it altogether?

Again he says:

You can not touch a manufactured article on the farm or in the home, the product of a protected American industry, that has not been made cheaper by reason of protection.

This is indeed a remarkable statement; remarkable for the same reason he gives for disagreeing with the statement of the President that a duty adds to the cost of an article, that "it is not true."

His statement is based on the fact that steel-rails and blankets and other articles cost more in 1867 and in 1870 than they do now. He ought to have told you also that tariffs were higher then than now. Why, sir, it has been repeatedly shown by gentlemen on this side of the House, since this debate began, that by reason of the improved machinery now in use the labor cost of production of steel and iron has been reduced at least 50 per cent. It has also been shown that the labor cost of production of cotton and woolen fabrics for the same reason has been reduced to less than one-sixth of what they formerly cost. Now, sir, tariff did not make these reductions. It was genius and skill.

Would it not, sir, be absurd to say that because steel-nails, which at some factories are turned out by the tons per day, are cheaper than when they were made by hand at the forge, that the reduction in price is due to the protective tariff? To assert this as a fact is no more unreasonable than the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. Chairman, one of the great wonders of this age is the readiness and ease with which American genius adapts and models machinery to the wants and purposes of manufacture, and as a result the power of production is many times multiplied, and as a further result the cost of production is correspondingly decreased and prices lowered. It seems, however, that protectionists can not or will not credit the advance and progress made in the manufacturing industries of the country to any other cause or causes than the influence of a high protective tariff.

It is shown by the first annual report of the Commissioner of Labor that cost of production often varies in the same State as well as in the different States. For instance, the labor cost in one establishment in Ohio of men's first-class machine-sewed domestic calf boots is $1.25 per pair, while in another establishment in the same State the labor cost is 92 cents per pair of same quality. Similar variations exist in the labor cost of cotton and woolen goods, as illustrated in the following table:

States.	Description.	Labor, cost per yard.
		Cents. Mills.
Georgia	Sheeting, 36 inches wide, 40 by 40, 3.24 yards to the pound.	00 8½
New York	Sheeting, 36 inches wide, 44 by 43, 4.5 yards to the pound.	00 9
Massachusetts	Print cloth, 28 inches wide, 64 by 64, 7 yards to the pound.	1 0
New Hampshire	Print cloth, 28 inches wide, 64 by 64, 7 yards to the pound.	00 9
Kentucky	1 yard best quality jeans	1 0
Indiana	do	00 8
Massachusetts	1 yard flannel, 27 inches wide, 4 ounces	00 3
Missouri	1 yard flannel, 27 inches wide, 8 ounces	1 3

Now, sir, with the low labor cost of these articles the existing tariff laws levy a duty on goods of the quality above named as follows:

On sheeting ..... 2½ cents per yard.
On print cloth ..... 5 cents per yard.
On woolen and cotton mixed cloth ..... about 67 per cent.
On flannel ..... about 66 per cent.

And yet we are told by protectionists that a protective tariff does not add anything to the price of the articles.

The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics shows in his last annual report that for the year ending June 30, 1887, the value of manufactured cotton goods imported from foreign countries into the United States for immediate consumption, including withdrawals from warehouse for consumption, amounted in round numbers to $29,150,000, upon which an average ad valorem duty of 40.17 per cent. was paid, amounting in round numbers to $11,720,000, which added to the first cost of the goods gives the sum of $40,870,000, which must be paid by the importers, besides ocean transportation, before the goods are marketable in this country. The importer, of course, charges his per centum of profit on the money employed to pay the duty as on the first cost of the goods, and thus the consumer pays a double duty. Yet we are told by our Republican friends that a protective tariff brings cheaper clothing to the farmer and laborer!

Again, the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics reports that the value of the manufactures of wool imported into the United States for immediate consumption, including withdrawals from warehouses for consumption, for the year ending June 30, 1887, was, in round numbers, $44,235,000, upon which an average rate of ad valorem duty of 67.21 per cent. was paid, amounting to $29,774,000, which, added to the cost of the merchandise, to say nothing of the cost of transportation, produced the sum of $74,009,000, the actual cost to importers, upon which they charge their per cent. of profit.

Now, from what has been said it is apparent that the foreign cost of the cotton and woolen goods imported to this country for consumption for the year named was $73,385,000, and the duty paid thereon $41,494,000, which, added to the first cost, not including transportation, makes the goods cost $114,879,000 in the hands of the importers.

The same authority shows that during the same period the value of iron and steel and the manufactures thereof imported into this country amounted, in round numbers, to $50,618,000, upon which duties to the amount of $20,715,000, or an ad valorem rate of duty of 40.92 per cent., was collected by the Government. These iron and steel goods in the hands of the importers cost $71,333,000, which, added to the cost of cotton and woolen imports, makes $186,212,000.

I have selected these three classes of imports because they embrace a vast number of articles of necessity that are in general use among farmers and all laboring classes.

When I consider, Mr. Chairman, the vast variety of goods embraced within these three classes which are distributed throughout this broad land, and by retail dealers again distributed among the farmers and laborers of this country, and when I further consider that the Government collects from these three classes alone the enormous sum of $62,209,000, I am astounded at the temerity of gentlemen on the other side of the House who boldly assert that the payment of this sum to the Government cheapens the cost of the goods to the consumer.

During the last fiscal year, in round numbers, $450,325,000 worth of dutiable merchandise, including all classes, was imported into this country, upon which the Government collected $212,032,000, and yet this vast amount of goods, burdened as they were with this immense tax, came in competition with our domestic manufactures and found a market among our people, and still we are told that farmers and laborers are benefited by this sort of protection!

But, Mr. Chairman, when their subtle and ingenious arguments fail to convince the common-sense people of the country, when their sophistries are detected and exposed, they raise the cry that the advocates of a tariff for revenue only are seeking to crush the manufacturing industries of our own country and to bring American labor in competition with the "pauper labor" of Europe.

It has been several times admitted on this side of the House that American labor receives better wages than the same class of labor in Europe, though labor is much better paid in free-trade England than in the tariff countries of Germany and France; but while this is so, it has been as often shown that it is not the result of a protective tariff, not one tithe of which ever reaches the pockets of the laborer, but that it is due to the intelligence and skill of our labor, as compared with most of the European labor, and to our improved machinery, which enables labor to produce more. One further fact may be admitted, and that is that protection has built up some of the most powerful and oppressive monopolies that ever cursed the people of any country. With ruthless hands they have laid heavy duties and exactions upon every other industry to fill their pockets. They oppress the poor man because he is helpless, and through combinations and trusts they even defy the Government. They are not willing to bear their proportion of the burden of supporting the Government which gives them protection, and every attempt to tax capital or to compel it to bear its equal share of taxation is met with bold opposition.

The Government, under the tariff act of 1883, practically places it within the power of every manufacturer of wool to tax the people, the farmers and laborers, who consume his goods 67 per cent. above their cost of production, and within the power of every manufacturer of cotton or iron to levy a tax of 40 per cent. upon his goods. When we consider that the estimated value of all domestic manufactures approximates $7,000,000,000, and that it is within the power of the manufacturers to levy a tax on consumers of these goods to an amount equal to the duties on foreign goods, which average 47 per cent., we can form some idea of the vast sums of money that annually flow into the pockets of this protected and privileged class, and it is neither unjust nor unkind to say that the mammoth fortunes that have grown up under this system attest the truth of the statement that they have not been slow to avail themselves of this privilege.

It has been estimated by some of our profoundest political economists that for every dollar that the Government collects under the tariff laws, the manufacturer collects five; and Professor A. L. Perry, of Williams College, who is regarded as one of the closest and most accurate economic thinkers, declares that it is his deliberate opinion and conviction that out of every $5 that is collected from the consumers of foreign and domestic manufactures under the operation of the tariff act of 1883 only $1 reaches the Treasury.

But, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that our Republican friends are not altogether consistent. While they tell us that American products are cheapened by protection they tell us it greatly enhances the price of labor. This would be a paradox if true, but it is not true. Now, for argument's sake, and this alone, let it be admitted that the laborers employed in the factories get all the benefits that flow from protection. Then, sir, is it right in principle or in morals that the great farming population of the Western and Southern States shall be taxed upon articles of necessity for the purpose of paying high wages to the factory hands of a few mining and manufacturing States?

I read a paragraph or two from the President's message:

> By the last census it is made to appear that of the 17,392,099 of our population engaged in all kinds of industries 7,670,493 are employed in agriculture, 4,074,238 in professional and personal service (2,934,876 of whom are domestic servants and laborers), while 1,810,256 are employed in trade and transportation, and 3,837,112 are classed as employed in manufacturing and mining.
> For present purposes, however, the last number given should be considerably reduced. Without attempting to enumerate all, it will be conceded that there should be deducted from those which it includes 375,143 carpenters and joiners, 285,401 milliners, dressmakers, and seamstresses, 172,726 blacksmiths, 133,756 tailors and tailoresses, 102,473 masons, 76,241 butchers, 41,309 bakers, 22,083 plasterers, and 4,891 engaged in manufacturing agricultural implements, amounting in the aggregate to 1,214,023, leaving 2,623,089 persons employed in such manufacturing industries as are claimed to be benefited by a high tariff.

Now, sir, will gentlemen on the other side tell me that it is right or in the interest of American labor that the 7,670,493 farmers and 7,098,517 persons engaged in trade and in other occupations and professions shall be taxed many millions of dollars in order that high wages may be paid to the 2,623,089 persons engaged in such industries as are claimed to be benefited by a high tariff? Now, sir, I have as kind feelings and as much respect for the foreign laborer who comes to this country with the bona fide intention of becoming a citizen as any gentleman on this floor; but, sir, I earnestly protest against that policy which gives him opportunities and advantages not enjoyed by American citizens. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], in a speech on this floor some years ago, said that 64 per cent. of all the persons employed in the mining and manufacturing industries of the country are of foreign birth or parentage, while only 5 per cent. of the farm labor are of foreign birth or parentage. I have not quoted his exact language, but its substance.

If this be true, and I have no reason to doubt it, then, sir, we are taxing the American farmer to pay high wages, not to American labor, but to imported foreign labor. Sir, it is a fact well known to every one that a few years ago labor strikes were numerous. It is estimated by the Commissioner of Labor that during the year ending July 1, 1885, over 19,000 establishments, including factories and mines, were closed, and over 168,000 hands thrown out of employment. During this time, and for years before, protectionists, who now so loudly and vigorously cry out for protection of American labor, were importing vast numbers of this "pauper labor" from Europe, and the evil grew to such an extent that Congress was compelled to interpose by interdicting the importation of foreigners under the contract or agreement system by which they were to perform labor in the United States, and laborers all over the country are now demanding the enforcement of these laws.

These facts will show, Mr. Chairman, how empty the pretensions of those who claim that protection is intended for the benefit of American labor. It has ever been insisted that the farmer is benefited by the tariff, but I have heard no argument to sustain this position. On the other hand, the facts show that after supplying the home markets he is forced to ship the products of his farm to European countries, some of which levy a tariff thereon, which lessens the price he would otherwise receive.

The Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, in his last statement of exports, embracing the period from July 1, 1887, to March 31, 1888, only nine months, shows exports of farm products as follows:

Animals, valued at (round numbers)	$8,679,000
Breadstuffs, valued at (round numbers)	103,259,000
Cotton (unmanufactured)	190,708,000
Meat and dairy products, valued at (round numbers)	70,180,000
Seeds	1,385,000
Sugar and molasses	2,236,000
Tobacco (unmanufactured)	18,855,000
Total	396,002,000

The above list does not by any means embrace all the products of the farm and ranch which are forced too seek a market in a foreign land, but it shows enough to convince any reasonable mind that these products have no protection at home.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is needless to pursue this subject further. The financial condition of the country is such that immediate relief is needed.

The balance in the Treasury on the 30th of April of the present year aggregated $136,143,563.53 over and above all liabilities, and it is estimated that by the 1st of July next the surplus will have reached $150,000,000. This does not include the $100,000,000 reserve fund.

Now the problems which confront us are, first, what shall be done with the vast surplus that is now hoarded in the Treasury, and, second, what shall be done to prevent a similar accumulation in the future?

If I understand the sentiment of this side of the House, it is that the surplus should be expended in paying the matured debts and in the purchase of such unmatured interest-bearing obligations as can be done without too great a sacrifice, thus relieving the Treasury and returning the money to the people through the channels of trade; and to accomplish this purpose the bill of my distinguished colleague [Mr. MILLS] was introduced and passed this House.

Now, in reference to the other question. While it is admitted by all parties that there must be a reduction in the amount of the taxes to prevent a continued increase of the surplus, as to how it shall be done has given rise to all this discussion.

Republicans and a few high-tariff Democrats propose to reduce taxation by the repeal of the internal taxes on tobacco and distilled and malt liquors. For a quarter of a century the Republican party was in power, and during that time called into existence the income, the railroad, and bank taxes; also the internal tax, all of which were claimed to be war taxes. The first-mentioned taxes were repealed while a war debt of over $2,000,000,000 was hanging over the country, and now it is proposed to repeal the internal taxes while a war debt of one billion and forty millions yet remains unpaid. A pension-roll requiring about eighty-six millions annually to pay, a result of the war, is upon us, and though it has been twenty-three years since the war closed, the roll is daily increasing. Notwithstanding these enormous war debts are hanging over the country, and by their ponderous weight crushing the energies of the people, the Republican party is endeavoring to wipe from the statute-books every vestige of the war taxes. As long as war debts exist war taxes should be continued.

These internal taxes oppress no one. Tobacco and cigars, whisky and beer are not necessaries. They are classed as luxuries. Persons who use them do so voluntarily. The producers of corn, rye, and barley, from which whisky is manufactured, realize about as much for their grain as they did when there was no tax on whisky. The tax is simply added to the value of the manufactured article, and according to protection theorists ought to reduce the price of whisky; but the truth is, as is apparent, it is paid, as all other taxes are, by the consumers of the article. Such is the case with the tobacco tax. The Democrats on this floor prefer to give the people cheap clothing rather than give them cheap whisky and tobacco.

But why, Mr. Chairman, are protectionists so much concerned about the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes? They did not try to do so when they were in power. They find, however, that under an honest Democratic administration of this Government a surplus has accumulated and the amount thereof has been increased to such proportions that some relief must be given. They see that high tariff is in danger. They see the means by which they can levy many hundred millions of dollars upon the clothing and articles of necessity of the farmers, mechanics, and laborers of the country for their own use and benefit are about to be swept away by a reduction of the tariff tax, and therefore they are much concerned about the internal tax. They want the latter repealed to save the former, and not only to save the former, but to bring about a necessity for increasing the tariff taxes. They see from the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that there were collected for the year ending June 30, 1887, from the—

Whisky tax (in round numbers)	$65,829,000
Tobacco tax (in round numbers)	30,108,000
Fermented liquors	21,922,000
Total	117,859,000

The oleomargarine tax, which protectionists do not seek to repeal, is not included in the above. To repeal the internal taxes above named will reduce the revenues of the Government $60,000,000 below current expenses, including the pension-roll. How do protectionists propose to supply the deficit? The question has been asked them several times, but I have heard no response. I presume they want greater protection.

Mr. Chairman, the bill now under consideration is not, in my opinion, the best tariff measure that could be framed, but as might be reasonably expected in a body as numerous as this, there exist conflicting opinions, which can be reconciled only by mutual concessions and compromises; and it was in this spirit, as I am assured, that the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee met to consider measures for the relief of the financially depressed condition of the people of the country; and as a result of many weeks of arduous labor, this bill was presented, and while it may not meet with the approval of every Democrat, it is admitted that it will afford some measure of relief to a tax-burdened people if it can be passed.

One other objection urged against this bill by protectionists is that it places wool on the free-list. I can not believe that the dire calamities predicted, if wool be put on the free-list, will befall the wool-growers of the country, many of whom reside in the district I have the honor to represent, and are among the warmest personal and political friends I have.

For the information of those who are interested, I present a brief history of the tariff legislation on wool:

The tariff act of 1816 imposed a duty on unmanufactured wool of 15 per cent. ad valorem.

The act of 1824 fixed the duty at 25 per cent. ad valorem after June, 1825, and after June 1, 1826, at 30 per cent. ad valorem.

The act of 1828 imposed a duty of 4 cents a pound and 40 per cent. ad valorem.

The act of 1832 admitted free all the wool under 8 cents a pound, and all wool over 8 cents was dutiable at 4 cents per pound and 40 per cent. ad valorem.

The act of 1833 did not substantially change the tariff on wool; it reduced it a little.

The act of 1842 taxed wool of the value of 7 cents per pound or under 5 cents ad valorem; over 7 cents, 3 cents per pound and 30 per cent. ad valorem.

The act of 1846 imposed a tax on all wools, without regard to quality, of 30 per cent. ad valorem.

The act of 1857 admitted all wool under the value of 20 cents per pound free of duty, and all wools above that value were taxed 24 per cent. ad valorem. I omit the war period.

The act of 1867 classified wool into three classes, and imposed a tax on wool of the first class of the value of 32 cents or less per pound of 10 cents per pound and 11 cents ad valorem; exceeding 32 cents in value, 12 cents per pound. The same on second-class wool. On third-class wool, valued at 12 cents per pound or under, 3 cents per pound; exceeding 12 cents, 6 cents per pound.

The act of 1872 made a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent. on all wools, but this act was repealed in March, 1875. The act of 1883, the present tariff act, imposed on wools of the first class, valued at 30 cents per pound, 10 cents per pound; exceeding 30 cents, 12 cents per pound. The rate is the same on second-class wools. On third class, of value of 12 cents per pound, 2½ cents per pound, and on wool exceeding 12 cents, 5 cents per pound.

The following table, taken from the report of Secretary Manning on the Revision of the Tariff, page 249, will not be uninteresting if studied in connection with the rates of duty on wool under the various tariff acts as above given:

J. R. DODGE,
Statistician, Department of Agriculture.

It will be seen from the foregoing table that wool was higher while the tariff acts of 1832 and 1833 were in force—which protectionists call low-tariff acts—than it has been at any period since, except the war period, and that wool commanded a higher price during the time the low-tariff act of 1846 was in force than it has at any time since the passage of the high-tariff act of 1883. These facts should convince the wool-growers of the country that the price of their clips does not depend upon a high tariff.

Testimony from many sources shows that fine foreign wools, which are used to mix with our coarser wools in the manufacture of certain fabrics, are practically excluded from the country by high tariff, and as a result many mills are idle. Remove the tariff, start the mills to work, and there will be an increased demand for the home production.

But so much has been said on this subject and it has been so ably and eloquently discussed by my colleague [Mr. LANHAM] I will not take up further time on this branch of the discussion.

Mr. Chairman, there are a few facts which I desire to call to the attention of the House which I omitted to do at the proper time and in the right connection, but which I do not want to pass by without notice, as they tend to show that when the distinguished gentleman from Michigan appealed to history to confirm the assertion "that the periods of protection in this country have been periods of prosperity, and that the eras of free trade or a revenue tariff have been eras of depression and disaster," he had entirely forgotten the two greatest industries of this country, the growing of cotton and wheat.

He paints in glowing colors the prosperity which he alleges followed the tariffs of 1824 and 1828, and eloquently depicts the "widespread desolation" that followed the low tariff of 1833. Now, sir, I appeal to statistical history to show that the gentleman's love for protection is greater than his love for truth of history. Upland cotton in New York in 1825 sold from 13 to 27 cents per pound. It gradually went down under high tariff each year until it sold for the low price of 7 to 12 cents in 1832. In 1833, under low tariff, prices advanced to 9 and 17 cents. In 1835 they were from 15 to 20 cents per pound; declined in 1836, and sold at 12 to 20 cents. There was further decline, under the high-tariff acts of 1842, which received its mead of praise from the gentleman. Cotton sold that year in New York from 7 to 9 cents, and in the following year from 5 to 8 cents; 5 to 9 in 1844, and 4 to 9 in 1845, the lowest price that cotton ever reached in this country.

Under the low-tariff acts of 1846 and 1857, which the gentleman alleges in substance brought eras of industrial depression, culminating in the panic of 1857 and in universal bankruptcy, history shows that cotton gradually advanced from 1846 until 1850, when it sold from 11 to 14 cents; in 1853, from 10 to 11 cents; and in 1857, the year when "universal bankruptcy overtook the people," according to the gentleman, cotton sold in New York from 13 to 15 cents per pound. Substantially the same fluctuations occured in the price of wheat and other farm products. The foregoing figures were taken from the American Almanac, the statistics of which were compiled from official sources by Mr. Spofford, the Librarian of Congress. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems that when the gentleman was speaking of the panics of 1837 and 1857 he forgot that great class of laborers whose farm products commanded high prices under low tariff and were sacrificed at low prices under high tariff. He forgot to tell us that the Commissioner of Labor, who has collected all the information obtainable on this subject, says that these panics, including that of 1873, were the results of speculation, extension of credits, and inflated currency. But why has not the gentleman told us the cause of the great distress brought upon the country by the financial crash of 1873. Was it free trade or a revenue tariff only? If I remember correctly there, never was a period in the history of this country when the tariffs were higher. Why did he not tell us the causes which led to the financial depression that continued from 1882 to 1885? And why did he not tell us the causes which have produced existing depressions in monetary affairs and the general discontent that exists all over this land? I will answer the last question in short. High tariff, which robs the farmer, the mechanic, and the laborer of their hard earnings under the guise of protection to build up and sustain vast moneyed monopolies and trusts that are ruled over by the lordliest set of plunderers that ever feasted and fattened on the misfortunes of their countrymen by sanction of law, is one of the principal causes that has produced present depression and existing discontent.

It has been several times shown by gentlemen on this side of the House that these trusts, such as the salt trust, steel trust, iron trust, zinc, copper, lead, and tin trusts, and many others, under a protective tariff, enjoy a bonus of $30 on every $100 worth of their products, while the whole cost for labor is only $24. Now, sir, these soulless entities called trusts, which have sprung into existence of high-tariff parentage within the last few years, are earless to the wails of suffering of the laboring men, women, and children for whose labor $24 are paid, while above ordinary profits high tariff allows them a bonus of $30. How can they expect the country to remain quiet and passive under such circumstances? How can they expect to keep down strikes when they come with all their money power and influence to defeat all legislation looking to a fair adjustment and settlement of existing evils?

Mr. Chairman, these trusts destroy all competition at home, and high tariff prevents competition from abroad. Break down these trusts by a reduction of the tariff, and competition will spring into life again at home and abroad, labor will be better paid, and farm products will advance.

And I wish here to repeat, that I have shown that the proposition made by the gentleman from Michigan has not been sustained by history; and I want further to say that if history proves anything it proves that the periods of protection, which the gentleman calls periods of "marvelous prosperity," have been periods of "marvelous prosperity" for corporate monopolies, for moneyed combinations, for trusts, for syndicates, and all the evils that follow in the train of money domination.

These have been the periods when our commerce with foreign nations ceased, when our ships rotted in the docks for want of a cargo, when our flag was not—and it is not now—seen in the commercial ports of the world, when our cotton sold in New York from 4 to 9 cents a pound, and now from 7 to 13, when our wheat sold in New York from 75 to 100 cents per bushel, and little better now. The present time, I suppose, is one of the gentleman's periods of "marvelous prosperity," when the farmer, mechanic, laborer, and all kinds of occupations and professions are taxed in order to get cheap farming implements, clothing, and other necessaries of life. During the last year nearly $2,000,000 worth of agricultural implements were exported from this to foreign countries, coming in competition with what protectionists call the cheap wood and iron of other countries, and yet the farmer at home must be taxed on the wood and iron that are used in the manufacture of his wagon, his plow, hoe, and rake, and on the bolts, screws, and nails, and everything else he uses. And he as well as his neighbors of every other calling must be taxed on every article of clothing used by himself, wife, and children, and all this not for the benefit of the government under which he lives, but to protect manufacturers, holders of stocks in trusts, combinations, and other moneyed associations, that they may live in luxurious ease at home, and "clothed in purple and fine linen" may display the magnificence of their wealth abroad.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I prefer to see a return of another one of those periods which the gentleman denominates, "eras of depression and disaster," when we will have a tariff for revenue only, when cotton will sell as it sold in 1835, from 15 to 20 cents per pound—11 to 14 in 1850, and 13 to 15 in 1857—when wheat will sell, as it did in 1836, from $1.37 to $2.12, in 1850 from $1.09 to $1.50, and in 1855 from $1.96 to $2.80. These were years of depression, according to the gentleman, as low tariffs then existed. What would the farmers that grew cotton and wheat in those days say? And what will the farmers of to-day, whose products are sold in the gambling houses of the great cities in the form of futures at nominal prices months before they are gathered, say?

Mr. Chairman, no fact is better known to the people of this country than the fact that the prices of our products are determined by the prices of such products in foreign markets. If cotton declines a half penny in Liverpool it goes down 1 cent in New York as quickly as the electric flash can convey the news. So also with all our farm products. No one has ever heard a protectionist object to foreign dealers fixing the prices of the products of the farm, ranche, or dairy; but when it is proposed to add a tariff for revenue only to the price of foreign manufactures, such as clothing and other necessaries, consternation is at once produced in protection camps, and the cry is raised that our home industries will be destroyed.

They want a wall of protection as high and as thick as the walls that surrounded ancient Babylon to keep out "the pauper and demoralized labor of the Old World" and the manufactured product of that labor from this country, yet they want a gateway left open broad enough and high enough for the farm products of the country to pass out to the markets of the world, to compete with the products of the hungry and half-clad labor of Egypt, Australia, and India. But when the manufacturers of wood, iron, wool, cotton, or any foreign commodity is sought to be brought to this country in exchange for our exports this gateway is closed by protectionists who tell us that such manufactures can not enter, because they are the products of the "pauper and demoralized labor of the Old World!" Such is the philosophy of the protectionists.

Mr. Chairman, as my time is about to expire, I only wish to mention another fact or two which, in my opinion, have much to do with the discontent that exists throughout the country. I refer to our financial policy and to our banking system. While I have no time to enter into details, I will state that on the 31st of October last there were two hundred and twenty depositories, all of which, I believe, are national banks, in which there were deposited something over $31,000,000 of Government funds. It is true that this money is secured by the deposit of the bonds of the Government with the Treasurer, and is perfectly safe as far as the Government is concerned. But the fact to which I desire to call your attention is that these banks, which are organized for private purposes, that is, for the benefit of the stockholders, are by law made the financial agents of the Government, and in this way become the managers and directors of the finances of the Government.

The large capital owned and controlled by these banks, supplemented by this immense sum of Government money, practically places the finances of the country in their hands, and enables them to regulate and control the amount of the circulation which enters into the trade and business of the country. In these days of combines and trusts it is not unreasonable to suppose that the banks, like all other moneyed organizations and powers, co-operate for the purpose of securing for themselves the largest possible profits. In fact, we know that the representatives of these institutions meet annually at Saratoga for the purpose of outlining their future policy and of suggesting such legislation as will insure a continuance of their mastery over the finances of the country.

Mr. Chairman, the policy of the banks in withdrawing their circulation, coupled with the heavy drains daily made upon the country through high-tariff taxation, came nigh producing another great panic a short time ago. The fact is, sir, we were on the verge of another crisis, to avoid which the Government was forced into the market of the country to buy unmatured bonds at high premiums. This policy gave temporary relief, by turning into the channels of trade a portion of our surplus and thereby preventing what seemed to be the deliberate purpose of some of forcing a crisis. Unless some remedial legislation is adopted there is nothing to prevent a recurrence of the past. The Comptroller of the Currency, in his last annual report, shows that on October 31, 1883, there were national-bank notes outstanding, less the amount secured by a deposit of lawful money, in round numbers, $316,020,000.

On the 31st of October, 1887, national-bank notes outstanding, less the amount secured by a deposit of lawful money, amounted to $169,215,000; showing a decrease in the amount of their circulation during the four years of $146,785,000, notwithstanding the fact that within the same period of time over seven hundred new banks were organized. Fifty million dollars of the sum before named was withdrawn from circulation during the last year of the period named. Under the acts of 1874 and 1882 national banks may continue to withdraw their circulation by a deposit of lawful money, and at the same time withdraw their bonds deposited to secure their circulation and speculate on them in the market, where they now sell at $126.50 for every $100.

The disposition of our people to organize new national banks in all of our prosperous towns and cities in the South and West tends to enhance their value by creating a demand for these bonds, which are held almost exclusively by capitalists and rich bankers in the money centers, who can place whatever price thereon they see proper. While large banks are withdrawing their bonds from deposit, which secures their circulation by depositing lawful money, dollar for dollar, to pay off their outstanding notes, they sell the bonds thus withdrawn to the organizers of new banks at $126.50 for every $100, thus speculating on the organizers of new banks as well as the Government, which must also pay their prices.

It must be evident to every one that the present price of 4 per cent. bonds is merely speculative. These bonds do not mature until 1907, and are therefore generally used by national banks to secure their circulation. While these bonds only draw 4 per cent. per annum they are now worth in the market 126½, while the 4½ per cent. bonds, which mature in 1891, only command 106½ in the market. It is apparent, therefore, that it is not the matter of interest the bonds draw that affects the price of bonds, but the time they have to run. The 4½ bonds can be called in at maturity three years hence, and therefore the opportunities for speculation are not afforded as in the case of 4 per cent. bonds, which have nineteen years to run.

The Comptroller of the Currency further shows that the national banks now in existence, if they held only the minimum of bonds, can reduce the bank circulation to (round numbers) $80,921,000, while the maximum of circulation can be increased to $520,616,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, such a power as this should never be left in the hands of the banks. They ought not to have the ability to increase or diminish the volume of currency at their will and pleasure.

As long as this is the case we may expect financial depressions and panics. Take this power away by proper legislation, furnish a sufficient amount of gold and silver, and paper based on the precious metals to supply the demands of business and trade, strike down protection, pass the pending bill, which is a tariff measure for revenue only and which will save to the farmers and laborers of this country $78,000,000 annually, and then peace, happiness, and prosperity will bless our entire country. [Applause.]

Mr. JACKSON obtained the floor and said: Mr. Chairman, I yield a portion of my time to my colleague [Mr. DARLINGTON].

Mr. DARLINGTON. Mr. Chairman, the statement has been made on both sides of this Chamber that the tariff is a business question. If a business question, it should be treated as such—that is, in accordance with the rules which govern in corporations, large or small. The stockholders manage a corporation in proportion to the number of shares held by each. Applying this principle, let us see how the present tariff bill originated.

The Ninth district of Texas, the Second district of Arkansas, the Fourth district of Tennessee, and the Second district of Georgia are represented on the Committee of Ways and Means, the committee that originated this bill. According to the census report for 1880, the manufacturing and agricultural products for the year 1879 in these four Congressional districts were $33,209,333. The Sixth district of Pennsylvania, which I have the honor to represent on this floor, according to the same census report, produced for the same year manufacturing and agricultural products amounting to $38,514,217.

Mr. HERBERT. Does the gentleman think that the districts he mentions as being deficient in manufacturing interests have therefore no right to say anything as to the amount of taxes they shall pay?

Mr. DARLINGTON. Oh, no; not at all. I merely want to show that I have larger interests to represent so far as manufactures are concerned.

Let us apply the test to wages. The four Congressional districts paid out during 1879 $576,539. The wages paid during the same year in the Sixth Congressional district of Pennsylvania were $5,589,188.

The number of hands employed in manufacturing in those four districts was 3,697. The number employed in the Sixth district was 16,103.

Judging, then, by the tests of production, wages, and the number of hands employed, the Congressional district I represent should have five times the weight in framing a tariff it now has; in other words, the great interests at stake have not adequate protection, so far as representation is concerned, by votes or speeches. The four Congressional districts having less production, less men employed, and paying out less wages, are able to destroy by legislation the industries in another district. Will they do it, or, rather, should they?

Living in sections which produce comparatively nothing, while they are very excellent gentlemen, good lawyers, and shrewd politicians, they are hardly the best qualified to legislate upon subjects in which they have had no practical experience and in which their districts have very little interest.

Much fault is found with the New England and Middle States for building railroads in the West, and for holding mortgages on farms in the same section. This kind of talk does not properly belong to the discussion of a tariff question. The indebtedness is incurred by the parties interested, is a voluntary transaction on both sides, and needs no consideration whatever on the floor of this House.

If Western and Southern people do not want railroads or do not want to mortgage their farms the remedy is in their own hands. I would mildly suggest less politics and more business, more industry and more thrift would soon obviate the necessity of borrowing so much money of Eastern capitalists.

Establish manufactories, have diversified industries, a home market for the farmer's products, and soon there will be a surplus of capital in every section of our country. The West and South have natural advantages over the East and North, but no nation can grow rich by agriculture alone. Farmers to prosper must live contiguous to large cities, and these will not grow unless manufactures are fostered.

I am here to legislate for the whole country, but especially to look after the interests of my own people. Now, if protection is withdrawn, even to a partial extent, its effects will be felt immediately. The 16,000 men engaged in manufacturing in the Sixth district will either be thrown out of employment or their wages will be reduced. If they quit the business with which they are acquainted, what would you do with them? The farmers of Chester and Delaware Counties do not need their services; you do not need them in the West or South for agriculture; why disturb their present prosperous condition? If they leave their present location the farmers lose their home market, and there is stagnation in every industry, and who will be benefited? The foreign manufacturer perhaps, but I am not here to legislate for Europe, Asia, or Africa, but for America. I would build an industrial wall around this country so high that not an article should come into it that could be profitably produced here, trusting to competition to place prices of manufactured goods on an equitable basis.

The protective policy has been in force in this country since 1842, with a few exceptions, and its results have been marvelous. It was so successful in my section that when the Democratic party nominated James K. Polk for President in 1844, on a free-trade platform, it was necessary to inscribe on its banners "Polk, Dallas, and the tariff of '42," to carry Pennsylvania.

The history of the protective policy from that time to this has been so often given on this floor that I shall not detain you with an account of its triumphs.

It is said the manufacturer has grown too rich. I deny it. I have had some experience with that class. Taking everything into account, they have not received more than an adequate recompense for the risks involved.

William Penn, with his frugal and thrifty Quakers, coming from the farming districts of England, first landed at the city of Chester, now a flourishing town in the southern portion of my district. After purchasing the land from the Indians they and their descendants gradually spread over the hills and valleys of Chester and Delaware Counties, and by honest toil and economy for two hundred years, mainly by farming, have acquired a surplus, and to-day they are the people who furnish the money to invest in Western mortgages, county, city, and township loans.

Mr. HERBERT. Does the gentleman say that the money so invested is the money of the farmers?

Mr. DARLINGTON. Of the farmers alone. The manufacturers need all the capital they possess to keep in motion their enterprises. It is the farmers of the East, not the manufacturers, who are furnishing the West with capital.

Mr. HERBERT. Does the gentleman mean to say that the industries of his district are altogether agricultural industries?

Mr. DARLINGTON. No, sir; the industries of my district are both farming and manufacturing. We produce from twenty-five to thirty million dollars' worth of manufactured products annually.

The constant parade on this floor of the indebtedness of the West to the East is both silly and unbusinesslike. If you alarm the Eastern investors, you cut off the supply of capital that is necessary to the opening up of a new country, and then you are at the mercy of the Western banker. I trust for your own interests, this part of your assertions, calculated to inflame one section against another, will cease. Without credit Western lands are comparatively valueless to the poor man. In order to carry out your mad schemes of free trade in this country you are ready to rob him, first of his credit, then of the fruits of his labor, reducing him to a level with the peasantry of France, Russia, Germany, and Ireland.

A widow of a missionary to India, returning to her native land, on the death of her husband, informed me that her three servants, on bended knee, begged her to take them with her to America. The wages she had paid them for years were 3 cents per day. Destroy the protective policy, and then as a necessary consequence these cheap laborers must be obtained or our manufacturing interests will be destroyed.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman tell us whether the lady he speaks of was cruel enough to leave those servants behind her in India?

Mr. DARLINGTON. She was a missionary's widow, with five children, and probably without means of paying the passage of those servants; so if she was unwilling to undertake to bring them to this country it is not to be wondered at. But other persons of larger means will bring people of that class here if we open the doors.

Labor in this country is at present organized and asserting its rights; but what would organization effect against labor in India at 3 cents a day?

May the day be far distant when American laborers will have no other aspirations than a bare competency! The education of their children, the prospect of a home of their own, all these crushed out, and that, too, under the name of Democracy.

Less than a third of a century ago the dominant section of the Democratic party conceived the bold idea of extending the dominion of slavery over the fertile Territories of the West. To succeed in that enterprise it was necessary to have an intimation from the Supreme Court of the United States to aid them in their work. A Chief-Justice traveled out of his way to declare that a black man had no rights which a white man was bound to respect. This opinion shocked the civilized world, and brought upon this country the wrath of Almighty God.

Mr. HERBERT. Does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania know that Chief-Justice Taney never said anything of that sort?

Mr. DARLINGTON. No, sir; I do not know it.

Mr. HERBERT. I say he did not. There is nothing of that kind in the Dred-Scott decision.

Mr. DARLINGTON. The history of the country will show whether my statement is correct. I am trespassing on the time of my colleague [Mr. JACKSON], and I must hurry on.

To establish the idea of slavery as a permanent institution on this continent, the Southern people fought with unparalleled bravery, and for four years held in check the mighty armies of the Republic. Their devotion to their ideas and their personal bravery and self-sacrifice must, and did, command our admiration; but they failed. Their dream of a landed aristocracy and a roll-call of slaves has been dispelled. Slavery is gone forever; but in its place they would establish another aristocracy, composed of land-owners and manufacturers, with poorly-paid labor and a half-starving peasantry, if protection is discarded and labor placed on an equality throughout the world.

Less then one month ago two-thirds of this House favored a bill to equalize taxation by returning the taxes paid by a portion of the States, releasing the remainder from all claims the Government had upon them—a just and equitable bill.

Forth stepped a Democrat from the South, and cried "Halt!" Immediately filibustering began; a caucus was held; the Democratic party became solid; the dead-lock was broken.

A Democratic caucus, at some stage of the tariff proceedings, may say the Mills bill must go through, and the Northern Democracy, pliable as it has always been, may bow the knee, and there will be rejoicing—outside of America, throughout the world. The Cobden Club will have a banquet; foreign articles will be thrown into our markets; for the time-being goods may be cheaper. When our manufactures are destroyed prices will advance, and then we will again return to the idea of protection.

The country awaits with anxiety the verdict of the House on the Mills tariff bill. [Loud applause.]

[Mr. JACKSON withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

[Mr. OWEN withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. NELSON, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation tot he collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CHEADLE. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Pensions yesterday submitted a number of adverse reports, among them a bill (H. R. 3544) granting a pension to Joseph W. McConnell. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think that that is hardly in order now, the session this evening being for debate only; but the gentleman will be recognized to make the request to-morrow.

Mr. KILGORE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) adjourned until 10 a. m. to-morrow.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

Under the rule private bills of the following titles were introduced and referred as indicated below:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 16, 1888.

Prayer by Rev. J. E. RANKIN, D. D., of Orange, N. J.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of January 17, 1888, certain information relative to railroad grants to the State of Kansas by acts of Congress of March 3, 1863, and July 26, 1866. This communication is accompanied by a large number of exhibits, including maps, and perhaps it had better be referred to the Committee on Printing for examination before further action is taken. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of L. P. Wilson and others, citizens of the United States, remonstrating against the convict-labor system of the States; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Kansas, praying for legislation providing protection for game in the Yellowstone National Park; which was ordered to lie on the table..

Mr. VEST presented a memorial of the Butchers' National Protective Association, remonstrating against the passage of the Palmer bill for the extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia among cattle; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BLODGETT presented the petition of H. E. Bowles and 26 other citizens of New Jersey, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PALMER presented the petition of John A. Neville and 21 other surviving Union soldiers and sailors, citizens of Charlevoix and vicinity, in the State of Michigan, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Detroit, Mich., signed by J. C. McDonald, president, and George M. Lane, secretary, praying for the passage of the bill providing for the construction of a winter bridge across the Detroit River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VOORHEES presented two petitions of ex-Union soldiers and sailors, citizens of Indiana, praying for the passage of the per diem rated service-pension bill; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New Jersey and Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of Senate bill 283, providing for the better protection of the Yellowstone National Park; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. QUAY presented the petition of Chenango Grange, No. 221, Patrons of Husbandry, of Chenango, Pa., and the petition of George T. Mackey and 28 other citizens of Lathrop, Susquehanna County, Pennsylvania, praying that the work of the eradication of pleuro-pneumonia shall be continued under the Bureau of Animal Industry as at present organized, etc.; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Rev. W. H. E. Platt, of Carbondale, Pa., praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of physicians and druggists, citizens of Sewickley, Pa.; and a petition of physicians and druggists, citizens of Great Bend, Pa., praying for the repeal of the law classifying druggists as liquor-dealers, etc.; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DOLPH presented a petition of the representatives of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Oregon, praying that an appropriation be made for headstones to mark the graves of Union soldiers; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. EVARTS presented a petition of the Produce Exchange of New York City, praying for the purchase of a certain site for the use of the new custom-house building in that city; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7222) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish agricultural stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto," reported it without amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2882) to pay Aaron Friedheim the rebate due him under the act of March 3, 1883; and

A bill (S. 2883) for the relief of S. H. Pearce.

Mr. EVARTS. A petition of Hiram Berdan, praying that an appropriation be made for the erection of a monument at Gettysburgh, was presented by my colleague [Mr. HISCOCK] on the 7th of May, and referred to the Committee on the Library. I am instructed by that committee to report it back and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The report was agreed to.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report a resolution, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. By the rule it has to go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations (Miscellaneous Document No. 109, first session Fiftieth Congress), being the report relating to the fisheries treaty, be printed for the use of the Senate in connection with the message of the President, dated February 20, 1888, and the proposed treaty with Great Britain, and the map of the fishing limits prepared at the Hydrographic Office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the resolution is referred, there is in it a verbal inaccuracy, or rather an omission that ought to be supplied. The understanding was that, of course, the views of the minority would be printed with the report, as I supposed.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, the views of the minority were to be printed with the report proper.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was the intention.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the resolution ought to be amended by saying "together with the views of the minority." We do not want to send out half of a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the resolution so as to read:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations (Miscellaneous Document No. 109, first session Fiftieth Congress), being the report relating to the fisheries treaty, together with the views of the minority, be printed for the use of the Senate, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred under the rule to the Committee on Printing.

ALLOTMENT OF LANDS IN SEVERALTY TO INDIANS.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] May 3, 1888, to report it favorably without amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed in document form 1,000 copies of the act of February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 2956) for the relief of Samuel T. Dunlap; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SPOONER introduced a bill (S. 2957) granting a pension to Maryeta McGuire, widow of Francis McGuire; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2958) granting a pension to Francis M. Spears; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 2959) authorizing the President to appoint and retire James Weir Graydon, of Indianapolis, Ind., with the rank and grade of lieutenant in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2960) granting a pension to John Speace, late a private in Company K, Thirteenth Regiment of Kentucky Cavalry; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 2961) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary A. Black; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PADDOCK introduced a bill (S. 2962) for the relief of George L. Turner; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2963) for the relief of William H. Harlow; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CHANDLER introduced a bill (S. 2964) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to issue to all enlisted men discharged from the United States Navy a certificate of honorable service, where the original discharge has been lost or destroyed; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 2965) for the relief of certain settlers in the Wind River Valley, Wyoming Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 2966) for the relief of William Henry Brown; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, fixing the salary of the Commissioner of the General Land Office at $5,000 per annum; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRYE, Mr. BUTLER, and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him as a substitute for the bill (S. 2919) to define the routes of steam railroads in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed

GENERAL APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That paragraph 3 of Rule XVI be amended by adding thereto the following:

"Whenever any general appropriation bill originating in the House of Representatives shall be under consideration, it shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer to cause to be stricken out of such bill all provisions therein of a general legislative character other than such as relate to the disposition of the moneys appropriated therein; but such order of the Presiding Officer shall be subject to an appeal to the Senate as in other cases of questions of order."

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON POST-OFFICES AND POST-ROADS.

Mr. SAWYER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is hereby authorized to employ a stenographer to report proceedings before said committee regarding House bill No. 4910.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 109) to refund to Dr. F. O. Saint Clair $97.80, duties on a monument to the memory of Francis J. Townshend, late of the United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. 2088) for the relief of W. S. Carpenter;

A bill (H. R. 4775) for the relief of Abbie Sharp, formerly Abbie Gardner;

A bill (H. R. 5092) for the relief of Charles L. Bradwell;

A bill (H. R. 6491) for the relief of Lowman & Co.;

A bill (H. R. 7618) for the relief of the Shepard & Morse Lumber Company of Burlington, Vt.; and

A bill (H. R. 8391) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in Grant County, Indiana, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1204) to provide for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States at Martinsburgh, in the district of West Virginia.

THE MEAT PRODUCT.

Mr. VEST. I desire to call up the resolution I offered day before yesterday. I intended to call it up yesterday, but on the request of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. FARWELL], I let it lie over until to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. VEST, May 14, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators shall be appointed by the President of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to examine fully all questions touching the meat product of the United States, and especially as to the transportation of beef and beef cattle, and the sale of the same in the cattle markets, stock-yards, and cities, and whether there exists or has existed any combination of any kind by reason of which the price of beef and beef cattle have been so controlled or affected as to diminish the prices paid the producer without lessening the cost of meat to the consumer; that said committee may hold its sessions during the recess of the Senate at such times and places as it may determine, and shall have power to send for persons and papers, and also to employ a stenographer and a sergeant-at-arms, all the necessary expenses of said committee to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and said committee shall make report to the Senate at its next session by bill or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate if there be no objection; and the question is on agreeing to it.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I shall make no apology for saying a very few words in regard to this resolution.

It is not intended to create any junketing committee or to invade the province of any standing or regular committee of the Senate. If it concerned only the question of the transportation of beef and beef cattle I should have asked its reference to the Committee on Interstate Commerce or the Committee on Commerce generally, but the intention of the resolution is to reach beyond the subject of transportation.

This question of the meat product of the United States is by no means local or sectional. It affects every portion of the country and almost every individual. It is not a question of the sustenance of human or physical life only; it is a question of vitality, of enterprise, of civilization, of empire. The history of the whole world shows that the beef-eating peoples of the world are foremost in peace and war, in art and science. That has been the history of our race, and will be to the end of recorded time.

It is a singular fact, sir, how strikingly this truth is illustrated in statistics as well as in general and national results. I have before me a table accurately prepared and adopted by the highest authority in England and the United States in regard to the consumption of beef in 1884 in all the leading countries of the world.

In Great Britain the average consumption of each individual was 105 pounds per annum; in France 74 pounds; in Germany 69 pounds; in Russia 48 pounds; in Italy 23 pounds; in Austria 64 pounds; in Spain 49 pounds; in Scandinavia 67 pounds; and in the United States 120 pounds.

In Great Britain the consumption annually was 105 pounds, and in the United States 120 pounds, so that the two great English speaking peoples of the world, the foremost to-day in empire and civilization, Great Britain and the United States, are the largest beef consumers of all the nations upon the face of the earth.

In Great Britain there has been by decades the following increase in the consumption of meat: In 1850 the average consumption to the person per annum was 76 pounds; in 1860, 86 pounds; in 1870, 94 pounds; in 1880, 101 pounds, and in 1884, 105 pounds. And yet, sir, with this increased consumption abroad amongst the people with whom we have the closest commercial intercourse, and with the additional fact that during the last terrible winter 500,000 head of cattle perished in the Territory of Montana alone, the price of beef paid the producer is steadily declining in the market.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator means wholesale, not retail.

Mr. VEST. I mean, of course, wholesale; I will come to retail in a moment. I am glad the Senator suggested it, because that is a portion of this remarkable exhibit. It is the fact that whilst the price has decreased to the producer of beef it has increased to the consumer, and this wonderful state of affairs exists and has existed ever since 1872. The purpose of my resolution is to find why this is so, why beef and cattle constitute an exception to the general rule of supply and demand and all commercial rules.

Mr. CULLOM. I believe the Senator's resolution is up for consideration and is the subject of the discussion on the part of the Senator.

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to suggest an amendment to his resolution, after which I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. VEST. Certainly. Let the proposed amendment be read.

Mr. CULLOM. I will send to the desk the proposed amendment, to come in where I have marked.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I appreciate the importance of this resolution, but I think it ought to take the course of all resolutions of this kind proposing to create new committees, involving considerable expense and having a very broad jurisdiction, and which is to continue during the recess of the Senate. Therefore I ask the Senator from Missouri who offered it to refer it to any appropriate committee, I do not care what committee. There are several committees that may be named as having charge of this subject.

Mr. VEST. I am perfectly willing to discuss the disposition of the resolution after I have made a few remarks upon it. I yielded to allow the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought the Senator was through; I beg pardon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment of the Senator from Illinois will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6, after the word "kind," insert the words:

Either on the part of the Trunk Line Association, or the Central Traffic Association, or on the part of those engaged in buying and shipping meat products.

So as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators shall be appointed by the President of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to examine fully all questions touching the meat product of the United States; and especially as to the transportation of beef and beef cattle, and the sale of the same in the cattle markets, stock-yards, and cities; and whether there exists or has existed any combination of any kind, either on the part of the Trunk Line Association, or the Central Traffic Association, or on the part of those engaged in buying and shipping meat products, by reason of which the prices of beef and beef cattle have been so controlled or affected as to diminish the price paid the producer without lessening the cost of meat to the consumer. That said committee may hold its sessions during the recess of the Senate, at such times and places as it may determine, and shall have power to send for persons and papers, and also to employ a stenographer and a sergeant-at-arms; all necessary expenses of said committee to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and said committee shall make report to the Senate at its next session by bill or otherwise.

Mr. VEST. I have not the slighest objection to that amendment. My object in offering the resolution was to make it as comprehensive as possible. I am anxious, and honestly so, to ascertain what is the cause of the anomalous condition of affairs in regard to this interest in the United States.

It is very natural, aside from the fact that I am an American Senator, that I should be anxious in regard to this question. The State of Missouri is one of the largest cattle-producing States in the Union, and I say here now to-day, as a matter of personal observation and knowledge, that the cattle interest of the West, of the State in which I live, has been stricken down and is prostrate to-day.

The cattle-growers of the great West seem to be dazed, they seem to be dumbfounded by the present condition of things. They hold conventions and meetings, but they can not ascertain why it is that with an increased population and a decreased amount of beef cattle being produced, the price still goes down in the market to the producer, but does not go down one single cent to the consumer.

Mr. President, a few years ago the cattle interest was one of the most prosperous in the United States. Millions and millions of dollars were taken from the Eastern States and invested in the ranges of the great West.

I hold in my hand an absolutely and positively correct report of the sales in the Chicago market, the greatest cattle market in the world, showing how the price of cattle has gone down steadily to the producer notwithstanding the fact that there was an immense decrease in the number of cattle, notwithstanding the fact, which goes without saying, that the population of the country is increasing in a ratio hitherto unknown in the history of nations.

This report, which I hold in my hand, is taken from sales made in the stock-yards in Chicago in the year 1887. Take the State of Kansas, which heads the list. The weight of cattle for Kansas was 1,300 pounds per head; price per hundred $4.65; gross value of the 1,300 class of cattle at $4.65, $60.45. Charges: Railroad freight, $4 a head; yard charges, 25 cents; feed charges, 25 cents; commission, 50 cents; making $5; the net value, then, of Kansas cattle being $55.45. Of course these were fed cattle and not from the ranges.

This is a very interesting exhibit, Mr. President. It shows that we are the greatest cattle-producing people in the world, and it shows at the same time, as I shall further on demonstrate mathematically, it seems to me, that nothing but artificial oppression has brought the calamitous state of things that now exists upon the whole country in regard to this interest.

Here is Nebraska. The weight of cattle averages 1,200 pounds for 1887 sold in Chicago. Price per 100, $4.65; gross value, 1,300 at $4.65, $55.80; charges, without specifying particularly in the aggregate, $5; net value in Chicago, $50.80.

Minnesota: Weight, 1,100 pounds; price per hundred, $4.40. Gross value, 1,100 pounds at $4.40, $48.40. Taking off the charges the net cash value was $43.40.

In Dakota the weight was 1,150 pounds; price per hundred, $2.85; gross value, 1,300 pounds at $2.85, $32.77. Taking off the charges, which I will not read, the net value at Chicago to the producer was $27.05.

Now I come to ranch cattle, and this represents by far the greatest interest, the cattle that come from the vast plains of the West, and upon which we must rely eventually for the food product of this country, so far as meat is concerned. Of course there never will be a time in which the cattle from my own State of Missouri, from Iowa, Kentucky, and Tennessee, saying nothing of the production of the cattle in Eastern States, will not be in the market, but it is upon the range cattle that we must depend to the very largest extent for the meat product of the entire country.

In Colorado, the weight at Chicago was 1,050 pounds; the price per hundred in Chicago, $2.65; the gross value, 1,050 pounds at $2.65, $27.82; charges, $5.60; leaving net value to the producer, $22.22.

Now, take the case of a Colorado cattle-raiser who has paid from $15 to $18 for his cattle and kept them upon his range for three years. What is his profit at Chicago? It is the difference between, say, $16 or $17 and $22, so that he gets for his three years' grazing, herding, and attention the paltry sum of $4 or $5 as his net profit.

Mr. MANDERSON. I found it difficult to hear the Senator in the first part of his remarks. Are the figures that he is giving to the Senate the average for the year 1887 as to weight of cattle of the different States, and the average of price?

Mr. VEST. Yes; taken from the report of the stock-yards and the sales. Take, now, the Territory of Wyoming. The weight at Chicago per head was 1,100 pounds. The price at Chicago per hundred, $2.75. The gross value at that price was $30.25. Charges, $5.85, leaving for each steer, $24.40 to the producer, and if they cost him $15 or $18 a head the difference between that and $24 was paid him for two or three years' grazing and herding and attention in order to get them to market, to say nothing of a per cent. on the investment.

No interest in this country has suffered to this extent, Mr. President. Nothing in the whole range of American production has been butchered (and it is an apt word in regard to cattle) like the cattle interest of the United States since 1873.

Take Montana, which produces the best range cattle in the United States. The weight at Chicago is 1,150 pounds. Price per hundred, $2.85. Gross value, $32.77. Net value, deducting charges, $24.62.

Take Iowa, and without tiring myself or the Senate by reading the specifications, I will state that the Iowa cattle average per head $40.20, the Missouri cattle average $40.20, and the Illinois cattle average $44.06⅔. I will simply publish this table in the RECORD without wearying myself by reading the specifications:

Now, Mr. President, what is the cause of this decline? I have alluded to the increase in population; I have alluded to the decrease in the number of cattle. It is not overproduction. There must be some artificial reason for this terrible loss in the cattle interest of the United States, and that is the principal point to which I propose to direct my remarks and the attention of the committee which I have asked may be created under this resolution.

In a recent convention of the cattle-growers of the United States, held at Kansas City, my place of residence, a paper was read by a very accurate cattle-grower, a man of education, whose life has been largely devoted to it, in which he used the remarks which I shall make no apology for reading.

I will say, however, in a prefatory sort of way, that a great many of the newspapers of the United States have undertaken to ascribe the great decline in the prices of cattle to the producer, with the extraordinary fact that the price has not declined to the consumer, to the oleomargarine law.

I opposed that bill with all my ability. I have never seen any reason to change my opinion in regard to it. I will say here to-day, although it may be considered unnecessary, that I regard it as the most monstrous piece of legislation that ever passed the American Congress. It was unconstitutional; it was ill-advised; it has done no good in my judgment, and it has done a great deal of harm. The oleomargarine law, however, according to the estimates of the cattle-growers, and of this gentleman whose paper I hold in my hand, only puts the loss on beef cattle at $3 a head. That does not account for this decline. It has gone on steadily since 1873.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator ought to state in that connection, to be entirely fair, that there has been no reduction in the price of cattle since the passage of the oleomargarine law.

Mr. VEST. I know there has not been.

Mr. PLUMB. So that may be eliminated entirely from the consideration of this question of the decline in price.

Mr. VEST. I am firmly of that opinion. I do not think the oleomargarine law created this extraordinary state of things, but I allude to the assertion because it has been current throughout the country and has been made in the conventions of cattle-growers. However much I was opposed to that bill, and I never could be more opposed to any piece of legislation than I was to that, I do not think it has produced the extraordinary state of things which I am now discussing. But I proceed to read from this paper.

Some careless thinkers—

Said this gentleman—

Some careless thinkers attribute the troubles of the stockman in the near-by Western States to the rise in land values, but those who use the cheap or nearly free lands of the West are apparently as much distressed as those occupying the higher-priced land east of the Missouri River. What, then, is the cause of distress? Better breeds and better methods of feeding and sheltering have come into use; blue-grass pastures and large crops of corn which had no existence fifty years ago, and which were not very abundant even thirty years ago, are not yielding the profits to the trade which native cattle and wild grass formerly yielded.

There were and still are producers in the States named whose first purchase of land was a single quarter-section, to which they added many thousands of acres, all paid for from profits in growing and marketing cattle under the practice of primitive methods, who can not now, with the many modern appliances, transportation included, show any profits in the trade. It seems clear that producers have neglected some essential duty, or left out some important factor once regarded, and that they have allowed some element of cost that had no existence in the early stages to come in unchallenged, and that it has long since grown into proportions which they do not appreciate and which they can not control or eliminate.

First, as to neglect, it has been in regard to transportation; naturally and not at all as being in any way indicative of lack of intelligence, the early stock-grower paid no attention to it. There was no reason why he should, as the cattle could only be taken to market on foot. His energy and intelligence was fully occupied in other directions, the selection of breeds, looking for the best locations, and many other details of management and process. Secondly, and perhaps of most importance of all, the producer has allowed a large item of expense to come in in the marketing. Neglecting to give this his personal attention, he has allowed a class of buyers and those performing various kinds of services to come in between him and the consumer.

We do not deny the right of any man to buy cattle or anything else that he can pay for; we do not indulge in any nonsense of this kind. We are simply stating what has occurred and its effect upon the producer. It seems strange that the half million or more growers of cattle should have let things drift into the prevailing condition which now rules; that is, the allowing of a limited number of buyers to buy so large a portion of the whole production and so nearly all of it in one market. There is not a single staple product of the country which if brought under the same conditions—that is, bought by as few as now buy the largest portion of the cattle—that would not be depressed in price, and that unnaturally, as cattle now are.

The result during fifteen years past has been the transfer of the privilege of allowing a very limited number of buyers to arrange for the transportation of cattle from the largest shipping points in the West to the interior, Eastern, and seaboard markets. The growers have, for the period mentioned, virtually abandoned the ample facilities of our great railroad system and have had no benefit from any of the competition that existed between the various lines. They may at times have had a slight incidental benefit by or from any competition that existed between buyers, but there has been next to nothing of this. The party of buyers is so small that each can get all they can handle without indulging in any competitive strife.

Apparently these are the reasons for the unnaturally low price of cattle; nor is there any other apparent or real reason for the steady and unprecedented decline. We think this opinion will bear investigation without disclosing any other predominating cause. So far as cattle-growers are concerned, and for some time past, the railroads might as well never have been constructed. Not that competition has not largely prevailed; it has been excessive at times, and for periods of considerable duration, but its benefits have rarely reached the producer. It has been mainly confined to the roads and a very limited number of buyers and shippers.

There are causes for the concentration of purchase of so large a proportion of the production by a limited number of buyers that will not at this time be alluded to; that is, unless it becomes necessary to demonstrate the soundness of the opinion as expressed. Should this exigency arise, then it will be shown that the producers, or at least the majority of them, were absolutely powerless after a certain period to defend themselves. We do not wish to make it appear that the producers are entirely responsible for all the misfortunes that have befallen the trade. A few may have been, but the masses were not.

Now, Mr. President, I have wearied myself and possibly the Senate in reading this extract in order to read the latter portion of it. The gentleman who delivered this address, without entering into particulars, intimates that there has been some sort of combination, some sort of conspiracy, which has brought about the condition of things as to the production and sale of cattle in the United States.

I dislike, in the discussion of a great question like this, for it is a great question, to say anything that has the least appearance of a local interest, but I am compelled to allude to the fact that the largest city in my State, the city of St. Louis, which ought geographically to have been at least the equal of Chicago in the sale and purchase and shipment of cattle, is to-day so far behind Chicago and inferior to it in this matter of purchasing and shipping cattle that a comparison is hardly worthy of being instituted between the two cities. St. Louis is the great city of the Mississippi Valley, and geographically it ought to be the shipping point for Texas, the Indian Territory, and the large ranges of the Southwest, but for some reason which I propose now to investigate the cattle interest of St. Louis has been stricken down.

The city in which I live, Kansas City, is to-day in close alliance, so far as the cattle interest is concerned, with Chicago; but Chicago is the heart, blood, brain, liver of the cattle trade throughout this country and throughout the world. It is the largest cattle market in the world. As great as that city is, and no one admires its prosperity, enterprise, and activity more than myself, it has not been natural reasons that have brought this about. It has been a combination, a selfish combination of interests, as a matter of trade and commerce, which now that it has affected the price of cattle to the consumer becomes a matter of the greatest importance to every man who thinks it his duty as an American citizen or legislator to investigate the present condition of affairs.

This gentleman in this paper alludes indistinctly to such a combination; he charges that it has existed, and we know that to-day five firms in the city of Chicago control the price of beef throughout the whole United States. There is not a butcher in the city of Washington who is not subservient to that combination in Chicago; not one from Boston to Charleston but who feels the effect of this combination. The great railroads of the country running into Chicago are in the interest of this combination. They are in sympathy with these five firms, and to-day every bunch of cattle that goes from any portion of the West, and all go to Chicago, the moment they are shipped these gentlemen at Chicago are apprised of the quality, the number, when they will arrive, and are prepared with a price. The prices are fixed every week. I said on a former occasion every day, but they are fixed practically so that every morning the price is agreed upon between the purchasers; and the shippers who bring cattle to that market must take those prices or let the cattle die, or ship them back to the places from which they were brought.

What was stated indistinctly in this paper I now proceed to make plain. I am responsible for it. I will prove it if this committee is created. I will prove the charges, which I now make, that this combination between the purchasers in Chicago and the great railroads of the country has brought about a phenomenal condition of things that with the smaller supply of cattle the price does not go up to the producer, but still goes up to the butchers and to all consumers of the country.

I will not give the names of gentlemen who furnish me this information. I am responsible for it, and I will prove it.

From about 1859 until 1873 there had been at times great fluctuations in the rates of freight on live-stock from Chicago to New York. In the last-mentioned year, 1873, an arrangement was made by the managers of the New York Central, the New York and Erie, and the Pennsylvania Railroad (the Baltimore and Ohio protesting and not joining) with a small number, less than one dozen, of cattle shippers at Chicago, who were styled eveners. Under the arrangement made these eveners, as they were called, were to divide and did divide the shipments from Chicago, as had been agreed upon by the several railroads parties to the agreement. When this arrangement took effect rates were restored and reductions from printed published tariffs ceased.

The terms of the agreement were so extraordinary that I do not expect you will believe what I state them to have been unless you call on the reference I have given.

And I have been given the names of several of the most respectable men at that time engaged in railroading in the United States. I will not give their names here.

These terms were as follows, and they were most extraordinary as the Senate will see: The trunk lines mentioned, agreed to refund to the eveners $15 per car on all cattle shipped by all shippers from any point west of Pittsburgh, Salamanca, Dunkirk, and Buffalo. Understand, this payment was made not only on cattle owned, bought, or shipped by the eveners, but by all other shippers; of course the latter under the system began to at once lessen, and soon became extinct, that is, as a body or class.

To give you a fair idea of the enormous advantage these favorites had I will state that assuming that they were shipping one-third of the whole shipments from the West before the arrangement was made, which they were not (they were perhaps shipping more than one-half from Chicago, but probably not more than one-fourth from all points); but assuming that their shipments were one-third, it in reality made their rebate $45 per car on their own shipments.

I regret that I have not at hand the receipts of cattle at New York for the years 1874, 1875, 1876, and 1877, during which this arrangement was in effect, but they are easily attained if you wish to go into the matter, which I do.

They did not vary much from 700,000 head per year; at least they were not less, probably more. Not much of anything of a definite character was known about the eveners' arrangement until the trunk lines began to charge up to the Western roads their pro rata proportion. This was resisted by most of the Western roads, notably among which were the Wabash, Chicago and Alton, and the Illinois Central. No attempt was made to charge any of the roads west of the Mississippi River or west of Chicago, but only to those east of Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Indianapolis, and eastward up to the western termini of the trunk lines.

The roads between Buffalo, Salamanca, and Pittsburgh, in which the trunk lines had a proprietary interest, came in and paid without resistance. The Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Indianapolis resisted for a time, but they and others were forced into compliance under the threat that if they did not pay, that business would be diverted, and it was diverted from St. Louis, Indianapolis, and Cincinnati by the eveners confining their purchases to Chicago.

Please bear in mind that by the time the eveners had enjoyed the $45 per car rebate, only one year, all former regular buyers of any strength had been wiped out. They were as extinct as is the mastodon.

As before stated, the Wabash, Chicago and Alton, and the Illinois Central resisted, but at the cost of persecution and damage by diversion of business from St. Louis. To such an extent was this carried that these three roads did respond for their proportion from November, 1877, for a few months, under a promise from the eveners that they would buy at St. Louis, and thus increase receipts at that place from the West. But St. Louis had been so damaged, that is, as an increasing or growing cattle market, that the eveners could not, at least they did not, fulfill their promise.

The eveners arrangement had become so notoriously scandalous that it died during 1878; but it had done its dreadful work against growers, ordinary buyers, and the city of St. Louis, as the reports of the receipts amply show; and had also, as the receipts show, built up Chicago and made the opportunity for the few packers and shippers of dressed meat. The tables I shall present show the receipts at both cities, the total receipts and shipments of stock for twenty-two years, from 1865 up to 1887 from the city of Chicago; and they show that from the time that arrangement was made in 1873 up to 1878, the shipments of cattle from Chicago marvelously and miraculously increased year by year, whilst the shipments from St. Louis, which had before been very large, just as steadily decreased, until St. Louis ceased to be a rival market with Chicago in regard to the sale and shipment of cattle.

The tables are as follows:

This table is made from the annual statement of the trade and commerce of St. Louis for the year 1886.

Now, Mr. President, my object in offering the resolution for the appointment of a special committee has been stated. I do not mean to reflect upon the Committee on Interstate Commerce; I do not mean to question the ability or good faith or efficiency of any committee of this body; but I will be perfectly frank in stating that if this select committee is created it will be no junketing committee. It means a committee of hard work and steady employment in regard to this great interest. My idea is to put upon it five Senators from the great cattle States of the Union whose constituents are interested.

I have sought to point out the evils of the present system. The suggestion of the Senator from Ohio to refer this resolution to a standing committee seems to me to have no force and should not prevail. When a Senator of the United States presents here documentary evidence of the existence of great abuses such as I have indicated to-day in a feeble and unpremeditated fashion, that should be sufficient for the creation of a special committee. There will be no additional expense, because if this inquiry was delegated to a standing committee of the Senate the contingent expenses would be the same as if a special committee were created. Personally I have no desire to serve on it. If I have simply indicated the abuse, if I have simply been true to those of my constituents whose entire capital is invested in this great interest of producing and raising cattle, my duty will have been discharged, feebly, but I know most honestly.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, representing as I do in part one of the great cattle-producing States of this Republic, I feel very deep interest in the resolution that has been introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. I am in hearty sympathy with the desire of that Senator to thoroughly investigate this important matter. I think the investigation should be speedy and it should be thorough. That the facts exist as stated by the Senator from Missouri no one will attempt to gainsay. There has been a steady decrease in the price of cattle paid to the producers of cattle living in the West and in the Southwest, and there has been no proportionate decrease in the amount paid by the consumers of beef in this country. I am inclined to question somewhat, however, the correctness of the table presented by the Senator from Missouri, although it may be, as I heard it read in part only, finding it difficult to hear the Senator, that upon further examination I may find it to be correct.

Mr. VEST. The Senator will find it correct.

Mr. MANDERSON. I lately received a communication from an intelligent gentleman of long experience in the raising of cattle, having a large and productive cattle ranch that he has conducted for the past twelve or thirteen years in the northern part of the Territory of Wyoming. In his very interesting letter he calls attention to some of the facts that have been narrated by the Senator from Missouri, and gives to me certain tables prepared by himself, showing, according to his estimate, the monthly average price paid for beeves in the Chicago market for the year 1887. He gives me three different tables, and I will insert them at length without reading them, simply calling attention to their general statements, and will print them in the RECORD. They may be compared with the statements of the Senator from Missouri. It may be they will be found to agree with his.

The monthly average price for 1200 to 1500 pound beeves in the Chicago market for 1887 was $4.40 per hundred pounds in January, $4.25 in February, the lowest price being $3.85 in July, and $4.10 being paid in December, making an average of $4.19 for the year, and making the average cost of a 1200-pound native steer for the year $50.28.

The monthly average prices for 1200 to 1500 pound beeves for 1887 was:

January	$4.40
February	4.25
March	4.40
April	4.65
May	4.50
June	4.15
July	3.85
August	4.10
September	4.00
October	$4.00
November	3.90
December	4.10

An average of $4.19 for the year.

Average cost of a 1200-pound native steer for year, $50.28.

These cattle are the best of those that are marketed, being not direct from the range, but usually those that have been fed on corn and are usually described as fat cattle.

Another table (marked B) that he sends me shows the monthly average price for Western range cattle, being natives and half-breeds, for the year 1887, and these cattle, I might say, are marketed in the Chicago market only during the last six months of each year, there being no shipment of such cattle from January until the first day of July. So the average is to be had by ascertaining what the average price per pound was for the last six months of the year 1887. These range cattle brought in July but $2.90 per 100 pounds; in August, $3.20; in September, $3.20; in October, $3.15; in November, $2.90; in December, $3; being an average of $3.06 for the year.

B.—Monthly average prices for Western rangers (natives and half-breeds) for 1887.

July	$2.90
August	3.20
September	3.20
October	3.15
November	2.90
December	3.00

An average of $3.06 for the year.

Range cattle are only marketed in the six months from July, and are entirely grass cattle.

Average cost of 1,200-pound range steer for year, $36.72.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the average weight? Does that table state?

Mr. MANDERSON. The average weight of these cattle he does not give, but I believe they run from 1,000 to 1,100 pounds when taken from Northern ranges.

Mr. TELLER. The range cattle where they live are not near the weight stated.

Mr. MANDERSON. Their weight depends a little on the location of the range they come from. I think the range cattle of Montana and Wyoming will weigh more than the range cattle of New Mexico and Lower Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. Perhaps 100 pounds difference.

Mr. MANDERSON. Perhaps 100 pounds more in the North than in the South.

Mr. TELLER. The statement as to Montana and Wyoming, I think, would not be too high; but for Texas, Colorado, Arizona, and New Mexico it would be too high.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think it would. It is, perhaps, a fair statement of the fact to say that the range grass fed cattle of Wyoming and Montana will probably average 1,000 pounds to the head, and probably 850 to 900 in New Mexico and in Texas.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will permit me a word in regard to the accuracy of the table I presented, I will state that the table I read was prepared with very great care and read at the meeting of the National Stock Growers' Association at Kansas City. All the different States and Territories were represented there, all the stock-growers' associations were there represented, and that table was adopted as accurate and criticised.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think it will be found that the two statements are substantially the same.

Mr. BUTLER. The tables do not differ materially.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think they do not, although I could not hear what the Senator from Missouri read. Thus the average cost of a 1,200-pound steer brought to the market from the various ranges was $36.72 for the year 1887.

Then my correspondent sends me another table, marked C, which shows the monthly average price paid for Texas and Indian cattle for the year 1887, ranging from $3.25 per hundred pounds in January to $2.40 in December, making an average of $3.16 for the year; the first six months leading in price and the cattle sent to market during the first six months of the year being fed cattle as distinguished from grass-fed cattle, or "grassers," as they are called by the cattle men, making an average of these cattle, calling their weight 1,200 pounds, thus putting them on the same basis with those in the other tables, $37.92, making an average for the first six months of $43.50 and for the last six months $32.16.

C.—Monthly average prices for Texas and Indian cattle for 1887.

January	$3.25
February	3.45
March	3.65
April	3.85
May	3.90
June	3.70
July	3.10
August	2.85
September	2.65
October	2.60
November	2.50
December	2.40

An average of $3.16 for the year.

The first six months represent "fed" cattle and the last six months mainly grassers.

Average of 1,200 steer for year	$37.92
Average for first six months	43.50
Average for last six months	32.16

Mr. President, I give these tables that there may be as full light as can be obtained prior to investigation of this subject; and if the price received as shown by these tables is less than that shown by the tables introduced by the Senator from Missouri, it simply aggravates the evil of which he complains. The price is certainly not sufficiently greater to make any difference that is material in the consideration of the subject.

I have been at a loss after some little investigation of this subject, as the writer of this letter seems to be at a loss, to understand how it is that the evils which are complained of can exist. It is a little difficult to conceive that with a product such as beef cattle there can be a corner such as we might have in the corn or the wheat or grain product of the country. You can not store cattle as you can corn or grain. Cattle are not only a perishable product, but a product that need constant care and constant feeding. Their holding is too expensive because of their nature to permit any one to produce a corner in the market. So it is hard to explain the results which we all realize and the evil we all deplore by any such reasoning as that. But that there is some sort of a combination, some artificial, unnatural, forced, and objectionable organization, whatever may be its character, I think no one can question for a moment.

It is instructive to look for a moment at the number of cattle in the year 1887 killed and sold by a few of the large operators in the city of Chicago. There are there five great dealers in cattle. Mr. Nelson Morris is one, Swift & Co. another, Armour & Co. another. Hammond & Co. another, and the great canning establishment of Libby, McNeil & Libby another.

The Senator from Missouri suggests that for some reason—and I think he attempts to give the reason, and it may be a good one—the city of St. Louis in competition in this business for some years past has lost its position as a great cattle-dealing and cattle-canning and packing city. It may be that it is because there have been rates by railroads given in favor of Chicago against other localities. I am inclined to think that this is in part the reason for that fact.

Within a few years, however, a new condition of things has arisen in the cattle-producing States of the West. Under the pressure of the homesteader and the pre-emption filer seeking the arable lands of the States of Kansas, Missouri, Colorado, and the great Territories for farm purposes, there has been an inroad, a very great inroad, upon the grazing lands of the West, and this has produced certain important effects. A large number of cattle that would not perhaps have been placed upon the market were it not for the fact that these grazing lands have been and are now being sought by those who would devote them to the uses of the farmer have been forced upon the market, and as the result of this taking of Western lands by farmers immense herds of cattle have been thrown into the market during the last three or four years. This has produced what has seemed to be an overproduction, but I doubt very much if it is such in fact.

Another statement might be made here of interest to those studying the subject.

A great many of the cattle of the character that formerly were sent direct from the ranges to Chicago and St. Louis and the other cattle markets of the country are now sent to the corn-producing sections of Kansas and Nebraska, and are there fed before they are sent to market, the demand for the last few years being for better beef. Many of the great cattle-growers of the plains no longer send their cattle from the range to the nearest point on the railroad and there ship them to Chicago and to other markets, but, instead, they buy large bodies of land in Kansas and Nebraska and there have their feeding ranches and bring down the grass-fed beeves that they may be fed upon corn and placed in a condition to bring a better price in the market because of this demand for better beef. It is well enough, perhaps, to consider these facts in connection with this inquiry.

But let me return to the consideration of what is being done by these immense firms that now practically control the beef industry of this country.

These great cattle-dealers in Chicago killed during the year 1887 the enormous number that I will read:

	Heads of beef.
Mr. Morris killed and sold	432,507
Mr. Swift	557,468
Armour & Co	477,000
Hammond & Co	210,320
Libby, McNeil & Libby (canners)	126,112
Making a total of	1,821,407

head of beeves killed and sold by these five firms alone.

I agree, Mr. President, that if the natural order of things were permitted to obtain in this cattle trade there would have been in the last two or three years and there would be in the future a very great decrease in the number of cattle killed and sold in the market of Chicago to the advantage of far Western communities. I submit that the natural places for the cattle markets of the country are the great cities; perhaps that is too strong a word to use with reference to the city in which I reside, but it is not too strong a word to use with reference to Kansas City, but the cities of Omaha, Kansas City, Sioux City, Atchison, and others that I might name that are close to the present cattle-producing country are the legitimate and proper markets for the purchase, the killing, the canning, the packing, and the sale of the beef product of this country, and it is something artificial and objectionable that continues to maintain Chicago as the great cattle market of this country. It is true that Kansas City now stands second and Omaha third in this great industry, and with good chances for great increase to both.

Mr. BECK. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he has endeavored to ascertain by investigation how far the cattle market has been affected by the closing of the principal markets of Europe on account of pleuro-pneumonia and other things alleged to exist with our cattle, and how far the orders in England requiring them to be killed on the wharf on arrival there have affected our power to export.

Mr. MANDERSON. That matter has not been looked into particularly by me. It is a matter to which I have given some little thought, and I believe it to be one of the reasons causing the present depreciation.

Mr. BECK. Our foreign trade has been very much embarrassed and very much annoyed, I think, under false pretenses of diseased cattle going abroad, and I have heard that strenuous efforts were being made now to divert the trade in our cattle from the West to Canada, because then the English authorities would accept clean bills of health from their own officers, while similar bills would not, under some pretense or other, be received from our officers at New York or Boston.

Mr. MANDERSON. I believe it will be found that there has been a great falling off for the reason stated by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I know the exportations of cattle have fallen off.

Mr. MANDERSON. What he suggests has affected the sales of our American cattle in foreign markets.

Mr. BECK. I did not know how far the Senator had looked into that branch of the subject; and that was the reason I asked the question.

Mr. MANDERSON. There is this to say in regard to that suggestion, that if that cause has been instrumental in bringing down the price of cattle to the cattle producer it should have had the other legitimate effect and have brought down the price of cattle to the consumer of beef. But it has not had that result, and apparently no cause, that can be suggested, either that suggested by the Senator from Kentucky or these attempted explanations that I have given, are sufficient to produce the result of which we now complain; that is to say, that with the lessening of the price of beef to the producer there is no lessening of the price of beef to the consumer. Usually when the wholesale price of an article is reduced the retail price falls proportionately, but this cattle business seems to be an exception to this natural law of trade. The reason for this exception is the object of this inquiry.

Mr. BECK. I hope the Senate will not assume that I am at all disposed to resist the investigation. I agree very much with what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] have said. I have no doubt that a great many evils can be developed by this committee, which I hope will be raised; but whether they can be rectified or not is another question. I thought the Senator from Nebraska had perhaps looked into the branch of the subject to which I called his attention.

Mr. MANDERSON. I did not misunderstand the Senator from Kentucky. I believe him to be in favor of this investigation, and I do not believe there is a man in the Senate who will oppose the investigation. What I am seeking to do is simply to throw in advance of the investigation what little light I may have upon this very important subject-matter.

Mr. President, I have another statement here that I think it well to read in connection with those which I have given as to the vast number of cattle killed and sold in the Chicago cattle market. It may be said, I think, that the average price of a steer in 1887, take them of all weights, whether derived from the table presented by the Senator from Missouri or from that presented by myself, is about $25 a head to the producer. I do not believe it will exceed that very greatly.

Now, let us see whether we can ascertain what is the product of that same average steer when he comes to be sold by the butcher to the consumer of the meat. I have here a table that I think was first printed in what is known as the Butchers' Journal, although I find it in the Dry Goods Chronicle of a late date, in which is given what can be realized for a steer of, say, 1,200 pounds:

46 pounds of porterhouse steak, at 18 cents	$8.28
60 pounds of sirloin steak, at 15 cents	9.00
96 pounds of round steak, at 12½ cents	11.00
50 pounds of best rib, at 14 cents	7.00
118 pounds of chuck rib, at 6 cents	7.08
14 pounds of rump, at 6 cents	.84
110 pounds of soup-meat, at 4 cents	4.40
10 pounds of fat, at 2½ cents	.25
4 pounds of bones, at ½ cent	.02
40 pounds of corn-beef, at 4 cents	1.60

Making 548 pounds of the beef available for what are the usual purposes of the butcher; that is to say, sale to his customers at retail.

The tongue, liver, and heart bring $1. What is known as the "fifth quarter," being the head, tallow, horns, hoofs, and offal, brings $12.50, making the amount received for the whole beeve $63.11. If we are correct in our idea that the average cost of the beeve in the Chicago market is $25, it leaves a profit to some one or to all who intervene between the cattle-producer and the consumer of $38.11 for each steer bought and sold. Deducting for freight allowance to the retailer $8.11, leaves a net profit on each head of cattle of $30.

If it so be that this entire profit of $30 a head is received by these great packers that not only kill and pack and can, but who also in all the beef markets of this country maintain not only wholesale but retail establishments, and if this entire profit of $30 a head goes to them, it makes the enormous sum of $54,642,210 as divisible profits for these five concerns for the year 1887, rather a snug sum for their profit I should think when one considers their investment.

I do not want to be understood, Mr. President, as saying that I have any proof or any testimony of any kind that there is a combination, corrupt or otherwise, among these five great cattle dealers. If there is no combination of the character stated, if this country is not suffering because of the existence of a cattle trust, it is due to these gentlemen, and it is due to others who are concerned in the cattle business with them that that fact should be known.

Whatever the fact may be can, it seems to me, very properly, very thoroughly, and very completely be ascertained by the committee suggested by the Senator from Missouri. I simply want to say that I am in very hearty sympathy with him in his effort and propose to give him full co-operation in that regard.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, when this resolution was introduced a few days ago it occurred to me that it ought to be broadened in its scope in order to secure all the information necessary to the development of the facts affecting the price of beef and cattle. Hence it was that I proposed an amendment which is now pending and which I believe the Senator from Missouri has very promptly accepted or suggested that he had no opposition to.

I do not know whether or not there is any reason that is not observable to the public why the price of beef has been running down, and not knowing, I am perfectly willing and, so far as I am concerned, am anxious that the most thorough investigation shall be made for the ascertainment of all the facts pertaining to this traffic, so that it may result in benefit to the masses of the people of this country.

I do not rise to oppose the adoption of the resolution, but I desire rather upon the other hand to second its adoption, especially if the amendment is agreed to as suggested by me, and which the Senator from Missouri, I believe, does not object to.

It has seemed to me, however, that in the preliminary discussion showing the importance of the resolution, there has been an animus manifested on the part of the Senator from Missouri to ascribe whatever evils may exist to the fact that Chicago has seemed to get away with the business of the cattle trade, and, in the Senator's judgment, there is some mysterious reason that is behind it and which Chicago is responsible for, and perhaps nobody else.

Now, sir, while I have no possible ill-will toward St. Louis, and certainly none toward the city which the Senator especially represents, being a resident there, I want to say in behalf of Chicago that, not only in controlling the beef market of the country, but in almost every other business that is carried on in the West, Chicago's success has not depended upon legislation, has not depended upon trusts, but it has been the result of the enterprise and energy and force of the people of Chicago in carrying on the business of that great city.

While I have nothing to say against St. Louis, that city, while Chicago has been going forward, has apparently seemed to be going to sleep and losing the trade that the Senator talks about within the last year or two. I am perfectly willing to have the firms referred to by the Senator from Nebraska investigated and have their operations fully laid bare to the public, and if they have been doing wrong and have been interfering unlawfully with the great body of the people of this country getting in the first instance the price that they ought to for their cattle, and in the second place the consumers getting beef at the lowest possible rate—if there is anything that we can do to protect the people, either the seller or the buyer, I am anxious to do it; and hence it was that I desired this resolution amended so that we could not only inquire into the conduct of these great firms in Chicago and elsewhere and see whether there is a trust anywhere that is robbing the people, but I desire also that the great trunk lines, the associations involved in the trunk lines, the traffic association, and all these combinations which are responsible for the transportation of beef shall also be inquired into, so as to see whether they are in any way responsible, while we are investigating the general subject.

But I protest that until we have the facts developed by testimony before the proposed investigating committee, whatever it may be, there shall not be an assault upon the great city of the State I have the honor in part to represent, placing it before the country in advance of an investigation in the attitude of having been responsible for all the wrong that is supposed to exist in this country in connection with the beef traffic that the people are interested in.

This is all I have to say about it. I am perfectly willing and anxious that this investigation shall be made, but I am not willing that there should be manufactured evidence, by reading letters or whatever else in the Senate in advance of an investigation, so that the people will get to believe that three or four firms in Chicago are responsible for all the wrong that may be supposed to exist.

I want to go into the investigation. I want it conducted thoroughly and promptly, and the facts, whatever they may be, reported, and whatever legislation may be necessary within the purview of our constitutional power that will cure the evils which are supposed to exist, if it shall be found that they do exist after investigation. But, before that, let the people of the country stand all alike. Let us find out who the guilty parties are by an investigation, and not condemn them first and investigate them afterwards.

Mr. President, I hope the amendment I offered will be adopted, and then that the resolution will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Chair understands that the Senator from Missouri accepts the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to say one word further.

So far as the rebates are concerned, referred to by the Senator from Missouri, I believe his statement of rebates, secretly allowed by the common carriers of the country, related entirely to years before the passage of the interstate-commerce act. So I have nothing to say about that point further than this: It has been my purpose, and I have engaged in it ever since I have been in the Senate of the United States, to prevent all that sort of thing, and I believe that the records will show that since the passage and the enforcement of the interstate-commerce act, in a very great degree, at least, and I hope entirely so, the rebate system has been abolished, and has been abandoned by the common carriers of the country.

I am ready to say further that in my judgment the common carriers of the country—and it is one of the causes of the high price of beef to the consumer and the low price to the producer—are yet charging more than they ought to charge for the transportation of beef, either in the form of live-stock or dressed beef, from the Senator's city, or from any portion of the West, to the East, where it is in large degree consumed.

That is one of the reasons why I want this resolution amended and passed. If it turns out that the seller of cattle is not able to get the price he thinks he ought to have because the cost of transportation is too great, let us ascertain that fact, and let it be made known to the Interstate Commerce Commission, so that they may regulate the railroads in that regard and compel them to reduce their rates of transportation.

I was going to say a word in regard to what ought to be done with the resolution itself, whether it should go to a select committee or a standing committee. The provisions of the resolution would not make it exactly fit for the Interstate Commerce Committee to consider unless it was charged specifically with the investigation of the subject, because it does not pertain entirely to the question of transportation. Then, again, it does not quite fit the Agricultural Committee, for the reason that the element of transportation is involved in the investigation. So, then, as far as I am concerned I have no kind of objection to a select committee being created, because I want a thorough investigation of both branches of the subject, and they do not both belong to either of the standing committees that are now created by the rules of the Senate. Therefore I am willing myself to vote for the resolution creating a select committee for this investigation.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, there does not seem to be any difference of opinion about the existence of a very serious evil, one so great and comprehensive in its results that it may well be a subject of investigation by the Senate. The only difference of opinion is as to the occasion of this evil.

I am inclined to think as the Senator from Illinois does about the proposition to charge all things to Chicago. If the great city of St. Louis had done its duty perhaps we should not be in the condition we are now. If it had availed itself of its opportunities and had made St. Louis an independent market in fact as it is in name there would have been that competition which would have maintained prices at a legitimate level and undoubtedly would have relieved us from the complaints which now exist, and would have prevented the accumulation of this great business in the hands of a few persons at Chicago. But St. Louis has been willing to play second fiddle. It has abrogated its claim to metropolitan functions as a great trade center and has been willing to be the echo of the operations of the Chicago market both in regard to cattle and in regard to grain. This is a very great misfortune. The markets of St. Louis are regulated to-day by those of Chicago, and practically the same persons purchase the meat in St. Louis that purchase it in Chicago. The same influences control the business of the two places, and it is just as true of St. Louis as it is of Chicago that it dare not lift up its voice against or do anything to the detriment of the combination that controls this great business.

This is not the result of a year or two's operations; it is the result of the operations of certain forces which have been going on for many years. In the first place there has been the drift of population and capital to the great cities. The railroads of the United States have contributed to this. They have discriminated in favor of the business of the great cities against the business of inferior places. There is no packing-house between Kansas City and Chicago, not one. The reason is that no packing-house can exist at any point between these two places. There is such control over the interests of transportation between those places that after the slaughtering is done in Kansas City there are two, three, or five hundred cars ready to transport the meat to Chicago in order to reach the market there, whether for home consumption or for foreign supply; and the goods are transported by the railroad companies at a price generally not more than 25 per cent., I venture to say, of that which has to be paid for the transportation of live-stock between the two places, and at a price probably not more than 25 per cent. of what the rate is from any intermediate point to Chicago. So when the butchering season is over in Kansas City the packers at that place make up their meats, what portion of their product they want at Eastern points, and enter into arrangements with the railroad companies which result in cheap transportation, and this destroys the possibility of the successful operation of any packing-house on the 600 miles of territory lying between these two great cities.

Thus practically by the co-operation of these great interests the control of the live-stock business of the United States is centered in the hands of a few men. Of course this grows by what it feeds on. As these men have accumulated wealth they have been able to go more completely into the markets of the entire world, and by combinations and by operations with which we are familiar enough, to break down the small dealers, and therefore to break down from time to time every single shadow of competition.

They not only combine, as has been said here, in fixing the price of cattle that they buy in market, but they combine to fix the price at which the cattle shall be sold in the state in which they put them on the market, and they do that by parceling out the territory among themselves, one great dealer taking one section of country, another another, and so on, upon an agreement that there shall be no competition by any of his fellows within the territory thus allotted to him. Thus it is while they buy at the lowest price, at a price that is ruinous to the cattle producer, they sell at a high price to the cattle consumer, and so it has happened that they have actually put in their own pockets every single penny of the profit on every steer sold in Chicago during the past five years or more, and as cattle have gone down their profits have been increased by just that much.

Something has been said about the foreign trade. Undoubtedly that has been interrupted from the cause stated, but not interrupted to an extent which makes up the difference between the diminution in number of the cattle of the country as compared with the increase of population compared with, say, ten years ago or five years ago. The foreign trade in cattle has been controlled in the city of New York, in combination with operators in the city of Chicago, not upon the basis of the foreign demand, but upon the basis of the maintenance of a certain price for the home supply. Cattle have only been shipped from the city of New York when there was an oversupply beyond local consumption. A thousand cattle put on the market in New York any day beyond the amount ordinarily sold would break the price three or four cents a pound; and therefore when there has been from any cause an overshipment of cattle to New York, such as the local market would not readily take up, instead of giving the people the benefit of the oversupply by a reduction of price it has been shipped to England regardless of results.

In this combination not only the butchers and the shippers, but the railroads have been united, because, of course, the railroads saw in that one of the ways whereby they could maintain high prices of beef to the consumer. There has been, consciously or unconsciously, directly or indirectly, formally or informally, a combination between not only these great cattle firms of which I have spoken, but all the railroads and all the other agencies which have to do with the handling of cattle, with the shipping thereof, from the time they leave the range until they finally go on the table of the consumer.

It may be said that no investigation will develop a remedy. Many of these things do not result from actual written contracts or agreements. As I said, they are the accumulation of tendencies and of operations that have been going on for many years. The accumulation of wealth, the development of enormous activities in this business, the control of certain channels of trade abroad, the use of combinations of different kinds—all these, with that instinct with which great wealthy men moving in the same lines come together, have brought out in effect the combinations; and I have no doubt, if the truth were known, they have almost taken such shape and form as to make them illegal and punishable by law; and yet, after all, investigation may not do more than determine the actual existence of this condition of things, and may not be able to suggest a remedy.

But I have great faith that when public opinion has been thoroughly aroused and when producer and consumer are made to see that these men, who have nothing to do with production and are only the agencies by which the cattle are taken from the producer and turned into the hands of the consumer, have robbed both sides alike, a condition of things will result which will ameliorate the present situation. For that reason I am in favor of this resolution. While I would not object to its going to a standing committee, if that is deemed advisable for the purpose of perfection, unless there be some suggestion as to its scope or form that has not yet been made, I think it would be as well to have it adopted as it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Missouri that under the rule this resolution creating a charge upon the contingent fund of the Senate should be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope by unanimous consent that will be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course by unanimous consent it can be dispensed with if such consent is obtained.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be acted on now without such a reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois that the resolution be acted on without a reference to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate? The Chair hears no objection. The resolution is before the Senate for its action without a reference.

Mr. VEST. I hope the resolution will now be adopted. I wish to make one single observation——

Mr. CULLOM. The resolution is before the Senate. The request is that it shall be acted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The statement of the Chair was that the resolution was before the Senate for its action without a reference, the rule requiring a reference.

Mr. VEST. I wish to submit only one or two additional remarks. I hope the Senator from Illinois will understand me distinctly as not imputing any improper motive to the great city of his State. I spoke of it simply as a matter of commerce and as to the effect which I thought had been produced by the action of certain great railroads in connection with certain firms in Chicago. I do not know that the citizens of the city of St. Louis would not have availed themselves of the same privileges if they could have been obtained. I know very well that business men make money out of these trusts and combinations and consider it entirely legitimate. At the same time as a legislator I consider it my duty, and I suppose that every Senator present will consider it his duty, if he can by any sort of legislation in the interest of the consumers of the country do away with these combinations.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to suggest to him in regard to his remark that certain things were considered perfectly legitimate, that in so far as the railroads are concerned the interstate-commerce act prevents discriminations in favor of or against particular places.

Mr. VEST. That is very true under the operations of the interstate-commerce law, yet as the author of that law himself has stated, the evils arising from this source to a large extent exist now, and I suppose will exist no matter what law is passed.

Mr. CULLOM. The purpose of my amendment is to ascertain in connection with this investigation whether the railroads are obeying the law known as the interstate-commerce law or not. I thought it was a good opportunity to aid the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain the fact whether the railroads were abiding by the law, or whether they were not doing so.

Mr. VEST. I am entirely in accord with that object. The combination that I have spoken about and of which I read is called the evening combination, existing from 1873 to 1878. That was before the passage of the interstate-commerce law, of course.

As I said in my few remarks before, it has been considered perfectly legitimate by the speculators and railroad corporations to make this kind of combinations; but they have been ruinous in their effects upon localities, and the merchants of the city of St. Louis are not to blame because they lost their cattle trade. They were in the grasp of a giant system of monopolies that they could no more escape from than a child could escape from the embrace of an octopus—the Pennsylvania, the New York Central, and the Erie Railroad Companies, three monstrous corporations with pecuniary power larger than this Government, because better organized.

Mr. CULLOM. May I ask the Senator whether the trade was lost before the interstate-commerce act took effect or after?

Mr. VEST. It was lost before the passage of the interstate-commerce law, because the evening combination existed from 1873 to 1878. St. Louis was a great cattle market until that arrangement was made. The merchants of St. Louis never have understood why they lost that trade. That trade which belonged to them geographically was taken away from them under that combination of these great railroad corporations. As a matter of course, the Pennsylvania road and the Erie road and the New York Central wanted the cattle shipped from Chicago because then they came over their roads, and therefore they diverted the trade from the roads that ran into St. Louis and forced shipments of cattle to Chicago and from Chicago east upon their lines.

As a matter of course, to use a Western phrase, "they cinched St. Louis" and crushed out the life of the cattle trade there. These corporations had them in their grasp. In 1878, not from any good motive, but because the roads that were subsidiary, the connecting roads, refused to pay their part of the pro rata rebate of $15 a car, this combination broke up or came to an end. When that took place the mischief was done and St. Louis was prostrate, and never has been able to make any fight in the cattle trade since.

I do not say this because St. Louis is in my State. I live in a city which is the second cattle market in the world, a new Western town, and I am proud of it—Kansas City. It is to-day the second cattle market in the world, and I am not talking against Chicago. All I ask is that all legislation should be based upon an equal, fair, honest chance to every citizen of the United States, without legislation or discrimination that gives an advantage to one citizen over another.

Mr. CULLOM. The very purpose and life of the interstate-commerce act is to give to all persons and places a fair and equal chance.

Mr. VEST. I know it; and I voted for the act, and I hope it will have that effect, although it has not had it yet as much as I should like.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no disposition to reflect upon the city of St. Louis, but I want to say further that I have no doubt myself that Chicago will go on and will, in a very large measure, control this trade because it has the capital and the energy.

Mr. VEST. That is all right if it can do it, but I want an equal chance for the rest of the country. I ask for a vote on the resolution.

Mr. PLUMB. I suggest an amendment. I see the amendment of the Senator from Illinois refers to two traffic associations. These may or may not embrace all the railroads of the United States, but they may be succeeded by others, or they may break up, so that I would suggest an amendment, adding "or other agencies of transportation."

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection in the world to that.

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to the suggestion.

Mr. CULLOM. So far as I can I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, in the chair). The question, then, is on the motion to amend, proposed by the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Missouri has accepted it and modified his resolution.

Mr. VEST. I accepted it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Missouri as modified. Will the Senator from Kansas indicate his amendment?

Mr. PLUMB. After the word "association" insert "or other agencies of transportation."

Mr. CULLOM. To come in at the end of the amendment I proposed.

The SECRETARY. After the word "association" it is proposed to add the words:

Or other agencies of transportation.

Mr. CULLOM. That is right.

Mr. VEST. I accept the modification.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (H. R. 4775) for the relief of Abbie Sharp, formerly Abbie Gardner;

A bill (H. R. 5092) for the relief of Charles L. Bradwell;

A bill (H. R. 6491) for the relief of Lowman & Co.; and

A bill (H. R. 7618) for the relief of the Shepard & Morse Lumber Company, of Burlington, Vt.

The bill (H. R. 109) to refund to Dr. F. O. Saint Clair $97.80 duties on a monument to the memory of Francis J. Townshend, late of the United States Navy, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. 2088) for the relief of W. S. Carpenter was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. 8391) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in Grant County, Indiana, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. President, on the 2d instant the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] as chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce reported favorably the bill (S. 2851) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and at the same time reported several other bills adversely. Of the number so reported was the bill (S. 291) to amend the second and fourth sections of "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and it was indefinitely postponed. I ask that the order indefinitely postponing that bill be rescinded and that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the bill (S. 291) to amend the second and fourth sections of an act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, may be reconsidered, and the bill with the adverse report placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope unanimous consent will be given to place that bill on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the request of the Senator from Iowa will be granted.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 9793) authorizing a loan of arms and equipments to the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is the business before the Senate?

Mr. BLAIR. The regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, that order is closed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move the consideration of what I understand to be the special order, Senate bill 566.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 8560) to establish a department of labor.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate agreed by unanimous consent at the conclusion of routine morning business to-day and to-morrow to proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII. I understand that on a previous day, perhaps also by unanimous consent, the Senate agreed to proceed with the consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Oregon immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business to-day. I have no doubt myself that the subsequent agreement by unanimous consent vacates the former, but being advised and recognizing the fact that when the subsequent agreement was made the Senator from Oregon was not in his seat, so far as I am personally concerned I am not inclined to take advantage, if indeed I have that advantage, of the subsequent agreement unless I can get the consent of the Senator from Oregon that we proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII according to the subsequent agreement, with the further understanding that immediately upon the execution of that order the bill to which he refers shall come up for consideration and be considered.

Mr. REAGAN. I submit an amendment to the bill (H. R. 8560) to establish a department of labor, intended as a substitute for that bill. I ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. MITCHELL. I thank the Senator from Tennessee for his courtesy. At the same time I think he is laboring under a misapprehension as to which special order has precedence. I understand the rule to be that the two special orders made by the Senate stand in their order. It does not follow that a later unanimous consent displaces a former order fixed by unanimous consent, but that the two orders stand in their order and the prior order has precedence. I appeal to the Senator from Tennessee to permit me to go on unless the regular order is to be urged. I also appeal to the Senator from New Hampshire, who has charge of the unfinished business, to permit it to be laid aside for to-day. I have considerable hope that I may be able to get action on my bill in a very short time. I shall not take more than a few minutes myself, and I think we might get through with it early to-day and then go on with the regular order.

Mr. BLAIR. The unfinished business should be disposed of. The Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN], however, has proposed an amendment to it. I have no objection that both these special orders be accommodated, the bill now the unfinished business retaining its place on the Calendar. I suppose when the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] have concluded the execution of their respective orders the unfinished business can be acted on, so I have no objection; but I desire that the unfinished business shall retain its place and be taken up immediately after.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection.

Mr. BECK. I wish to say to the Senator from Oregon that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] indicated to me a very important amendment, perhaps in the nature of a substitute, that he desires to offer to the bill the Senator from Oregon has in charge. The Senator from Alabama is not now in his seat, and I know his amendment is important and radical, and it will probably take some time in its consideration. Therefore would it not be well to allow the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and the amendment of the Senator from Alabama]Mr. MORGAN] to be printed?

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment of the Senator from Texas is to the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. BECK. But I understand that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is to the bill of the Senator from Oregon, and I supposed that of the Senator from Texas was to the same bill, but it seems not.

Mr. REAGAN. My amendment is to the bill under the charge of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Alabama called my attention to his amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is the first intimation I have had that the Senator from Alabama had any amendment to this bill. I can only say that the special order was made by unanimous consent of the Senate one week ago to-day, on the 9th instant. The Senator from Alabama was here this morning and I do not feel disposed to give way so as to run the chance of having the bill displaced, as it would likely be in the rush of business at the beginning of next week.

Mr. BECK. I think now the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is to the bill which is in charge of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MITCHELL. That being the case, as the morning business this morning has been very much drawn out and it is now 2 o'clock, the Senator from Tennessee will allow me to call up this bill, have it discussed very briefly by myself, and see if we can not get a vote. It is reported unanimously by the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand the request is that the regular order be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no objection to the regular order remaining the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Whatever be the disposition of the question between the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Tennessee as to the execution of the order, the Chair will hold that the Senate resumes the consideration of the bill in charge of the Senator from New Hampshire as the unfinished business.

Mr. HARRIS. While I have no doubt that the consent agreement of yesterday takes precedence of the unfinished business and vacates the preceding order, I am not inclined to antagonize the wish of the Senator from Oregon in respect to his bill, because he was not present when the last order was made; but I should like to have the unanimous consent of the Senate, if we proceed with the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Oregon at this time, that immediately upon the conclusion of that bill we proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII; and that the next two legislative days be devoted to the Calendar under that rule, unless we shall have sooner concluded the consideration of the Calendar that remains under Rule VIII.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand the Senator desires all that to be subject to the unfinished business retaining its place.

Mr. HARRIS. The Chair has announced that when this order is executed he will lay that bill before the Senate as the unfinished business.

Mr. BLAIR. I beg the Senator's pardon. The announcement of the Chair was that on the termination of the consideration of the bill of the Senator from Oregon he would lay the unfinished business before the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I understood him to include both orders.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that whenever the unfinished business is informally laid aside by unanimous consent, on the execution of the order or the conclusion of that business the unfinished business resumes its place by operation of parliamentary law.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. FARWELL. I desire to give notice at this time that I shall ask to bring up Order of Business 938, being the bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia, on Tuesday next.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to say to the Senator from Illinois that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] gave notice yesterday that he would desire the postponement of the bill to which the Senator from Illinois refers until a week from next Tuesday.

Mr. FARWELL. I suppose I have the right to give the notice. That is all I desire to do. I will endeavor to get the sense of the Senate on that day after the morning business is concluded.

THE CALENDAR.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill No. 566 will now be proceeded with.

Mr. HARRIS. Before that bill is proceeded with, I desire to ask unanimous consent of the Senate—for I want to have no misunderstanding of this matter—that immediately on the conclusion of the consideration of that bill the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII, and that the next two legislative days shall be devoted to the consideration of the Calendar on the conclusion of the routine morning business each day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that after the conclusion of the consideration of Senate bill 566 the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII, and continue the same for two entire legislative days thereafter.

Mr. HARRIS. After to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. After the day on which the consideration of the bill is concluded?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TURPIE. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana objects.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 566) making an appropriation for a final survey and estimates for and the commencement of the construction of a boat-railway around the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles and Celilo Falls, in the Columbia River.

Mr. HARRIS. I now repeat the request I made a few moments since. After an explanation of the matter to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] he consents to withdraw his objection, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill just read the Senate proceed to the consideration of bills upon the Calendar of General Orders under Rule VIII, and continue the same for two consecutive days thereafter.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOM. I object until I can say a word. I desired to-morrow to bring up the bill reported by the Interstate Commerce Committee if I could do so.

Mr COCKRELL. Put it over until the next day.

Mr. HARRIS. Put it over until we get through with this order.

Mr. CULLOM. The trouble about it is that we shall probably adjourn Thursday evening until Monday, and on Monday other business, as the Senate very well knows, is going to come up which may take all of next week; and I wish to get the bill to which I refer through.

Mr. HARRIS. I think I am about as much interested in the interstate-commerce bill as the Senator from Illinois, and I do hope he will not object upon that ground. Let it go over until we devote these two days and a piece of to-day to the consideration of general orders on the Calendar.

Mr. CULLOM. We had better be sure of the consideration of the bill to which I refer.

Mr. HARRIS. No, let us try to get through with the Calendar. It gives everybody a fair and equal chance.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know how it will be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that if unanimous consent is given, and if the Calendar is not pressing very much in the mean time, I may be allowed to bring up the bill which I have mentioned.

Mr. HARRIS. So far as I am concerned, I should go very far out of my way to accommodate the views of the Senator from Illinois; but if this unanimous consent is granted, I wish to say that I shall insist upon its execution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOM. I will waive the objection, as it seems to be the desire to proceed with the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

COLUMBIA RIVER BOAT-RAILWAY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 566) making an appropriation for a final survey and estimates for the commencement of the construction of a boat-railway around the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles and Celilo Falls in the Columbia River.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, for the purpose of making final surveys and estimates for and the commencement of the work of construction of a boat-railway either in the State of Oregon or Washington Territory around the obstructions to navigation in the Columbia at The Dalles and Celilo Falls; and for the purpose of blasting open the contracted water ways at Ten and Three Mile Rapids, near said falls, to a navigable status for large river tonnage boats; or such other structure or structures for overcoming the obstructions to navigation at such points as may be recommended by the Board of Engineers hereinafter provided for.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to appoint a board of three engineers from the United States Army, whose duty it shall be to thoroughly examine the obstructions to navigation in the Columbia River at The Dalles and Celilo Falls, and at Three and Ten Mile Rapids, and to report to the Secretary of War, on or before the first Monday in December next, as to the feasibility and advisability of overcoming such obstructions by means of a boat-railway at The Dalles and Celilo Falls, and by widening, to a navigable status, for large tonnage river boats, the channel of said river at Three and Ten Mile Rapids, accompanied by careful and detailed plans, with estimates of the cost and a statement as to the usefulness of such improvements to navigation and of their relations and value to commerce; and said board shall also report, at the same time, as to any other plan or project for overcoming said obstructions at said points, whereby said obstructions to navigation may be removed, which in the judgment of said board may be deemed either more desirable than the above or worthy of consideration by the Secretary of War and Congress, and shall report detailed plans, with estimates of the cost of such proposed improvement or improvements, and as to their relations to commerce and usefulness to navigation; and said board shall report which of said projects is by it deemed most advisable. And the Secretary of War shall transmit said report to Congress at its next session, with his own views and those of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army thereon; and the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary of the above amount, may be used in defraying the cost of making said examination and survey and the expenses of said board.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, it is not my intention to detain the Senate by any lengthy remarks.

The bill just read is the conclusion reached, and the unanimous recommendation made by one of the standing committees of the Senate after a more than ordinary investigation of the subject to which it relates. It is not merely the recommendation of a committee on a bill introduced by a Senator and referred for consideration in the ordinary way, but is the deliberate and well-considered judgment of the committee after a careful investigation made in pursuance of an order of the Senate. This being the case, I trust I may with a degree of confidence hope for early and favorable action by the Senate. The order to which I refer may be found recorded in its proceedings of date January 5, 1886. On that date I presented to the Senate the preamble and resolution which I now send to the desk and ask that the Secretary may read, and which preamble and resolution were on that date agreed to by the Senate without a dissenting vote.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas the Columbia River is, with the exception of obstructions at the Cascades, distant from its mouth 160 miles, for a distance of about 5 miles, and further obstructions at The Dalles, distant from its mouth 220 miles, for a still greater distance, navigable for large-draught steamers from the sea to a point inland distant 1,032 miles, with tributaries aggregating over 300 additional miles of navigable waters; and

Whereas a canal and locks are now under process of construction by the United States Government around such obstructions at the Cascades; and

Whereas said Columbia River and its navigable tributaries drain an extent of country unsurpassed in agricultural, grazing, and mineral productiveness, capable of producing from 60,000,000 to 80,000,000 bushels of wheat annually, an area of country in geographical extent equal to one-twentieth of the entire area of the United States, as large as Germany or France, and over one-fourth of the area of South America; and

Whereas the commerce of that vast and fertile region is increasing with marvelous rapidity, the custom-house statistics showing that in the year 1884, 403 vessels passed out of the mouth of the Columbia River for foreign and domestic ports with cargoes valued at $15,600,000, as against 63 vessels in the year 1880 with cargoes valued at $4,181,352, while the tonnage over the bar at the mouth of the Columbia for the year ending September 30, 1885, was 869,943 tons; and

Whereas it is alleged that freight charges on wheat from The Dalles to Portland, Oregon, a distance of 88 miles, are now 12 cents per bushel of 60 pounds, and from Wallula, Wash., to Portland, Oregon, a distance of 214 miles, 18 cents per bushel, and all other freight charges, it is alleged, are in equal enormous proportions; and

Whereas it is alleged such freight charges are exorbitant and ruinous to the producer, and as it is further alleged that the real remedy for this evil is in freeing the Columbia River and its navigable tributaries from obstructions to navigation, and that this work is essentially national in its character: Therefore, be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into these alleged grievances, both as to their existence and the proper measures of relief, and also as to the importance of the speedy completion of the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia and the means proper to be adopted to overcome the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles of the Columbia, and to report by bill or otherwise at the earliest practicable period.

Mr. MITCHELL. In pursuance of this order of the Senate the inquiry directed was made during the last Congress, and on February 1, 1887, the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard intrusted with this investigation reported a bill substantially similar to the one now under consideration and recommended its passage, and accompanied the same with an elaborate report, showing fully and in detail, not only the thorough character of the investigation made, but also the facts and conclusions upon which the committee based their recommendation. This report was signed by the following-named Senators: Mr. CULLOM of Illinois, Mr. PALMER of Michigan, Mr. Williams of California, Mr. BUTLER of South Carolina, Mr. CALL of Florida, Mr. VEST of Missouri, Mr. GIBSON of Louisiana, and myself.

The report is Senate No. 1773, second session Forty-ninth Congress, and with the permission of the Senate I will, without stopping now to read it unless desired, incorporate it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The report is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 1773, Forty-ninth Congress, second session.]

On January 5, 1886, an important duty was imposed on your committee, in the adoption by the Senate, unanimously, on that date, of the following preamble and resolution:

"Whereas the Columbia River is, with the exception of obstructions at the Cascades, distant from its mouth 160 miles, for a distance of about 5 miles, and further obstructions at The Dalles, distant from its mouth 220 miles, for a still greater distance, navigable for large-draught steamers from the sea to a point inland distant 1,032 miles, with tributaries aggregating over 300 additional miles of navigable waters; and

"Whereas a canal and locks are now under process of construction by the United States Government around such obstructions at the Cascades; and

"Whereas said Columbia River and its navigable tributaries drain an extent of country unsurpassed in agricultural, grazing, and mineral productiveness, capable of producing from 60,000,000 to 80,000,000 bushels of wheat annually, an area of country in geographical extent equal to one-twentieth of the entire area of the United States, as large as Germany or France, and over one-fourth of the area of South America; and

"Whereas the commerce of that vast and fertile region is increasing with marvelous rapidity, the custom-house statistics showing that in the year 1884, 403 vessels passed out of the mouth of the Columbia River for foreign and domestic ports, with cargoes valued at $15,600,000, as against 63 vessels in the year 1880, with cargoes valued at $4,181,352, while the tonnage over the bar at the mouth of the Columbia for the year ending September 30, 1885, was 869,943 tons; and

"Whereas it is alleged that freight charges on wheat from The Dalles to Portland, Oregon, a distance of 88 miles, are now 12 cents per bushel of 60 pounds, and from Wallula, Washington, to Portland, Oregon, a distance of 214 miles, 18 cents per bushel, and all other freight charges, it is alleged, are in equal enormous proportions; and

"Whereas it is alleged such freight charges are exorbitant and ruinous to the producer; and as it is further alleged that the real remedy for this evil is in freeing the Columbia River and its navigable tributaries from obstructions to navigation, and that this work is essentially national in its character: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into these alleged grievances, both as to their existence and the proper measures of relief, and also as to the importance of the speedy completion of the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia and the means proper to be adopted to overcome the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles of the Columbia, and to report by bill or otherwise at the earliest practicable period."

In the performance of the trust reposed in your committee by this resolution, and of its duty in the premises, diligence and care have been exercised in ascertaining, so far as possible, the facts relative to the existence of the grievances alleged in the preamble and resolution to exist; and also have diligently and carefully investigated as to the proper measures of relief, as to the importance of the speedy completion of the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River, and have also thoroughly inquired as to the proper means to be adopted for the purpose of overcoming the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles of the Columbia.

For this purpose the investigation ordered by the foregoing resolution was, in the first instance, committed to a subcommittee of three, consisting of MITCHELL, of Oregon, chairman; CULLOM, of Illinois, and BUTLER, of South Carolina; and the chairman of which, under direction of the committee, visited the valley of the Columbia in Oregon and Washington Territory during the recent vacation, and collected statistics and other information bearing upon the question involved, all of which has been laid before your full committee.

From the investigation made by your committee it has been made entirely plain that the grievances, including lack of transportation facilities, exorbitant transportation charges, and unreasonable and unjust discriminations, set out in the preamble to the resolution, actually exist in and along the valley of the Columbia, in what is known as the great inland empire of the Pacific Northwest, including the State of Oregon and most of the Territories of Washington and Idaho, to the full extent and in all the aggravated forms as in such preamble alleged.

Your committee also find as true the allegations of such preamble in reference to the vastness, fertility, and present and prospective productive capacity in the matter of cereals, wool, stock, minerals, fruits, and grazing facilities of the empire of country drained by the waters of the Columbia River and its tributaries; the exorbitant character of the transportation charges and unjust discriminations on and along the Columbia River and on the lines of railroad owned, controlled, and operated by the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company (such corporation also owning and controlling the only line of steamers on the Columbia River and its tributaries above the mouth of the Willamettel) and also the alleged paramount importance, in the interest of cheaper and more reasonable transportation facilities throughout the valley of the Columbia, of the early completion of the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia, and the pressing necessity for the speedy adoption of some suitable means to overcome the obstructions to navigation at what are known as The Dalles of the Columbia.

Your committee, in executing the order of the Senate above quoted, have given special consideration to the four following subjects of inquiry:

1. The character and extent of the country to be benefited, and the commercial, agricultural, pastoral, mineral, and other interests to be promoted and subserved by the opening to free navigation of the Columbia River; and the importance, national and international, as well as local, of such improvement, and its probable resulting benefits to commerce and otherwise.

2. What are the present transportation facilities, advantages, and disadvantages possessed by the people of the Columbia Valley and of the Pacific Northwest generally? Are they such as to encourage the growth and development of that empire? Are the burdens they impose in connection with the advantages they afford reasonable and just, or are they extravagantly exorbitant and inequitable in the matter of excessive charges and unjust discriminations, and grievous oppressions on the producers and shippers, and how far and to what extent, and in what manner, are these oppressions made possible or aggravated by reason of these obstructions to navigation in the waters of the Columbia?

3. What are the benefits, national, international, and local, commercial and otherwise, that would be expected naturally to flow from the opening up of this river to free navigation; and especially by the establishment of some engineering work, such as canal and locks, or boat-railway, to overcome these obstructions at The Dalles of the Columbia?

4. In the event a conclusion should be reached—and from the facts presented there could, in the judgment of your committee, be no other conclusion—to the effect that the true interests of the commerce not only of the Pacific Northwest but of the nation at large imperatively demand the speedy opening of this river to free navigation and unobstructed commerce through the medium of the General Government, by the removal of or surmounting these obstructions, then what are, in view of all the adverse circumstances, the exigencies of the case, the magnitude of the interests involved, and of economic considerations, both as to time and money, the best means to be devised and adopted to accomplish this great and desired end?

First, then, as to the character and extent of country to be developed and benefited and the magnitude of the diverse interests to be subserved by the opening up to free navigation of the Columbia River, and this irrespective of the still greater advantages in a national and international point of view in opening to free navigation and competitive transportation for so great a distance across the continent a line for the passage of the internal commerce of the country, including trans-continental and trans-oceanic freight.

THE PACIFIC NORTHWEST, INCLUDING THE BASIN OF THE COLUMBIA AND ISLAND EMPIRE.

The area drained by the Columbia River, we are told by the report of the Chief of Engineers, is estimated at 245,000 square miles—an area, he correctly states, larger than all the New England and Middle States, with Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia thrown in—all these States combined having an area of but 244,260 square miles. The area drained by the Columbia River and its tributaries is twice as large as Great Britain and Ireland, more than twice the size of Italy, half as large again as Spain, and many thousand square miles greater than either France, Germany, or Austria-Hungary, and greater than all the islands of the seas combined.

Snake River alone, a tributary of the Columbia, flowing into it over 300 miles from the sea, drains an area of nearly 105,000 square miles, and its valleys are among the most fertile and productive on earth; while the Upper Columbia, above the junction with the Snake, drains an area of 97,155 square miles, and the main stream of the Columbia, below the Snake junction, 43,200 square miles. The engineer in charge of the works of the Columbia, in speaking of this vast area, uses the following language:

"It has been demonstrated that nearly the whole of this great plain is a magnificent grain-producing country, as the statistics submitted herewith will show. Furthermore, the soil is not only fertile, but of extraordinary endurance. In the Willamette Valley the fields that have been continually cropped with wheat for twenty years are now yielding from 30 to 35 bushels per acre of winter wheat.

"When it is considered that, in addition to its grain-producing capacity, this region has ample resources in precious metals, coal, iron, and most of the various products that go to make up that interweaving of a great variety of industries which always insures the development of wealth and prosperity, it becomes evident that the mountain gorge that commands the whole trade of such a country is worthy of considerable attention from Congress. The development of this region will add so rapidly to the material wealth of the nation, and add so largely to its revenues, it is thought, that every dollar expended will come back many fold into the public Treasury.

"The obstructions to navigation through this gorge occur at The Dalles and at the Cascades. At the latter place the works for improvement are approaching completion."

But coming to speak more properly of what is known as the Columbia River Basin or inland empire, as separate and apart and distinguished from the still larger area drained by the waters of the Columbia and its tributaries—we refer to that area of most remarkably fertile and marvelously productive country located between the Cascade range of mountains on the west and the Coeur d'Alene and Bitter Root Mountains on the east, with the Blue Mountains to the south and the Colville Mountains to the north—we find an area, the very large proportion of which is magnificent arable land, of over 25,000 square miles in extent, or about 25,000,000 acres, all susceptible of a high degree of cultivation. And the products, present and prospective, of this great area must find their way to the seaboard along the waters of the Columbia River.

At least must this be so until the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad across the Cascade Mountains to Puget Sound, or the completion of the Oregon Pacific, connecting the Columbia Basin with the Pacific Ocean at Yaquina Bay. But even when this is done, in order that combinations between the two or three or more railroad companies—the Northern Pacific, the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, the Oregon Pacific, and Oregon Short Line or Union Pacific—for the purpose of maintaining freight rates at high figures and controlling the transportation of that country, may be rendered impossible, it becomes a matter of the first importance to the people of the inland empire that the waters of the Columbia River and its tributaries should be free from obstructions from their mouths to their source at the earliest possible date and opened to free navigation. This done, and the power of any one railroad company or any two or more corporations to dictate freight charges to the producer of that country will be forever at an end. The great importance of these improvements and the value of free navigation on the Columbia and its tributaries will be emphasized when it is stated that by these we have a total inland navigation for vessels of various classes for a distance of about 1,686 miles, as follows:

By the main Columbia River, 1,032 miles, 752 miles of which are within the United States; Pend d'Oreille River, 180 miles; Clear Water, 40 miles; Kootenay, 100 miles; Willamette, 172 miles; and Snake River, 162 miles. And while at present much less than one-tenth of the cultivable soil of this great inland empire is under cultivation, and while the population of the basin of the Columbia does not exceed at present more than two human souls to the square mile, or only about one-ninth of the average population to the square mile in the United States, the product of this area for the year 1885 in the matter of cereals alone (wheat, oats, and barley, but principally wheat) amounts to about 14,000,000 bushels, the ground producing on an average over 30 bushels per acre of winter wheat, and from 20 to 25 bushels per acre of spring wheat, or considerably more than double the average product per acre of the United States or the world, while in some instances, even on tracts of considerable magnitude, the yield has been from 50 to 60 and even 75 bushels per acre and even more, and your committee are credibly informed as much as 100 bushels have been raised in more than one instance on choice spots under exceptionably favorable circumstances.

It is estimated that the area generally referred to as the Columbia Basin or inland empire is capable of producing, when properly cultivated, over 100,000,000 bushels of wheat per annum.

But to the magnitude of the area of this fertile field, and the prolific character of its productions, the vastness of its undeveloped resources, must be added the fact of the extraordinary endurance of its soil. It is of that peculiar character and depth of formation as to cause it to retain through an indefinite number of years, although subjected to constant annual drains from successive crops of the same character, that vis vitæ essential to continued healthful and prolific production. The soil averages from 12 inches to 40, 50, 60, and even hundreds of feet in depth; and by actual experiment soil taken from a depth of 40 feet and placed on the surface and exposed to the climatic action of the sun and atmosphere has produced an abundant crop of wheat. Fertilizing the soil of this region by artificial means is as unheard of in the Great Basin of the Columbia as it is unnecessary and useless; and this is true of irrigation as to the greater portion of it.

Giving the field over to rest, clover, and lime, or other fertilizing influences every two or three years, as is the custom in the East, finds no recognition in the life and practice of the farmer in the wheat-producing empire of the Columbia. The great fact to be impressed and the lesson sought to be imparted by these statements may receive proper support and emphasis by a quotation from an interesting report made some three years since on the character and resources of the Great Plain of the Columbia by Lieutenant (now Captain) Symons of the United States Engineer Corps. We quote from his report. He says:

"Over nearly the whole of this Great Plain of the Columbia there is now spread a rich and fertile soil, varying in depth from a few inches to hundreds of feet. This soil has been the product of the grinding action of the ice and drift of the Glacial epoch, by the water-wearing of the Champlain epoch, and from the disintegration of the rocks during the last and present existing Terrace epoch, by the action of summer's rain and heat, winter's frost and cold, and the chemical decomposition arising from exposure to the atmosphere."

Maj. William A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, now in charge of improvements on the Columbia River, in his recent interesting and able report (Senate Executive Document No. 114, Forty-ninth Congress, first session), after reciting the above from Lieutenant Symons' report, says:

"Since the date of this report it has been demonstrated that nearly the whole of this great plain is a magnificent grain-producing country, as the statistics submitted herewith will show. Furthermore, the soil is not only fertile, but of extraordinary endurance. In the Willamette Valley fields that have been continually cropped with wheat for twenty years are now yielding from 30 to 35 bushels per acre of winter wheat.

"When it is considered that in addition to its grain-producing capacity, this region has ample resources in precious metals, coal, iron, and most of the various products that go to make up that interweaving of the great variety of industries which always insures the development of wealth and prosperity, it becomes evident that the mountain gorge that commands the whole trade of such a country is worthy of considerable attention from Congress. The development of this region will add so rapidly to the material wealth of the nation, and add so largely to its revenues that every dollar expended will come back many fold into the public Treasury."

While General Nimmo, late Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, in discussing this subject in his annual report of May 6, 1885, on the internal commerce of the United States, on page —, says:

"Several years ago the soil of this region was subjected to chemical analysis and it was found to be possessed of properties which have rendered the soil of the island of Sicily susceptible to wheat culture for more than two thousand years."

But the immense wealth of this grand area is not limited by any means to the production of cereals. It is unsurpassed in the matter of stock production, and in the products of beef and wool; and butter and other dairy products, and fruits, to say nothing of its stores of mineral wealth, of coal and the precious metals, which are rapidly swelling the volume of exports that must find their way to the seaboard. The rapid increase of sheep-raising and wool-production in the State of Oregon in the last few years has been marvelous. Eleven years ago, on January 1, 1875, the total number of sheep in the State of Oregon was but 631,400, while on the 1st of January, 1885, ten years afterward, they numbered 2,519,950, or an increase in one decade of nearly 400 per cent., while in the same period oxen and other cattle and milch cows had increased from 205,000 to 620,565. These are the estimates contained in the annual reports of the Department of Agriculture.

While the wheat product of Oregon twenty-five years ago did not exceed 900,000 bushels, in 1884 it had, notwithstanding all the disadvantages of high rates of transportation, high wages, and other obstructions and embarrassments incident to the frontier State, reached the marvelous amount of 15,462,000 bushels, or an increase in that time of over 1,500 per cent.

Bearing upon the question of the extent and fertility of the region in what is known as the great valley of the Columbia, the following is quoted from the very elaborate and able report of Lieut. (now Capt.) T. W. Symons, Corps of Engineers, of April 3, 1882 (Senate Ex. Doc. No. 186, first session Forty-seventh Congress, pages 113, 114, 115):

"In order to show the extraordinary fertility of this region of the Columbia River, I give below the statistics from the United States Census Office of the average yield per acre of the cereals grown in 1879 in the State of Oregon, and Territories of Washington, Idaho, and Montana, comprising those regions drained largely by the Columbia River and its tributaries. Montana is included in this region for the reason that, while most of the Territory is drained by the Missouri, a large proportion of the cultivated land is on the headwater streams of the Columbia in the Missoula Basin."

"From this it is seen that the average yield of barley per acre in this Columbia country is 50 per cent. greater than the average yield in the whole United States, including this region; the average yield of buckwheat is 29 per cent. greater; the average yield of Indian corn is 11 per cent. less; the average yield of oats is 40 per cent. greater; of rye is 64 per cent. greater, and the average yield of the most important cereal of all, wheat, is 77 per cent. greater than the average of the United States.

"I give below the average yield of the cereals per acre of the cereal crops of 1879 for the principal agricultural States of the Union and those whose averages are the largest:

"These statistics are only given to show the great fertility of the soil in this country drained by the Columbia, its adaptability to support a large population engaged in agricultural pursuits, and the enormous crops which its immense acreage must yield as soon as a population sufficient for their cultivation is attained and means of transportation provided. This country is far away from the seat of Government and is very little known, but is bound soon to force itself on the attention of the country as one of the grandest portions of our domain, unexcelled by any in the productions of the earth, in the beauty, extent, and yield of its waters, in its mountains clothed with splendid forests and enfolding mines of the useful and precious metals, and in its climate.

"In consequence of its great and sure promise our legislators should look upon it with liberal eyes and grant abundant aid to all desirable works of public improvement which may be undertaken to facilitate transportation, sure of a prompt and rich return in the increased prosperity and loyalty of the people.

"From the interior water ways, the Columbia and Snake Rivers, should be removed, as far as practicable, all the rocky fetters which prevent and hinder full and free navigation. Commerce will require it, the people will demand it, and it must be done sooner or later."

But in discussing the question of the improvement of the navigation of the Columbia River at its mouth and throughout its length and with all its mighty tributaries, we must not fail to remember the varied interests and productions and the vast undeveloped resources of the whole State and of the adjacent Territories, the rapid and complete development of which depends so largely on a free river. In addition to the 15,000,000 bushels of wheat produced in Oregon in 1875, of the value of nearly $10,000,000, she produced 5,798,000 bushels of oats during the same season, of the value of $2,145,260; 164,000 bushels of corn, 1,239,084 bushels of barley, 22,260 bushels of rye, and 9,128 bushels of buckwheat. Her wool crop, which in 1870 was but 2,000,000 pounds, and in 1874 but 4,000,000 pounds, had increased in 1884 to 12,000,000 pounds, and in 1885 to more than 15,000,000 pounds. The value of the clip in 1884 was $2,400,000, at an average market price of 20 cents per pound; while its value in 1885 was over $3,000,000. While the wheat exports from Oregon in 1870 were only 115,747 bushels, of the value of but $119,139, they had risen in 1884 to 5,384,315 bushels, of the value of $5,396,450.

PORTLAND'S COMMERCE.

Aid may be derived in obtaining some adequate conception of the great importance and rapidly growing commerce of the Pacific Northwest by a reference to the trade of Portland, Oregon, the chief commercial city of that great region. The wholesale business of Portland increased in 1886 20 per cent. over that of 1885, and reached the sum of $50,400,000; and it is estimated by her leading merchants that it will increase in 1887 at least 30 per cent. over that of 1886, or over $30,000,000 more than in 1884. In 1884 it was $35,000,000; in 1885, $42,000,000; in 1886, $50,400,000; and the estimate for 1887 is at least $65,520,000. Equally rapid also has been the increase in trade and commerce of the cities of Astoria, near the mouth of the Columbia, and The Dalles, 200 miles from its mouth, as the records of the commercial representative bodies and Government and other reliable statistics will abundantly show; while struggling in honorable and by no means unsuccessful competition for the trade of this empire, and reaching out also across the broad waters of Puget Sound, the Straits of Juan de Fuca, and the Pacific Ocean for the commerce of the world, is the rapidly expanding city of Tacoma, at the sound terminus of the Northern Pacific Railroad on Puget Sound, and her energetic rival, Seattle, still further down the sound.

THE SALMON FISHERIES OF THE COLUMBIA RIVER.

These were established twenty years ago, in 1866. In that year the product was 4,000 cases, which, at the then cash price of $16 a case, made a total value of $64,000. Ten years later, in 1876, the catch was 450,000 cases, or an increase in that decade of nearly 11,250 per cent., and then worth $4.50 per case, and of a total value of $2,025,000. Seven years later, in 1883, the product had increased to 630,000 cases, of the value of $5 per case, making a total value for that year's catch of $3,150,000.

That we may comprehend better the magnitude of this great industry, it must be remembered that the average weight of each case, including the cans, is about 72 pounds, as the ordinary size can holds 1 pound net of prepared fish, there being forty-eight cans in each case. So the catch of 1883, taking that year for an illustration, was about 22,680 tons of prepared salmon, or enough to load two hundred and twenty-six trains of cars of ten cars each, each car containing 10 tons of salmon, or twenty-three ship cargoes of 1,000 tons each.

In this industry over 40 canneries are in operation, over $2,000,000 of permanent capital is invested, 1,548 boats, including 10 or 12 steam-tenders, are employed, and employment is given during each month of the fishing season to several thousand men, the number of men employed in 1886 being 7,596; of these 4,200 were white persons and 3,396 Chinese.

The above relates only to the catch by gill-nets alone on the Columbia River, while about one-third more, it is estimated, are taken by seines, traps, and wheels. The number of fish caught by gill-nets alone in 1886 was 1,315,800.

The following, taken from an article recently published in the Daily Astorian, at Astoria, Oregon, will give information as to the amount of money expended annually in carrying on this important industry, in purchasing material, and in payment of labor:

"The importance of the salmon industry to Astoria, Clatsop County, and the Lower Columbia generally, is tersely illustrated by the following figures, being a close estimate of the amount of money expended for the season of 1886:

COST OF MATERIAL.

Tin-plate, 74,000 boxes, at $5.25	$388,500
Salmon twine	205,200
Cotton twine	25,000
Lines	26,600
Lead for lines	7,500
Floats	4,000
Boats, wear and tear, paint, repair, etc	38,000
Tan-bark for nets	1,900
Pig-tin for making solder	50,122
Lead for making solder	10,450
Salt, Liverpool and coarse	2,000
Lacquer	8,550
Turpentine	6,460
Cordwood	19,760
Hard coal	1,862
Charcoal	15,200
Acid and zinc	4,000
Oils of various kinds	4,000
Improvements and necessary repairs	38,000
Copper and making up	2,000
Insurance	32,376
Hauling	12,540
Freight	5,000
Labels	32,400
Boxes	67,500
Taxes	11,400
Total	1,020,320

COST OF LABOR.

Knitting nets, 228,000 fathoms, at 22½ cents	128,250
Catching salmon with cannery nets	400,000
Catching salmon with private nets	300,000
Salvage and hire of detectives	5,700
White labor outside of fishing	93,956
Other labor outside of fishing	142,000
Total	1,069,906

PAID TO UNCLE SAM.

Duty on 74,000 boxes tin-plate, 7,992,000 pounds, at 1¼ cents	99,900
Duty on amount of salmon twine	20,520
Total	120,429

"Here we have an aggregate of annual disbursements to the amount of $2,210,646. Including every detail of the work it is a safe estimate to say that the Lower Columbia salmon canneries expend annually $2,500,000, the greatest part of which goes into circulation in this immediate vicinity."

WHAT ARE THE OBSTRUCTIONS TO NAVIGATION IN THE COLUMBIA RIVER TO BE OVERCOME, AND IN WHAT MANNER AND TO WHAT EXTENT DO THESE OBSTRUCTIONS MAKE IT POSSIBLE FOR ONE CORPORATION TO ABSOLUTELY CONTROL THE TRANSPORTATION OF THE INLAND EMPIRE AND OPPRESS THE PEOPLE?

Your committee, in the investigation of this subject, have become profoundly impressed with the pressing necessity and great importance, in the interest of the producers and shippers and general commerce of the Pacific Northwest, for some speedy, energetic, and effectual effort upon the part of the General Government in providing some wise and suitable means of surmounting the obstructions to navigation on and along the waters of the Columbia River, and especially at the point known as The Dalles of the Columbia.

The obstructions here, commencing near the eastern boundary of the city of The Dalles, 200 miles from the mouth of the Columbia, and extending with more or less irregularity and massiveness for a distance of about 13 miles up the river, are of the most formidable and stupendous character. Here nature has with unmerciful and unsparing hand for this distance placed an absolute embargo on the navigation of the waters of this, the second river on the continent. Here this great water way, which with but a single other obstruction of any magnitude, that at The Cascades, where a canal and locks are well under way of construction, drains an empire possessed of those natural elements that unite in producing wealth, invincibility, and power, when vitalized by proper development, is compressed between the rocky ribs, and stalwart sides, and uplifting foundations of gigantic mountains.

Here the waters of this grand river, over 6 miles wide more than 10 miles from its mouth, and more than a mile wide at various points 100 miles above its mouth, with a mighty volume of water, deep and broad, navigable for steamboats of heavy tonnage, excepting for the short distance of these obstructions, from the sea inland a distance of 1,032 miles, with navigable tributaries coursing their way over 300 additional miles, and suddenly compressed in a manner almost beyond the comprehension of man, until for a distance of nearly a mile and a half the passage is, to use the language of Maj. W. A. Jones, United States engineer, "so narrow that the river is polarized, as it were, and set on edge." And while the width of the river varies at different points within this distance from as low as 125 feet to 140 and 150 feet, the average width for these 8,000 feet, or nearly 1½ miles, is only 250 feet. Through this narrow chasm the mighty volume of this great river, whose discharge, according to the report of engineers, varies between 4,620,000 cubic feet per minute at low water to 15,420,000 cubic feet per minute at high water, is forced. When it is further remembered that the extreme difference between high and low water at the head of The Dalles is 87 feet, some proper conception of the character of obstructions to be overcome may be realized.

It will be very readily understood, and it has been made plain to your committee, that by reason of the obstructions to navigation at the Cascades of the Columbia and The Dalles of the Columbia, as hereinbefore indicated, the Columbia River being the only real pass through which the productions of the Great Columbia basin or inland empire can find their way to the seaboard, it has been made possible for one corporation engaged in the business of transportation to intrench itself as a powerful tax-gatherer and collector of tribute at these gates of commerce on this grand river, and thus absolutely control the navigation of the waters of the Columbia and its tributaries from their source to the sea, and dictate the terms of its commerce. Nor were business genius and capital slow to comprehend the commercial and strategic importance of these passes in the mountains and obtain absolute and undisputed possession of this "key-point," to use the descriptive language of the United States engineer in charge of the improvements of the Columbia River, "in the commercial strategy of the Pacific Northwest."

It has been made clear to your committee, furthermore, that for years, and from the earliest period of the establishment of civilization in the far West, a corporation, the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, and its immediate predecessor, the Oregon Steam Navigation Company, have held undisputed sway over the waters of the Columbia and its tributaries, with no restraint or restriction whatever on their power, discretion, or disposition in the establishment of rates of transportation to which the producers and shippers are subjected, save and except one, the ability and willingness of the producer or shipper to respond to their demand.

That this corporation has provided most important and valuable facilities for transportation both by boats and rail at a great expenditure of money is admitted by all; that this money, however, has in the main come from the producers of that region is equally true; that their facilities, notwithstanding their substantial nature, are insufficient to move in proper season the products of the inland empire, failing in 1884 to the extent of 35,000 tons, is admitted by all; that their freight rates, moreover, now and for years past have been such as to amount to a sum annually far beyond any reasonable, fair, or just, or even an extravagant interest on every dollar expended after meeting every proper charge and keeping their transportation lines in good condition, is a fact open to absolute and positive demonstration by indisputable evidence. That the people of an empire, located on the banks of one of the grandest rivers of the world, should in the matter of transportation of their products and supplies be held subject to the will of one corporation is contrary to every principle of fair play, justice, and right that should find countenance, respect, or toleration among intelligent and civilized men.

That the waters of any one river on God's green earth, much less one grandly magnificent in volume, length, and every other respect as the Columbia endowed with all those elements of greatness and grandeur and moral and physical power that constitute and characterize the greatest of the great internal water ways of the world, should be dominated and controlled by any one man or any set of men or corporation or company is a standing reproach to the people or nation that tolerates or permits it, and all this must be said and is said without casting any personal reflection upon the men engaged in the business of transportation along this great river or who compose the stockholders and managers of this corporation, and who have been so fortunate as to obtain control at an early day of this most important key to the commerce of the Pacific Northwest.

To change this order of things, and to more nearly equalize the rights, interests, and profits of the producer, consumer, shipper, and transporter in the great valley of the Columbia, to open up the waters of this great river to honorable competition, healthy commerce, and business rivalry in the matter of transportation, and of free and untrammeled navigation, are great purposes to which the Congress may not only constitutionally, and with entire propriety, but in the proper discharge of a most important and pressing duty give its earnest consideration.

THE EXORBITANT NATURE OF TRANSPORTATION TARIFFS ON THE PRODUCTS OF THE COLUMBIA BASIN.

In order that the Senate may have some proper conception of the enormous freight charges on the Columbia River and on the line of the railroad coursing the banks of that river and operated by the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, attention is attracted to the rates on a few of the distances on these lines, and they are not very short hauls, and compare them for a moment with transportation charges on other lines in different sections of the country. For instance, from Wallula Junction, Wash., to Portland, in the State of Oregon, a distance of 214 miles, a charge of $6 per ton for wheat was exacted. This is at the rate of 18 cents per bushel for this distance, or at the rate of nearly 3 cents per ton per mile.

Again, from Portland to Alkali, or Arlington, as it is now called, on the Columbia River, in Gilliam County, Oregon, a distance of 142 miles, a charge of 65 cents per 100 pounds on first-class freight is imposed, being at the rate of $13 per ton for that distance, or about 9½ cents per ton per mile; while from Portland to Castle Rock, on the same line, a distance of 162 miles, or about 20 miles farther than to Arlington, the same class of freight on the same line is charged 90 cents per 100 pounds, or at the rate of $18 per ton for this distance, or at the rate of 11¼ cents per ton per mile; or, in other words, for the additional distance of 20 miles between Arlington and Castle Rock an additional charge of $5 per ton is exacted for first-class freight, or at the rate for this distance of 25 cents per ton per mile.

Again, from Dalles City to Portland, Oregon, a distance of 88 miles, a charge of 12 cents per bushel is made for transporting wheat, being at the rate of $4 per ton for this distance, or at the rate of 4½ cents per ton per mile.

It will be observed there have been here selected for illustrations the rates between Portland, Oregon, and four several, separate, and distinct points located on and along the Columbia River, east of the Cascade range of mountains, in the basin of the Columbia River; that is so say, Dalles City, 88 miles east from Portland; Alkali (or Arlington), 142 miles east from Portland; Castle Rock, 162 miles east from Portland, and Wallula Junction, Wash., 214 miles east from Portland. From these instances a fair knowledge may be obtained of freight charges generally on the lines of rail and steamers connecting the head of ship navigation at Portland, Oregon, with the Great Columbia Basin, or what is commonly known and called in that section the great inland empire.

But still further let us inquire into the position in which the farmers in the Walla Walla and portions of Eastern Washington and Oregon are placed who might desire to ship their grain to Minneapolis and the East. While the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company will take their wheat, barley, and oats to Portland over their line, a distance of say 250 miles, at $6 per ton, they will charge them if they wish to ship to Minneapolis, via Wallula and the Northern Pacific Railroad, $2.40 per ton for the 30 miles from Walla Walla to Wallula, or at the rate of 7½ cents per bushel, or at the rate of 8 cents per ton per mile.

Can, your committee inquire, such enormous transportation charges or such unreasonable and unjust discriminations be found to exist in any other part the United States? Compare these even with the freight charges in the State of California, of which we have heard so much complaint in regard to alleged exorbitant exactions, and what do we find? Take the matter of the transportation of freight, for instance, from the valley of the Sacramento to San Francisco. The distance from Marysville, Cal., to San Francisco is, via Benicia, 142 miles, or precisely the same distance it is from Portland, Oregon, to Alkali or Arlington, or via Stockton and Niles, 192 miles, and via Stockton and Port Costa, 203 miles. The principal portion of the freight (cereals) goes via Benicia, as it is much the shorter route. The rate has been generally heretofore (we are not advised as to the present time) from Marysville via Benicia, a distance of 142 miles, $2.90 per ton, or equivalent to about 2 cents per ton per mile, while via Stockton it is about $3.30 per ton, or about 1½ cents per ton per mile.

While it is true these seem somewhat extravagant charges, and are such compared with rates in most parts of the United States by rail or water, yet they are less than one-half on an average those to which the producers of the Columbia River are subjected. But taking a longer haul we find the average charge by rail from San Francisco to New Orleans, a distance of about 2,500 miles, $10 per ton, or only about 4 mills, or forty hundredths of a cent per ton per mile, or only about the one twenty-eighth part per ton per mile charged for freights between Portland and Castle Rock on the Columbia River. The cost of transporting grain from San Francisco to Liverpool via New Orleans in 1884 was $12 per ton, a distance of over 6,000 miles, while the producers of the Columbia Basin are compelled to pay half that amount per ton for transporting their wheat a distance of about 200 miles.

The Northern Pacific Railroad Company transports wheat from Wallula Junction to Duluth, a distance of 1,674 miles, for $8 per ton, but little less than 5 mills per ton per mile, while from Wallula Junction to Portland, Oregon, a distance of 214 miles over the same line of road, a charge of 3 cents per ton per mile, or a rate six times greater per ton per mile, is exacted by the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, and also by the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, running its trains over the same line. From Duluth to Liverpool via Montreal wheat was in 1884 transported at $5.61 per ton, and from Portland by way of Cape Horn to Liverpool, a distance of nearly 17,000 miles, at $8 per ton, while a much greater sum than the former and a fraction less than the latter is charged for a distance of 200 miles in and along the valley of the Columbia.

A comparison of these various transportation charges demonstrates beyond the power of controversy the exorbitant nature of transportation charges imposed to-day by the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company and the Northern Pacific Railroad Company upon the producers and shippers interested in transportation to and from the great valley of the Columbia. It is not to be wondered at that the earnings of the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company were for the year ending June 30, 1884, $5,364,906.52, derived chiefly from local traffic, or that their earnings since then have been still greater.

But a few more comparisons will illustrate in a marked degree the extravagant freight charges that rule to-day in the valley of the Columbia. The average freight charges per bushel for the transportation of wheat from Chicago to New York, a distance of 963 miles, by all water—that is by the lakes, the Erie Canal, and the Hudson River; by part water and part rail—that is by lake to Buffalo and by rail to New York; and by all rail during the years 1876 to 1883, inclusive, were, on an average, as follows, and they are much less now: By all water, 10 cents per bushel; by lakes and rail, 12.4 cents, and by all rail, 17.1 cents. Making no allowance for difference between a long and a short haul, the charges on and along the Columbia River are on an average of from five to eight times higher per bushel than from Chicago to New York. At the rates ruling along the Columbia River on hauls of two to three hundred miles it would cost from 85 to 90 cents a bushel to transport a bushel of wheat from Chicago to New York, or at the rate of from $28.33⅓ to $30 per ton.

But coming down later, we find the present transportation rates ruling on transportation lines between Chicago and New York as follows:

By all water, 6 cents a bushel for wheat, or at the rate of $2 per ton for a distance of 963 miles, or at the rate of 2⅑ mills per ton per mile, or, making no allowance for difference in length of hauls, a rate of over fourteen times less per ton per mile or per bushel per mile than is charged on wheat from the Columbia Basin to Portland, Oregon, while by all rail the present cost (1886) of transporting wheat from Chicago to New York, 963 miles, is 15 cents a bushel, or $5 per ton for that distance, or at the rate of 5⅛ mills per ton per mile, or, making no allowance for difference in length of hauls, a rate less than one-sixth of that charged in the Columbia River Valley per bushel per mile.

And this illustration shows, moreover, the superiority of a water route over a railroad for the transportation of wheat and other produce of the country, as it will be seen from this that to-day it costs only two-fifths as much to transport a bushel of wheat from Chicago to New York by all water as it does by all rail.

SOME OF THE FEARFUL DISCRIMINATIONS PRACTICED ON THE PRODUCERS AND SHIPPERS IN THE VALLEY OF THE COLUMBIA.

But the fearfully unjust and paralyzing discriminations in transportation charges on and along the Columbia River may be further illustrated by a comparison of the rates on through traffic to and from Eastern cities each way, and terminal points on the waters of the Columbia, with such rates on through traffic to and from such Eastern cities and non-competitive shipping points on and along the Columbia River in Eastern Oregon and Washington Territory, such as Dalles City, Arlington, Castle Rock, Umatilla, Pendleton, La Grande, Union and Baker City, in Oregon, and Wallula, Walla Walla, and other points in Washington Territory.

The following letter serves to present the facts, and serves as a most conclusive illustration of the unjustifiable and oppressive character of these discriminations against the producers and shippers of the inland empire:

"THE DALLES, OREGON, December 29, 1886.

"SIR: On behalf of the Board of Trade of Dalles City we desire to call your attention to the situation of the merchants of this city and other cities in Eastern Oregon and Washington on the line of the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company's Railway respecting freight rates to and from eastern points.

"The schedule of rates to these way points upon all classes of freights from the East is made up by adding to the through rate to Portland the local rate back from Portland to the way point. This additional local back charge is an arbitrary charge, and is in no way connected with the through rate.

"For example: A car-load of merchandise to any of these way points from Chicago is delivered at the way point without going through to Portland, and the freight charges thereon consist of the full through rate to Portland plus the local rate on merchandise from Portland to the way point. In the case of our own city this local rate from Portland is, on the average, from 70 per cent. to 80 per cent. of what is charged for hauling the same merchandise from Chicago to Portland. The distance from Portland to this city is 88 miles. The local rate from Portland to this point, on the average, is 45 cents per 100 pounds. The through rate from Chicago to Portland on the same class of freight is 65 cents per 100 pounds, making the actual charge from Chicago to this point $1.10 per 100 pounds; and yet we are 88 miles nearer Chicago than is Portland, and are on the direct line between those two points.

"In the case of merchants east of us the situation is worse. Thus at Arlington, a point 141 miles east of Portland, the local back rate is, on the average, 70 cents per 100 pounds; that is, 5 cents more than the through rate from Chicago to Portland; making the actual charge to that point from Chicago $1.35 per 100 pounds. In the case of Walla Walla, Wash., Baker City and Huntington, Oregon, the local back rate is double the through rate to Portland. Yet the actual haul in each of the cases referred to falls considerably short of the haul for which is paid the through rate alone. Concerning this through rate no complaint is made, and merchants at the way points are entirely willing to pay the same rates as are charged for the haul to Portland. But the arbitrary local back-rate charge is deemed a most unjust and burdensome exaction, falling little short of systematic robbery.

"In like manner merchants at these way points are compelled to pay on shipments to Chicago, in addition to the through rate from Portland to Chicago, the local rate from the way point to Portland. Thus the railway company exacts from dealers at these way points on all shipments to and from all eastern points a charge equal to what they would be entitled to charge if they were compelled to haul the freight first to Portland. But no such necessity exists, and for this excessive arbitrary charge no service whatever is rendered.

"If the bill now pending before Congress known as the interstate-commerce bill gives us relief from this unjust and burdensome discrimination, we would respectively request you to co-operate with our other Representatives in Congress in securing its passage. If not, we earnestly hope you will endeavor to procure such other legislation as will relieve us.

"We call the attention of Hons. J. N. DOLPH and BINGER HERMANN to the same matter by similar communications.

"Yours, very respectfully,

"E. B. MCFARLAND,
"A. S. MACALLISTER,
"B. S. HUNTINGTON,
Committee for Board of Trade of Dalles City, Oregon.

"Hon. J. H. MITCHELL,
"United States Senator, Washington, D. C."

THE PEOPLE'S INTERESTS LIE IN THE DIRECTION OF CAPACIOUS HARBORS AND FREE RIVERS.

It is clearly evident the producers, shippers, and consumers of this country, if they would guard their own interests and protect themselves against the rapacity of formidable combinations of aggregated capital, must look to the improvement of the great natural water ways of the country and the construction of artificial ship and steam-boat canals and ship and boat railways for relief from exorbitant transportation charges.

A free water way to the boats of all comers is of itself not only the cheapest and best means, although not quite so rapid as by rail, for the transportation of heavy freight, but is also an absolute check upon the grasping tendencies of railway corporations.

It has been demonstrated beyond all question by the history of the past and by the practices of the present that railways can not and do not compete in the carrying of heavy freight with free and untrammeled water ways, natural or artificial. Take for illustration the New York Central, with all the grand facilities it affords with a four-track railroad, and compare it and its transportation business with the parallel line of water transportation composed in parts of the Erie Canal and Hudson River, and what do we find, even before the tolls were taken off the canal?

According to the report of the New York State engineer, the average actual cost of transporting freight (wheat) on the New York Central is fifty-four hundredths of a cent per ton per mile, not counting anything for interest on capital invested, and the average charge on that road is eighty-eight hundredths of a cent per ton per mile; whereas the transportation charges on wheat from Buffalo to New York via the Erie Canal and Hudson River is but twenty-one hundredths of a cent per ton per mile, or thirty-three hundredths of a cent per ton per mile less than it costs the New York Central to transport it; and this according to the report of the State engineer appointed under the railway laws of the State of New York; and hence we find the railway charges eighty-eight hundredths of a cent per ton per mile, or sixty-seven hundredths of a cent per ton per mile more than is charged on the water-transportation route.

And were the Erie Canal and Hudson River wiped out of existence to-day how long, in the judgment of any reasonable man, would the present transportation rates on the New York Central remain as low as they are? The conceded profit of to-day of thirty-four hundredths of a cent per ton per mile would in all probability be increased to five times that amount, or, perhaps, much more, especially as the parallel line to Buffalo of the West Shore road is now controlled by the New York Central.

But as it is now the canal and river, as might be reasonably expected, do the great bulk of the business, and the people get the benefit of the competition.

The statistics show that during the past year the Erie Canal was the conduit through which 37,500,000 bushels of wheat were delivered at the port of New York, while the sum total that came through the almost countless railroad lines that center there, including the four-track New York Central, was only about 28,000,000 bushels, or 4,750,000 bushels less than one-half of the whole amount, while the total amount of tonnage (in bushels) of flour, corn-meal, wheat, corn, oats, barley, peas, and malt which arrived in New York from the 1st day of January, 1883, to the 31st day of December, 1883, was 124,336,237 bushels, and was delivered at that port by the following routes:

	Bushels.
New York Central and Hudson River Railroad	32,125,615
New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad	28,765,288
Pennsylvania Central Railroad	13,060,494
Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad	4,581,770
Various routes	856,924
By river and coast	3,725,238
By canal (seven months)	41,220,908
	124,336,237

Of the entire amount of grain thus received at the port of New York during the year it will be observed that—

	Per cent.
The New York Central Railroad carried	25.84
The Erie Railway carried	23.13
The Pennsylvania Central Railroad carried	10.50
The Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad carried	3.69
Various small routes carried	0.69
River and coast	3.00
The Erie canal in seven months carried	33.15

Numerous other instances might be cited to the same effect did time justify. For instance, the railroad commissioners of the State of Illinois the past year fixed the maximum rates on wheat in car-load lots for 130 miles 7.21 cents per bushel, while the charges for the same distance for wheat from Henry to Chicago by the Illinois and Michigan Canal, including the State tolls, is but 3 cents per bushel, or 1.21 cents per bushel less than one-half the charge by rail.

In our recent history we have a monumental and most commendable example of the manner in which internal and external commerce may be promoted by the improvement of important lines of water ways. Where did New Orleans stand even twelve years ago as a seaport and in respect of its relations to foreign commerce? Since the completion of the Eads jetties what has she in these respects become? In 1883, as shown by the statistics, she was the second port in the United States in the value of her exports (New York, of course, being first), and ranked third in total foreign commerce.

PLAN OF IMPROVEMENT PROPOSED BY COMMITTEE FOR OVERCOMING OBSTRUCTIONS AT THE DALLES OF THE COLUMBIA.

Your committee have carefully considered the various projects heretofore suggested by United States engineers in charge of surveys and other Government works on the Columbia River as a means of overcoming these obstructions at The Dalles, or, as more accurately and specifically stated in the reports of engineers, at "Celilo Falls, Ten-Mile Rapids, The Dalles, and Three-Mile Rapids."

The two principal plans heretofore proposed are:

First. By dodging these obstructions by a canal and a series of locks.

Second. By a boat railway in part, or, to be specific, by flanking The Dalles and Celilo Falls with railway inclines, over which laden boats and river craft may be hauled by means of stationary engines at the summits, and by blasting open the contracted water ways at Ten and Three Mile Rapids to a width of 300 feet, so as to reduce the velocities to a navigable status.

In view of the enormous expense required to dodge these gigantic obstructions by means of a canal and locks, and the well known disposition of the Congress to limit appropriations for river and harbor improvements to the lowest possible minimum, and the indisposition to concentrate such appropriations on a few specific works of manifest and unquestioned national importance, and the tendency to distribute the amounts annually appropriated among a great variety of works, thus giving but a small proportion of the whole to any one, however important, your committee are of the opinion that if it is desired to overcome these obstructions to navigation in any practical and effective manner, so as to be of any real benefit to the present or even the next generation, it would be unwise at present to enter on the construction of canal and locks, provided always that other means can be devised and put into effectual operation within some reasonable time, and at much less expense, so that speedy relief may be brought to the producers and shippers of the great Columbia Valley and of the North Pacific coast generally. That this can be done by means of a boat-railway around The Dalles and Celilo Falls and by widening the channels by blasting at Ten and Three Mile Rapids to a width of 300 feet, so as to render the water navigable at these points, your committee, after careful investigation, have no kind of doubt.

That some proper conception of the cost and time likely to be required, and hence the consequent great delay in bringing relief to the people, to construct a canal and locks around these obstructions, your committee quote the following from the annual report of Maj. William A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, of date July 25, 1885:

"Estimates have been made and submitted for building a canal to flank Celilo Falls with blasting operations for making the river good at Ten-Mile Rapids, The Dalles, and at Three-Mile Rapids. This project is estimated to cost, in round numbers, $11,000,000. If we apply to this enormous sum the rate at which funds have been provided for the Cascades Canal, it will appear that over one hundred years would be required before navigation could be opened through these obstructions."

Your committee turn, therefore, reluctantly to the consideration of the alternative, a boat railway and widening of the channel as above indicated.

While this plan is somewhat out of the usual groove in which the more conservative and unprogressive portion of the United States Engineer Corps have been accustomed to operate, it is by no means impracticable or novel; nor are your committee left by any means to grope unintelligently in the dark as to its application and entire feasibility as a means of overcoming the obstructions at The Dalles of the Columbia; nor yet in reference to the matter of expense are we left to conjecture.

Various preliminary surveys have heretofore been made for proposed improvements at The Dalles. A survey at these obstructions, with plan and specifications for a canal and locks, was required by act of Congress of March 3, 1879, which reads as follows:

"That the Secretary of War is hereby directed, at his discretion, to cause examinations or surveys, or both, and estimates of cost of improvements proper, to be made at the following points, namely:

* * * * * * *

"The Columbia River at The Dalles in Oregon, including plan and specifications for locks and canal around said point."

* * * * * * *

This requirement of Congress was complied with between October, 1879, and January, 1880, by direction of Maj. G. L. Gillespie, Corps of Engineers, officer in charge, under the supervision of Capt. Charles F. Powell, Corps of Engineers. The latter, in his annual report to the Chief of Engineers of date May 30, 1882, and which includes his survey and estimates, refers to these different examinations, and says:

"Subsequently and at various times additional surveys and examinations were made of special localities, to furnish results more detailed than those obtained by the main party, and also for studying the variable phases of the river during its widely different stages.

"An excellent instrumental examination had been made in 1874, by Assistant Engineer R. A. Habersham, and under the orders of Maj. N. Michler, Corps of Engineers, a map on a scale of 1:7200 was plotted from this examination. * * * The obstacles to be overcome were briefly described in a report, and some plans were suggested.

* * * * * * *

"The examination paved the way for a detailed survey, and the map of the former furnished a good groundwork on which to arrange the latter.

"One month preceding the commencement of the survey permanent water-gauges were established, and from that time read daily, as a rule, until June, 1881."

On these prior examinations, tests, surveys, etc., Captain Powell based his interesting and elaborate report of May 30, 1882, to the Chief of Engineers as to the character of the obstructions at The Dalles, and the means necessary to overcome them. In this report Captain Powell gives elaborate details concerning the character of these obstructions, including full river descriptions, width, depth, volume, and velocity of the water; character of the channel; fall of the water at high, mean, and low stages; extent and character of the country drained; its fertility and productiveness; importance of a free river, and full and complete information upon all points from which plans and estimates of any character of importance can conveniently be made, and which report he concluded with an estimate of the cost of constructing a canal and locks at said points.

But not only so. Lieut. (now Capt.) T. W. Symons, in his able and exhaustive report of date April 3, 1882, speaking of the navigable waters of the Upper Columbia River and its tributaries, strongly recommended boat-railways as a suitable and proper means of overcoming the obstructions in that river, and made estimates of the cost. (See Senate Executive Document No. 114, first session Forty-ninth Congress.)

But as conclusive upon the whole subject, as it seems to your committee, not only as to the entire feasibility of the proposed boat-railway, or as to that, in view of all the circumstances, being the plan which in preference to all others should under existing circumstances be adopted by Congress, and this, too, without the delay necessary for further preliminary surveys and examinations, which your committee deem unnecessary and inexpedient in view of all the surveys, examinations, and estimates heretofore made, the very exhaustive and interesting report of Maj. W. A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, of date July 27, 1885, in which he recommends a boat-railway in part, and the widening of the channel in part, as above indicated, and submits carefully prepared and elaborate plans and specifications and estimates for the same, is herewith submitted and made part of this report; this being a part of his annual report on river improvements in Oregon and Washington Territory for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885. (See Senate Executive Document No. 114, first session Forty-ninth Congress.)

"REPORT OF MAJ. W. A. JONES, CORPS OF ENGINEERS, OF DATE JULY 27, 1885, MAKING SURVEY AND ESTIMATES AND SUBMITTING PLANS AND SPECIFICATIONS FOR A BOAT-RAILWAY AT THE DALLES OF THE COLUMBIA.

"The Dalles.—For a distance of about 13 miles, commencing a little above the city of The Dalles, Oregon, the Columbia River is obstructed in a gigantic manner that is perfectly unique in the history of river improvements. The whole water way is choked, apparently by an intrusion of lava, through which the river has with difficulty cut a passage. At one point, over a distance of 8,000 feet, the passage is so narrow that the river is polarized, as it were, and set on edge. The chasm has in places such widths as 75, 147, and 150 feet, and its average width is about 250 feet. Except at high-water stages, the whole volume of this great river, whose discharge varies between 77,000 cubic feet per second at low water, and 257,000 cubic feet per second at high water approximately, is forced through this narrow, precipitous gorge.

"In order that it shall get through the waters are dammed up at the head until the slope becomes such as to produce an enormous velocity. Throughout the whole distance of 13 miles the water way of the river is very much contracted at two places, Ten-Mile Rapids and Three-Mile Rapids, the minimum widths at low water are 210 feet and 190 feet, respectively. The serious obstructions to navigation over the whole reach occur in order, commencing at Celilo, at the head, at Celilo Falls, Ten-Mile Rapids, The Dalles, and Three-Mile Rapids. At Celilo Falls there is a considerable fall at low water, which, however, becomes nearly obliterated at high water by the waters dammed back by The Dalles. At this point a portage of 4,500 feet will carry from good water above the falls to the same below.

"Thence down to Ten-Mile Rapids the river is suitable for navigation. At this point the channel can be widened sufficiently by removing about 270,000 cubic yards of rock.

"From thence to The Dalles the river again becomes suitable for navigation. At The Dalles the river might be widened to 300 feet by the removal of about 700,000 cubic yards of rock. The portage here is about 9,000 feet between good water above and below.

"At Three-Mile Rapids the channel can be sufficiently widened by rock removal, and from thence no further serious obstructions exist.

"For a very thorough and accurate description, see Captain Powell's report of survey, published in Senate Executive Document No. 184, Forty-seventh Congress, first session. The following data, taken from this report, are quite interesting:

Distance from Celilo (gauge No. 1) to The Dalles City (gauge No. 5)	miles.	11.6
Total fall in water-surface:
At high water	feet.	55.5
At low water	do.	81.0

It is interesting to note here the damming effect at high water of the Cascades, 45 miles below:

Distance between gauge 1 (Celilo) and gauge 2 (foot of Celilo Falls), feet		6,600.0
Total fall in water surface:
At high water	feet.	3.2
At low water	do.	47.2
Celilo Falls:
Fall at low water	feet.	20.0
Fall at high water	do.	0.0
Distance between gauge 2 (Celilo Falls) and gauge 3 (head of The Dalles)	feet.	32,000.0

The magnitude of this great problem in engineering will appear when the foregoing is considered in the light of the fact that the great annual flood occurs with precision in June of each year, and the water-levels are constantly and rapidly changing.

"PROJECT FOR IMPROVEMENT.

"The obvious mode of improving navigation here is to dodge these mighty obstacles by means of canals and locks; but when one considers the extensive excavations in solid basalt rock, and walls and gates of unprecedented heights that will be required to accommodate the extraordinary variations in the level of the water, the element of uncertainty combines with that of extraordinary cost and length of time required for construction, and demands a pause. Estimates have been made and submitted for building a canal to flank Celilo Falls, with blasting operations for making the river good at Ten-Mile Rapids, The Dalles, and at Three-Mile Rapids. This project is estimated to cost in round numbers $11,000,000.

"If we apply to this enormous sum the rate at which funds have been provided for the Cascade Canal, it will appear that over one hundred years would be required before navigation could be opened through these obstructions. Now, there is but little doubt in my mind that ultimately the solution of this problem will be by means of these operations, but I am very strongly impressed with the conviction that the day of their construction ought to be postponed until a system of making appropriations has been adopted which will permit of their construction within a reasonable length of time, and when the resources of the country will justify the expenditure. In the mean time, if the plan I shall now propose should prove to be a sufficient solution, there will result a great saving to the public Treasury.

"BOAT-RAILWAY.

"I propose to flank The Dalles and Celilo Falls with railway inclines, over which laden boats and river craft may be hauled by means of stationary engines at the summits, and to blast open the contracted water ways at Ten and Three Mile Rapids to a width of 300 feet, which will be sufficient to reduce the velocities to a navigable status.

"The proposition is not novel. It is a common thing to haul boats out of the water upon inclined railways, and the fact of their being laden will not materially affect the operation. Furthermore, its application at this same place has been advocated by engineers for many years. Lieut. T. W. Symons, Corps of Engineers, in 1881 recommended it, and makes estimates of cost in his published report upon the Columbia River. Furthermore, the development of steam-boat construction for the swift waters of the Upper Columbia and Snake Rivers has resulted in a boat with no keel and a perfectly flat bottom, but with good lines at stem and stern. This very much simplifies the question of a car for carrying the boats, as will be seen from the designs submitted herewith. Plans for Celilo Falls only are submitted, and on these the estimates for both The Dalles and Celilo are based.

"The maximum grade of the track is 213.84 feet per mile. The summit is passed by a gentle curve, quite within the limits of longitudinal flexure that will result from passing over the summit curve. The car is made up of cross-girders supported by longitudinal built beams, which in turn are carried by the wheel-axles, the whole suitably braced, and having sufficient iron introduced to prevent floating when completely submerged. It will be handled by cables from the stationary engine at the summit. It will have twenty-one wheels on each side, with independent axles, forty-two in all, running on a two-rail track 25 feet 6 inches wide. The maximum load on a single wheel will be about 17 tons. Length and width over all, 190 feet and 48 feet, respectively. For the present only a single line of track is proposed. Should the traffic develop a necessity for it another can be laid alongside. The following is a detailed estimate of cost, from which it appears that an expense of a little more than one and a quarter million dollars navigation can be opened through this obstruction at all stages of the river, except when it is closed by ice."

THE TRAFFIC, PRESENT AND PROSPECTIVE, ON AND ALONG THE COLUMBIA RIVER, AND THE SAVING TO THE PEOPLE BY A FREE RIVER.

The wheat traffic alone along the Columbia River is over 600,000 tons per year. Taken with all other freight it is safe to estimate within the next two years a two-way traffic of over 1,000,000 tons of freight will pass along this river by boat and rail. This traffic is now subject to a freight tax of over 3 cents per ton per mile, which, on an average haul of 200 miles, is a tax on the producer and shipper of $6,000,000 annually, while on an average haul of 300 miles between Portland, Oregon, Eastern Oregon, Eastern Washington Territory, and Western Idaho the freight tax annually on the producers and shippers will be about $9,000,000.

With the completion of the canal and locks at the Cascades, and the completion of the proposed boat-railway and accompanying improvements at The Dalles, it is safe to predict that freight charges would be reduced at once at least to one-half of 1 per cent. per ton per mile. On an average haul, therefore, of about 200 miles, this would, on the estimate of the amount of freight as hereinbefore given, relieve the country, the producer, and shipper of a freight tax of $5,000,000 annually; but should the reduction in freight charges by these improvements prove not to be so great as above indicated, should the rates not go below 1 per cent. per ton per mile, it would still be extravagantly high compared with rates in States and Territories east of the Rocky Mountains. The saving to the people even in that case would be $4,000,000 annually on an average haul of 200 miles, or a saving of $6,000,000 annually on an average haul of 300 miles.

As we have seen, the estimated cost of the entire improvement proposed to overcome these obstructions of 13 miles at The Dalles is but $1,373,000, or less than one-fifth the amount of freight tax that will be saved to the people of Oregon and Washington Territory, to say nothing of other traffic in a single year. Why the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company should protest in every conceivable manner, and in that manner most likely to be effective, against these improvements, is not, in view of the patent facts in the case, difficult of comprehension. Why, upon the other hand, the people of the inland empire should demand of their Representatives and of the Congress the speedy opening of the Columbia River to free navigation and unfettered commerce is equally easy of comprehension. It is a demand in every sense reasonable and just, based on incontrovertible facts, and should in justice and equity and good conscience be met with a resolute, cheerful, speedy, and effective response.

THE COMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATION.

In the opinion of your committee, therefore, the interests of the people of the Pacific Northwest imperatively demand, first, the speedy completion of the works at the mouth of the Columbia, and the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia River, and it is recommended that liberal annual appropriations be made therefor; and, second, that the work of constructing a boat-railway around The Dalles and Celilo Falls of the Columbia River, and of blasting open the contracted water ways at Ten and Three Mile Rapids to a width of 300 feet, so as to secure navigable water, should be entered upon without delay by the United States Government; and your committee therefore recommend that it be done without further preliminary survey or report, and that an appropriation of $500,000 be made at the present session of Congress for such purpose; provided a final survey and estimates, based on the general plan proposed by Maj. W. A. Jones in his report herein quoted, and covering the entire improvement as therein indicated, which final report, survey, and estimates should be directed at once, to be paid for out of this appropriation, be first made and submitted to the Secretary of War and approved by him. And your committee report back the following bill, and recommend its passage:

"A bill making an appropriation for a final survey and estimates for and the commencement of the construction of a boat-railway around the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles and Celilo Falls in the Columbia River.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, for the purpose of making final surveys and estimates for, and the commencement of the work of construction of a boat-railway either in the State of Oregon or Washington Territory around the obstructions to navigation in the Columbia River at The Dalles and Celilo Falls; and for the purpose of blasting open the contracted water ways at Ten and Three Mile Rapids, near said falls, to a navigable status for large river tonnage boats.

"SEC. 2. The Secretary of War is hereby directed, at his earliest convenience after the passage of this act, to cause a final survey and estimates to be made of the plan and cost of a boat-railway and the widening of the channel of such river at such points, in accordance as near as practicable with the general plan and suggestions for such improvements contained in the annual report of Maj. William A. Jones, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, date of July 27, 1885, on river improvements in Oregon and Washington Territory, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885; and upon the approval of such final survey, plan, and estimates by the Secretary of War, he is hereby authorized and directed to proceed with the construction of such boat-railway and the widening of such channels in accordance with such final survey and plan."

Mr. MITCHELL. Owing to the shortness of the last session and the great press of business this bill was not reached for consideration as a separate proposition. It was, however, in a somewhat modified form, but against the protest of many who thought it ought to be treated as a separate and independent proposition, away from and outside of the general bill of appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, incorporated into the river and harbor bill by the Senate; was rejected by the House, but finally retained in conference, and included in the bill as finally passed both Houses.

This bill, as we all know, failed to receive the signature of the President, and consequently all appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, including this and some other appropriations for making connections between two or more navigable waters, and which by many, including the Executive, as I am advised, are regarded as not belonging properly to a river and harbor bill, failed. Hence at the beginning of the present session I reintroduced the bill reported to the last Congress, and which, with slight modification, has been reported favorably in the substitute just read. The committee at the present session accompanies their favorable recommendation of the pending bill with a report (Senate Report No. 859, first session Fiftieth Congress) submitted by myself, in which they reaffirm in full the report of last session which has been quoted at length, and by way of supplement added the following, which I send to the desk to be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Your committee, after further and mature deliberation, adopt the foregoing as its present report, in connection with the following supplementary, supporting, and modifying suggestions.

The facts as stated in said report, in reference to the present production of the region designated as the "Inland Empire, or Great Valley of the Columbia," and the oppressive freight rates on the transportation lines referred to, are true now as then and as therein stated, except as they are modified in the one case by largely augmented production and extended area of cultivation, and to some extent in the other case, that having reference to burdensome freight rates, by virtue of the good effects of the practical operation in a certain respect and in a moderate measure of the workings of the interstate-commerce act, entitled "An act to regulate commerce," and through which freight charges have been slightly reduced in part by the voluntary action of the Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, and in part by the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

But, notwithstanding these slight modifications in the situation, your committee find that the transportation rates throughout the great valley of the Columbia are still of a nature ruinously oppressive to the producer and shipper, unreasonable and indefensible on any ground; and the interests of the people so engaged, as well as the proper development of that vast and fertile region, call loudly and emphatically upon Congress for heroic measures looking to speedy relief; and the reasons for the recommendations of your committee, made one year ago in the following language, "that the interests of the people of the Pacific Northwest imperatively demand, first, the speedy completion of the works at the mouth of the Columbia and the canal and locks at the Cascades of the Columbia, and that liberal appropriations be made therefor; and, second, that the work of constructing a boat-railway around The Dalles and Celilo Falls of the Columbia River, and of blasting open the contracted water ways at Ten and Three-mile Rapids to a width of 300 feet, so as to secure navigable water, should be entered upon without delay by the United States Government," exist to-day in full force but with stronger emphasis the same as when the former report was made.

Your committee therefore respectfully report back the accompanying bill as a substitute for bill S. 566, and recommend its passage.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, as I said, it is not my purpose to occupy the attention of the Senate with any extended remarks. What I desire is action. What the transportation-stricken people of the great Pacific Northwest desire, and have a right to expect of their representatives here, is legislative action in their interest on this important question, legislation which will speedily and effectively tend to loosen the bonds with which their industry, energy, and enterprise are fettered, and not long buncombe speeches. What the producers and shippers of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho, and of the great Pacific Northwest generally desire and have the right to expect, not only of their immediate representatives, but of Congress, is performance of promises they have had quite an abundance.

I have heretofore at different times and on various occasions sought by extended remarks to attract the attention of the Senate to the exceptional condition of affairs in the Pacific Northwest in reference not only to the territorial extent and unparalleled productiveness of that magnificent region, its richness of soil, its salubrity of climate, its great pastoral ranges, its invaluable forests, its extended wheat and other agriculture areas, its rapidly developing and fabulously rich mines, not alone of the precious metals, but of iron, coal, cinnabar, lead, limestone, marble, granite; the peculiar adaptation of its immense areas to the production of fruits of nearly every variety, including prunes, grapes, cherries, and berries of choicest character; its immense fields of the best hop-producing soil, swept by the finest hop-producing climate in the world. Not alone to all these have I on various occasions sought to attract public and legislative attention, but to the other yet more important and lamentable fact, that by reason mainly of certain exceptional and abnormal natural obstructions to navigation in the Columbia River, and the yet meager railroad facilities, and hence absence of anything like successful competition in the means of transportation, the productions of every struggling industry in that great infant empire, as well also as every article of machinery, and every pound of the necessaries of life essential to the development of these industries, and the sustenance of the people engaged therein, are burdened with a transportation charge that is unreasonable, burdensome, oppressive, and discouraging, not to say in some instances of a nature absolutely prohibitory.

To aid in a most important matter in making this state of things longer impossible, is the purpose of the pending bill. And in this connection I desire briefly to remark that exceptional cases in all departments of legislation demand, not infrequently, exceptional remedies. It is submitted furthermore that the difficulties sought to be overcome by the pending bill in connection with other important improvements now under way by the General Government at the mouth of the Columbia River, and at the Cascades of the Columbia, and the results that are expected to follow are of a nature, it is believed, wholly different from any other condition of affairs within the limits of the United States. Nor can it be said that the legislation proposed by the pending bill is not national in its scope and general purposes and effects. Why, then, do I state this to be an exceptional case and of such supreme importance and vast influence in the far-reaching benefits which it is believed will follow from this proposed legislation as to demand that it be dealt with separately and in a manner not generally followed by Congress in making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors?

I will answer. The Columbia River, one of the grandest in many respects of the rivers of the world, being, with the exceptions I shall name, majestic, wide, and deep, being over 6 miles in width at many points far inland from the sea, is, as shown by the report accompanying this bill, divided, in so far as the great purposes of navigation are concerned, into three great rivers by two obstructive formations—the one extending a distance of about 5 miles, distant from its mouth 160 miles, known as the Cascades of the Columbia; the other at The Dalles, 60 miles farther up the river, or distant about 220 miles from its mouth, where the obstructions extend for a distance of nearly 13 miles.

I can best give an idea of the character of this obstruction by reading from the report of the engineer in charge. He describes it as follows. I read from a report made by Maj. W. A. Jones, of the United States Engineer Corps:

For a distance of about 13 miles, commencing a little above the city of The Dalles, Oregon, the Columbia River is obstructed in a gigantic manner that is perfectly unique in the history of river improvements. The whole water way is choked, apparently by an intrusion of lava, through which the river has with difficulty cut a passage. At one point, over a distance of 8,000 feet, the passage is so narrow that the river is polarized, as it were, and set on edge.

The chasm has in places such widths as 125, 147, and 150 feet, and its average width is about 250 feet. Except at high-water stages, the whole volume of this great river, whose discharge varies between 77,000 cubic feet per second at low water and 257,000 cubic feet per second at high water, approximately, is forced through this narrow, precipitous gorge. In order that it shall get through, the waters are dammed up at the head until the slope becomes such as to produce an enormous velocity. Throughout the whole distance of 13 miles the water way of the river is very much contracted; at two places, Ten-Mile Rapids and Three-Mile Rapids, the minimum widths at low water are 210 feet and 190 feet, respectively.

The serious obstructions to navigation over the whole reach occur in order commencing at Celilo at the head, at Celilo Falls, Ten-Mile Rapids, The Dalles, and Three-Mile Rapids. At Celilo Falls there is a considerable fall at low water, which, however, becomes nearly obliterated at high water by the waters dammed back by The Dalles. At this point a portage of 4,500 feet will carry from good water above the falls to the same below.

Thence down to Ten-Mile Rapids the river is suitable for navigation. At this point the channel can be widened sufficiently by removing about 270,000 cubic yards of rock.

From thence to The Dalles the river again becomes suitable for navigation. At The Dalles the river might be widened to 300 feet by the removal of about 700,000 cubic yards of rock. The portage here is about 9,000 feet between good water above and below.

At Three-Mile Rapids the channel can be sufficiently widened by rock removal, and from thence no further serious obstructions exist.

With the exception of these two obstructions, the Columbia River is navigable for large-draught vessels from the sea to a point inland 1,032 miles. It also has tributaries of navigable waters for large-draught vessels a distance of over 300 miles additional, but by reason of these two obstructions, the one at the Cascades, where the General Government is now constructing a canal and locks, and the other at The Dalles of the Columbia, this great river is, in fact, divided into three great rivers, and in order to open up the Columbia River to successful and unimpeded navigation so that the products of the great inland empire of Eastern Oregon, Eastern Washington, and Idaho Territory may find their way to the sea at reasonable rates, it becomes absolutely necessary that Congress should take some proper measures to overcome the obstructions at The Dalles of the Columbia.

Various estimates have been made in pursuance of acts of Congress, and surveys have been made with a view of constructing a canal and locks, and to ascertain what other means might properly be adopted to overcome these obstructions within a reasonable time and at a reasonable cost. The result is that it is demonstrated that to construct a canal and locks around these 13 miles would involve an expenditure of over $15,000,000, most likely a much vaster sum. Eleven million dollars is, I believe, the lowest estimate that has been made.

According to the report of the engineer, taking his own words for it, it would require about one hundred years, the way appropriations are now being made for river and harbor improvements, to construct a canal and locks at The Dalles of the Columbia River. It would take three generations, and then the work perhaps would not be completed.

That being the case, the attention of the Engineer Department and of Congress as well, and also of the people directly interested, was drawn in another direction and a very elaborate and interesting report was made three years ago, in 1885, by Major Jones, of the Engineer Department, in which, after discussing the absolute impossibility, the way appropriations are made for rivers and harbors, of constructing a canal and locks at that point, he recommends a boat-railway. I will read, however, a few lines in his report before I come to that. He states in regard to a canal and locks the following:

The obvious mode of improving navigation here is to dodge these mighty obstacles by means of canals and locks; but when one considers the extensive excavations in solid basalt rock, and walls and gates of unprecedented heights that will be required to accommodate the extraordinary variations in the level of the water, the element of uncertainty combines with that of extraordinary cost and length of time required for construction, and demands a pause. Estimates have been made and submitted for building a canal to flank Celilo Falls, with blasting operations for making the river good at Ten-Mile Rapids, The Dalles, and at Three-Mile Rapids. This project is estimated to cost in round numbers $11,000,000.

If we apply to this enormous sum the rate at which funds have been provided for the Cascades Canal, it will appear that over one hundred years would be required before navigation could be opened through these obstructions. Now, there is but little doubt in my mind that ultimately the solution of this problem will be by means of these operations; but I am very strongly impressed with the conviction that the day of their construction ought to be postponed until a system of making appropriations has been adopted which will permit of their construction within a reasonable length of time, and when the resources of the country will justify the expenditure. In the mean time, if the plan I shall now propose should prove to be a sufficient solution, there will result a great saving to the public Treasury.

A BOAT RAILWAY.

This is his plan, which has, in a measure, been adopted by the pending bill:

I propose—

Says he—

to flank The Dalles and Celilo Falls with railway inclines, over which laden boats and river craft may be hauled by means of stationary engines at the summits, and to blast open the contracted water ways at Ten and Three-Mile Rapids to a width of 300 feet, which will be sufficient to reduce the velocities to a navigable status.

The proposition is not novel. It is a common thing to haul boats out of the water upon inclined railways, and the fact of their being laden will not materially affect the operation. Furthermore, its application at this same place has been advocated by engineers for many years. Lieut. T. W. Symons, Corps of Engineers, in 1881 recommended it, and makes estimates of cost in his published report upon the Columbia River.

Then he gives a detailed estimate of the cost of this proposed improvement, the sum total of which is $1,373,000, and over which it is proposed to carry boats, the total weight of the car being 170 tons, the estimated weight of the boat 100 tons, and the estimated weight of the load 500 tons.

When I call the attention of the Senate to the fact of the great difference between high and low water mark at The Dalles of the Columbia, and at Celilo, the upper end of this obstruction, the great difficulty in overcoming this obstruction will be appreciated. The difference between high and low water mark at The Dalles is 87 feet—that is at the head of The Dalles. At Celilo it is 28.3 feet; at the foot of Celilo Falls it is 72.3 feet; at the head of The Dalles it is 87 feet; at the foot of The Dalles it is 66.6 feet; at Dalles City it is 53.2 feet.

Mr. President, all these things have been carefully considered by the committee under the instructions of the Senate, and this bill is the result of their investigation. I could talk at length as to the necessity of this improvement. I could point out the enormous freight charges on that river and on the railroad on its banks, but I shall not detain the Senate. This is all fully set out in the report accompanying this bill. I could point to the immense area of the country that is to be benefited locally, to say nothing of the immense advantages in a national point of view.

The wheat traffic alone along the Columbia River now is over 600,000 tons per year. This great wheat area that must be reached by this improvement, where twelve years ago there were not 100,000 bushels of wheat raised, produced for shipment the past year over 400,000 tons of wheat; and yet not one-tenth of the cultivable land is under cultivation. Yet that vast country has a population of less than 2 persons to each square mile, whereas in Massachusetts I believe the population is two hundred and some odd to the square mile—230 perhaps—while the average population to the square mile in the United States is 9 or 10.

This traffic is now subject to a freight tax of about 3 cents per ton per mile, which on an average haul of 200 miles is a tax on the producer and shipper of $6,000,000 annually on the present product, while on an average haul of 300 miles between Portland, Oregon, Eastern Oregon, Eastern Washington Territory, and Western Idaho the freight tax annually on producers and shippers will be about $9,000,000.

By the completion of a canal and locks at the Cascades and the completion of the proposed boat railway and accompanying improvements at The Dalles, it is safe to predict that the freight charges will be reduced to at least one-half of 1 per cent. per ton per mile. On an average haul, therefore, of about 200 miles, on the estimate of freight I have just stated, to say nothing of through shipments, it would relieve the shippers of freight in Eastern Oregon, Eastern Washington, and Idaho of a tax of about $5,000,000 annually.

The reduction in freight charges by these improvements would not be so great as I have indicated if the rates should not go below 1 per cent. per ton per mile; but even then the rates would be extravagantly high compared with the rates in States and Territories east of the Rocky Mountains. The saving to the people even in that case would be about $4,000,000 annually on an average haul of 200 miles, or a saving of $6,000,000 annually on an average haul of 300 miles.

Mr. President, I promised not to take up the time of the Senate at any length. I have heretofore elaborated this subject. To do justice to the people I in part represent, to do justice to the people of the great Pacific Northwest, who have felt but lightly so far the help of the beneficent hand of the General Government, I should perhaps occupy the attention of the Senate for hours, but I shall not do so. I feel that after the investigation which has been made, and the unanimous report which has been submitted by this committee, the bill will meet with favor at the hands of the Senate, and therefore I shall not take up the time of the Senate further, and hope we may have a vote on the passage of the pending bill, which appropriates one-half a million dollars to be used in making a final and permanent survey for and the commencement of the work of constructing a boat railway around the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles and Celilo Falls of the Columbia River. The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to, and the bill as amended, appropriating $500,000, was passed.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, this bill has the unanimous indorsement of the committee from which it was reported, and I do not feel like taking up the time of the Senate in discussing it. During the last Congress I addressed the Senate at some length in regard to this measure, or at least the proposition to improve the Dalles and Celilo Rapids with a boat railway. I shall not repeat what I then said.

I merely desire to say now that I indorse all that has been said by my colleague in regard to the importance and urgency of this improvement and as to the practicability of the plan of improvement which is foreshadowed in the bill. There is no more important improvement to-day demanding the attention of Congress upon any of the rivers or navigable waters of the United States. There is, in my judgment, no other improvement in the United States of a navigable water way which will be of so great advantage to so many people and so large an area of country as the proposed improvement of the Columbia River.

As I said before, I shall not take up the time of the Senate by making any remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the substitute proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FLORIDA KENNERLY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate bill 1078 is the first bill in order on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

The bill (S. 1078) for the relief of Florida Kennerly was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Mrs. Florida Kennerly $126.60.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORT OF DULUTH.

The bill (S. 1625) to amend section 7 of the act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend section 7 of the act of June 10, 1880, by inserting immediately before the proviso of the section and immediately after the word "Florida," where the same occurs in the section, the words "Duluth, in Minnesota."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS A. OSBORN.

Mr. SPOONER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2216) for the relief of Thomas A. Osborn having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate.

JOHN C. SPOONER,
GEORGE F. HOAR,
CHARLES J. FAULKNER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. P. TAULBEE,
C. H. MANSUR,
DANIEL KERR,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

PORT OF TRENTON.

The bill (H. R. 1640) changing the name of the port of Lamberton, in the district of Burlington, N. J., to the port of Trenton, in said district, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

The bill (S. 1786) to regulate appointments in the Marine-Hospital Service of the United States was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know what changes the bill proposes to make in the existing law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was reported by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who is now absent by leave of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it retain its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT CLINTON, IOWA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1882) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Clinton, Iowa.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, after the word "river" at the end of line 15, to strike out "beyond what is necessary in order to carry into effect the rights and privileges hereby granted;" in line 20, after the words "district in," to strike out "which" and insert "whose jurisdiction;" and in line 20, after the word "obstruction," to strike out "touches" and insert "may be;" so as to make the section read:

That the Clinton and Illinois Bridge Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Iowa, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct and maintain, if in the opinion of the Secretary of War the same be a public necessity, a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at a place suitable to the interests of navigation, at a point at or near the city of Clinton, Iowa, and to lay on or over said bridge a track or tracks for the more perfect connection of any railroad or railroads that are or shall be constructed to said river, on either or both sides thereof, at or opposite said point, under the limitations and conditions hereinafter provided; that said bridge shall not interfere with the free navigation of said river, and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, the cause may be tried before the circuit court of the United States in and for any district in whose jurisdiction any portion of said bridge or obstruction may be. Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railroad trains, and for the safe and convenient passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, animals, and foot-passengers, for such reasonable rates of toll as may be fixed from time to time by the Secretary of War: Provided, That the proviso regarding wagons, animals, foot-passengers, etc., shall not influence the location of said bridge in its relation to the interests of navigation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 5, after the word "shall," to strike out the words:

Give clear head-room of not less, in any case, than 55½ feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, nor shall the spans of said bridge give a clear width of water way of less than 250 feet, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of said river, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river and give a clear width of water way of not less than 300 feet.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Have one or more channel spans, each having not less than 350 feet clear channel-way, and not less than 55 feet clear head-room above high-water mark, and the clear head-room under other than channel spans may be less than 55 feet: Provided, That no part of the superstructure of such spans shall give a less head-room than 10 feet above high-water mark: And provided further, That the interests of navigation be not injured by such reduction in height; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current and the bridge itself at right angles thereto.

So as to make the section read:

That any bridge built under the provisions of this act may, at the option of the company building the same, be built as a ponton draw-bridge or with unbroken and continuous spans: Provided, That if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, it shall have one or more channel spans, each having not less than 350 feet clear channel-way, and not less than 55 feet clear head-room above high-water mark, and the clear head-room under other than channel spans may be less than 55 feet: Provided, That no part of the superstructure of such spans shall give a less head-room than 10 feet above high-water mark: And provided further, That the interests of navigation be not injured by such reduction in height; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current and the bridge itself at right-angles thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 25, after the word "draw-bridge," to strike out the words:

The same shall be constructed as a pivot draw-bridge, with a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point, and with spans giving a clear width of water way of not less than 200 feet on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw, and the next adjoining span or spans to the draw shall give a clear width of water way of not less than 250 feet: Provided, That if the pivot-pier of said bridge shall be constructed within less than 410 feet of the west shore of said river the span constructed west of said pivot pier may be less than 250 feet, and said span shall give a clear head room of not less than 10 feet above extreme high-water mark; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river where said bridge shall be erected.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And shall have two or more draw-openings, each having not less than 200 feet clear channel-way; and in addition to said draw-openings shall have one or more fixed channel spans, each having not less than 350 feet clear channel-way; and every part of the superstructure shall have a clear head-room of not less than 10 feet above high-water mark: Provided, That all spans of both high and low bridges shall be so located as to afford the greatest possible accommodation to the river traffic, and a draw-opening of low bridges shall, if practicable, be located next or near shore: Provided also, That in case of a low bridge, if the physical characteristics of the locality so require and the interests of navigation be not injured thereby, the lengths of fixed spans or the number of draw-openings may be reduced: Provided also, That for any two adjacent draw-openings of 200 feet each, one draw-opening of 300 feet may be substituted if the interests of navigation be not injured thereby.

So as to make the clause read:

And provided further, That if any bridge built under the provisions of this act shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, and shall have two or more draw-openings, each having not less than 200 feet clear channel-way; and in addition to said draw-openings shall have one or more fixed channel spans, each having not less than 350 feet clear channel-way; and every part of the superstructure shall have a clear head-room of not less than 10 feet above high-water mark: Provided, That all spans of both high and low bridges shall be so located as to afford the greatest possible accommodation to the river traffic, and a draw-opening of low bridges shall, if practicable, be located next or near shore: Provided also, That in case of a low bridge, if the physical characteristics of the locality so require and the interests of navigation be not injured thereby, the lengths of fixed spans or the number of draw-openings may be reduced: Provided also, That for any two adjacent draw-openings of 200 feet each, one draw-opening of 300 feet may be substituted if the interests of navigation be not injured thereby.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 63, after the word "subject," to strike out "except as herein modified;" and in line 68, after the date "1874," to strike out "so far as they may be applicable thereto;" so as to read:

And provided further, That if any bridge built under the provisions of this act shall be constructed as a ponton bridge, it shall be built subject to all the terms, requirements, and limitations contained in the act entitled "An act to legalize and establish a ponton railway bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien, and to authorize the construction of a similar bridge at or near Clinton, Iowa," approved June 6, 1874.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the words "And provided also," in line 69 of section 2, to strike out the words:

That it shall be constructed with one suitable ponton draw of not less than 500 feet in width, located over the main channel of the river, which shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passage of boats, and as herein provided for a draw-bridge.

And insert:

Such bridge may be provided with a ponton draw giving not less than 400 feet clear channel-way for each navigable channel of the river, and such other openings for the passage of rafts and logs as, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, may be necessary: And provided further, That the pile and ponton bridge shall be subject to all restrictions as regards plans, location, and accessories provided for in case of high and low bridges so far as they are applicable to such kind of bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 35, after the words "prescribed by the," to strike out "Secretary of War" and insert "Light-House Board;" after the word "changed," at the end of line 36, to strike out "or removed;" in line 38, after the word "time," to insert "or entirely removed;" in the same line, after the word "as," to strike out "Congress" and insert "the Secretary of War;" in line 42, after the word "good," to strike out "shall;" after the words "judgment of," at the end of the same line, to strike out "Congress" and insert "the Secretary of War;" and in line 43, after the word "so," to strike out "require" and insert "requires;" so as to read:

And for the safety of vessels passing at night there shall be displayed on said bridge, from the hours of sunset to sunrise, such lights as may be prescribed by the Light-House Board; and the said structure shall be changed at the cost and expense of the owners thereof, from time to time, or entirely removed, as the Secretary of War may direct, so as to preserve the free and convenient navigation of said river; and the authority to erect and continue said bridge shall be subject to revocation and modification by law, when the public good, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, so requires, without any expense or charge to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 2, after the word "with," to strike out "two years" and insert "one year;" and in line 3, before the word "years," to strike out "four" and insert "three;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized shall not be commenced within one year from the passage of this act, and be completed in three years from the same date, the rights and privileges hereby granted shall cease and be determined.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF WILLIAM KENDALL.

The bill (S. 1242) for the relief of the legal representatives of Maj. William Kendall was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the account of William Kendall, deceased, as a sutler at Fort Columbus, New York Harbor, for articles furnished by him to soldiers there recruited or stationed during the period from the 1st of January, 1867, to the 31st of December, 1868, inclusive.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was under the impression before reading the report just now that this bill was simply to pay to this sutler the amount that the Government deducted from the pay of the recruits. I find from the copy of the report which was made in the Forty-ninth Congress that the office of sutler had been abolished, but this man was remaining on duty by consent or agreement of the officers and gave credit to recruits, and the amounts were never charged to the soldiers on their muster-rolls.

Mr. STEWART. That was true in regard to——

Mr. COCKRELL. The Government never received a cent, and this is to make the Government responsible for the debts of recruits because the officers did not charge them up against the recruits and pay the sutler.

Mr. STEWART. My recollection is that a part of it is as the Senator has stated. Some goods were furnished to the soldiers under a regulation of the Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was up to July 1, 1867.

Mr. STEWART. A part of the time the goods were furnished that way, and after that time, by order of the commanding officer, the sutler was allowed to continue the same practice for some months. Then the soldiers were taken away. The amounts had been charged to them on the descriptive roll, but when they were transferred to companies the sums were not deducted from their pay. The Government did not receive the money, and if it is paid it must be paid out of the Treasury on the ground that under the circumstances the officers ought to have transferred the amounts from the descriptive roll to the muster-roll. It is certain that the beneficiaries of the bill should be paid up to the time the law was changed.

Mr. COCKRELL. That would be up to the 1st of July, 1867.

Mr. STEWART. It was done by order of the officer, and as the sutler appeared to be acting in good faith the committee thought his estate ought to have the whole amount due. These are the facts, and the Senate can act on them.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill seems to be going beyond what ought to be done. The office of sutler was abolished July 1, 1867, and I see the text of the bill proposes to give not only from the 1st of January, 1867, up to the 1st of July of that year, but also to give eighteen months beyond that time, up to the 31st day of December, 1868. That is going a little too far. I do not know what the amount would be.

Mr. STEWART. The amount is small. I do not know exactly what it is, but I know it is small. Under the circumstances, the sutler having been permitted to do this by the officers, it having been the established practice at that station so long, and as he had been there a long time and was a very honest, correct man, the committee thought that it was not the fair thing to cut off the accounts after the sutler had invested his money and furnished the supplies. Those are the simple facts. I have nothing further to say. I think that the bill proposes to give a proper allowance.

Mr. COCKRELL. It strikes me that we ought to limit it to the time when he was a lawful sutler and not after that. He was a mere trader after that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection and no amendment, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is open to amendment in the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. In lines 8 and 9 of section 1, after the words "to the," I move to strike out "31st day of December, 1868," and insert "first day of July, 1867;" so as to read:

For articles furnished by him to soldiers there recruited or stationed during the period from the first day of January, 1867, to the first day of July, 1867, inclusive.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think that is quite fair. I shall vote against the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

WARREN C. ALDEN.

The bill (S. 1871) to perfect the military record of Warren C. Alden was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to enter on the rolls of Company C, Fourth Independent Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, the name of Warren C. Alden, with a statement of the fact that he entered the United States service as a private on the 10th day of July, 1863, and performed faithful and patriotic services as such private in Company C, Fourth Independent Battalion Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, until October 10th of said year, and was then compelled to leave the Army because he was under the age that entitled him to be mustered into the United States service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2030) in relation to bridge of Forest City and Watertown Railroad Company.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 2, line 3, after the word "river," to strike out "beyond what is necessary to carry into effect the rights and privileges hereby granted;" so as to read:

That said bridge shall be constructed and built without interference with the security and convenience of navigation of said river; and in order to secure that object the said corporation shall submit to the Secretary of War, for his examination and approval, a design and drawings of the bridge, and a map of the location, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 24, after the word "river," to insert "and the bridge itself at right angles thereto;" so as to read:

Provided, That if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans it shall not be of less elevation in any case than 50 feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to be the lowest part of the structure of the bridge, nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than 300 feet in length, and the piers of said bridge be parallel with the current of said river, and the bridge itself at right angles thereto, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river and not less than 300 feet in length.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 8, before the words "said bridge," to strike out "an erection of" and insert "erect;" so as to read:

And upon receiving such notification the said company may proceed to erect said bridge, conforming strictly to the approved plan and location.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 11, after the word "and," to strike out "Congress reserves the right at any time to regulate, by appropriate legislation," and insert "the Secretary of War may, if he thinks proper, establish;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That the said bridge and accessory works, when built and constructed under this act and according to the terms and limitations thereof, shall be lawful structures; and said bridge shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transmission over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to such bridge, and said bridge shall enjoy the rights and privileges of other post-routes in the United States; and the Secretary of War may, if he thinks proper, establish the charges for freight and passengers over said bridge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 7. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the approval of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at Forest City, Dakota, by the Forest City and Watertown Railway Company."

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT MUSCATINE, IOWA.

The bill (S. 1883) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Muscatine, Iowa, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 5, after the word "maintain," to strike out "if in the opinion of the Secretary of War the same be a public necessity;" in line 7, after the word "Mississippi," to insert "River;" in line 15, after the word "necessary," to strike out "in order to carry into effect the rights and privileges hereby granted;" in line 19, after the words "district in," to strike out "which" and insert "whose jurisdiction," and after the word "obstruction," at the end of line 20, to strike out "touches" and insert "may be;" so as to make the section read:

That the Muscatine Bridge Company, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at a place suitable to the interests of navigation, at a point at or near the city of Muscatine, Iowa, and to lay on or over said bridge a track or tracks for the more perfect connection of any railroad or railroads that are or shall be constructed to said river, on either or both sides thereof, at or opposite said point, under the limitations and conditions hereinafter provided; that said bridge shall not interfere with the free navigation of said river beyond what is necessary, and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, the cause may be tried before the circuit court of the United States in and for any district in whose jurisdiction any portion of said bridge or obstruction may be.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 27, after the word "not," to strike out "influence" and insert "affect;" so as to read:

Said bridge shall be constructed to provide for the passage of railroad trains, and for the safe and convenient passage of wagons and vehicles of all kinds, animals, and foot passengers, for such reasonable rates of toll as may be fixed from time to time by the Secretary of War: Provided, That the proviso regarding wagons, animals, foot passengers, etc., shall not affect the location of said bridge in its relation to the interests of navigation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 5, after the word "shall," to strike out the words:

Give clear head-room of not less, in any case, than 55½ feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, nor shall the spans of said bridge give a clear width of water way of less than 250 feet, and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of said river, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river and give a clear width of water way of not less than 300 feet.

And insert in lieu thereof:

Have one or more channel spans, each having not less than 350 feet clear channel-way, and not less than 55 feet clear head-room above high-water mark, and the clear head-room under other than channel spans may be less than 55 feet: Provided, That no part of the superstructure of such spans shall give a less head-room than 10 feet above high-water mark: And provided further, That the interests of navigation be not injured by such reduction in height.

So as to read:

That any bridge built under the provisions of this act may, at the option of the company building the same, be built as a draw-bridge or with unbroken and continuous spans: Provided, That if the said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous spans, it shall have one or more channel spans, each having not less than 350 feet clear channel-way, and not less than 55 feet clear head-room above high-water mark, and the clear head-room under other than channel spans may be less than 55 feet: Provided, That no part of the superstructure of such spans shall give a less head-room than 10 feet above high-water mark: And provided further, That the interests of navigation be not injured by such reduction in height.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 24, after the word "draw-bridge," to strike out the words:

With a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point and with spans giving a clear width of water way of not less than 200 feet on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw, and the next adjoining span or spans to the draw shall give a clear width of water way of not less than 250 feet: Provided, That if the pivot pier of said bridge shall be constructed within less than 410 feet of the west shore of said river the span constructed west of said pivot pier may be less than 250 feet, and said spans shall give a clear head-room of not less than 10 feet above extreme high-water mark.

And insert in lieu thereof:

Which shall have two or more draw-openings, each having not less than 200 feet clear channel-way, and in addition to said draw-openings, shall have one or more fixed channel-spans, each having not less than 350 clear channel-way; and every part of the superstructure of said low bridge shall give a clear head-room of not less than 10 feet above high-water mark: Provided, That all spans of both high and low bridges shall be so located as to afford the greatest possible accommodation to the river traffic, and a draw-opening of the low bridge shall, if practicable, be located next or near the shore: Provided also, That in case of a low bridge, if the physical characteristics of the locality so require, and the interests of navigation be not injured thereby, the lengths of the fixed spans, or the number of draw-openings, may be reduced: Provided also, That for any two adjacent draw-openings of 200 feet one draw-opening of 300 feet may be substituted, if the interests of navigation be not injured thereby.

So as to read:

And provided further, That if any bridge built under the provisions of this act shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the same shall be constructed as a pivot draw-bridge which shall have two or more draw-openings, each having not less than 200 feet clear channel-way, and in addition to said draw-openings shall have one or more fixed channel-spans, each having not less than 350 feet clear channel-way; and every part of the superstructure of said low bridge shall give a clear head-room of not less than 10 feet above high-water mark: Provided, That all spans of both high and low bridges shall be so located as to afford the greatest possible accommodation to the river traffic, and a draw-opening of the low bridge shall, if practicable, be located next or near the shore: Provided also, That in case of a low bridge, if the physical characteristics of the locality so require, and the interests of navigation be not injured thereby, the lengths of the fixed spans, or the number of draw-openings, may be reduced: Provided also, That for any two adjacent draw-openings of 200 feet one draw-opening of 300 feet may be substituted, if the interests of navigation be not injured thereby.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 55, after the word "erected," to insert "and the bridge itself at right-angles thereto;" so as to read:

And the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river where said bridge shall be erected, and the bridge itself at right-angles thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 35, after the words "by the," to strike out "Secretary of War" and insert "Light-House Board;" in line 38, after the word "as," to strike out "Congress" and insert "the Secretary of War;" in line 41, after the word "modification," to strike out "by law;" in line 42, after the word "good," to strike out "shall;" in the same line, after the words "judgment of," to strike out "Congress" and insert "Secretary of War;" and in line 43, after the word "so," to strike out "require" and insert "requires;" so as to read:

And the said structure shall be at all times so kept and managed as to offer reasonable and proper means for the passage of vessels through or under said structure; and for the safety of vessels passing at night there shall be displayed on said bridge, from the hours of sunset to sunrise, such lights as may be prescribed by the Light-House Board; and the said structure shall be changed or removed at the cost and expense of the owners thereof from time to time, as the Secretary of War may direct, so as to preserve the free and convenient navigation of said river; and the authority to erect and continue said bridge shall be subject to revocation and modification when the public good, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, so requires, without any expense or charge to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 2, after the word "within," to strike out "two years" and insert "one year;" and in line 3, after the words "completed in," to strike out "four" and insert "three;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized shall not be commenced within one year from the passage of this act, and be completed in three years from the same date, the rights and privileges hereby granted shall cease and be determined.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE OVER RED RIVER OF THE NORTH.

The bill (H. R. 2528) authorizing the construction of a railroad bridge across the Red River of the North by the North Dakota and Pacific Railway Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments: In section 5, line 2, after the word "all," to strike out "materials" and insert "material;" in line 5, after the word "by," to strike out "Congress" and insert "the Secretary of War;" and in line 7, after the word "act," to insert "or its entire removal when completed;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act, so as to prevent or remove all material and substantial obstructions to the navigation of said river by the construction of the said bridge, is hereby expressly reserved; and any alterations or changes that may be required by the Secretary of War in the bridge constructed under this act, or its entire removal when completed, shall be made by the corporation owning or controlling the same at its own expense; and if said bridge shall not be commenced in one year and be finished within three years from the passage of this act, the rights and privileges hereby granted shall be null and void.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

W. W. AVERELL.

The bill (S. 1650) for the relief of Maj. Gen. W. W. Averell was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 10, to strike out the word "colonel" and insert "captain;" so as to make the bill read:

That in view of the long and faithful services of Bvt. Maj. Gen. William W. Averell, United States Army, before and during the late war, and of severe wounds received by him in battle, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint William W. Averell, brevet major-general United States Army and late brigadier-general United States Volunteers, to the position of captain in the Army of the United States, and to place him on the retired-list of the Army as of that grade, the retired-list being thereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That from and after the passage of this act no pension shall be paid to the said William W. Averell, nor shall any compensation be paid to him for any period prior to his appointment under this act; but this proviso shall be no bar to any claims for pension that the widow or children or other heirs of the said William W. Averell may have after his decease.

Mr. BUTLER. I shall want to submit an amendment to the bill. I see that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] who made the report is not in his seat. I therefore ask that the bill may go over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BUTLER. I am in favor of the bill, but I wish to suggest an amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask the nature of the amendment? It is possible we may agree on it.

Mr. BUTLER. I propose to non-concur in the amendments of the Committee on Military Affairs and to take the bill as it was introduced and referred to the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. In other words, to retire him with the rank of colonel instead of captain?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, that is my object; but I do not desire to move that amendment in the absence of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HAWLEY. I certainly personally have no objection, but the Military Committee came to the conclusion that he had better be placed on the retired-list with the rank that the officer held at the time of retirement. It is true Congress did pass such a bill once, and it failed to receive the President's approval, because he had committed himself in the Fitz-John Porter case to a principle that required him not to sign the bill. Both Houses passed a bill giving this gentleman the rank of brigadier-general on the retired-list because he held the command of brigadier-general and brevet major-general in the volunteer service.

If the Senator from South Carolina desires to make that amendment, however, I think it may be better that the bill lie over to-day, so that the Senator who has it particularly in charge may be present.

Mr. BUTLER. That is all I desire. Let the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

VOLUNTEER SIGNAL SERVICE OBSERVERS.

The bill (S. 2377) providing for the issue gratuitously of certain meteorological instruments to voluntary observers at present recognized in the Signal Service was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Chief Signal Officer of the Army to issue gratuitously to reliable voluntary observers one set of thermometers, one rain-gauge, and measuring-stick. But the number of such issues shall not exceed one to each county where such observations are not obtainable, and these instruments shall be issued only to such observers as agree to make, free of expense to the United States, monthly reports of observations for at least one year to the Chief Signal Officer of the Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INSPECTORS OF HULLS AND BOILERS.

The bill (S. 2393) to fix the compensation of inspectors of hulls and boilers in certain districts of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to fix the annual salary of the inspectors of hulls and the inspectors of boilers for the districts of Albany, Michigan, and Superior at $1,500 each; and of the inspector of hulls and the inspector of boilers for the district of Apalachicola at $1,200 each.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN POWERS.

The bill (H. R. 6800) for the relief of John Powers was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "discharge," to strike out the words "subject to the laws and regulations of the War Department," and to insert "as of date November 19, 1862;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove from the record of John Powers, late a member of Elgin Battery, Illinois Light Artillery, any charge of desertion that may exist against him as a member of said Elgin Battery and issue to him an honorable discharge as of date November 19, 1862.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CHICAGO, KANSAS AND WESTERN RAILWAY.

The bill (S. 1903) granting the right of way through the Fort Riley military reservation, Kansas, to the Chicago, Kansas and Western Railway Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JUNCTION CITY AND FORT RILEY STREET RAILWAY COMPANY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1969) granting right of way to the Junction City and Fort Riley Street Railway Company into and upon the Fort Riley military reservation, in the State of Kansas, and for other purposes.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments in section 2, line 3, after the word "War," to strike out "or such person or persons as he may designate;" in line 6, before the word "exclusive," to insert the words "have the;" in the same line, after the word "use," to insert "of the same;" and in line 7, after the word "War," to strike out "or such person or persons as he may designate;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the location and terminus of this railway within said reservation shall be made with, and subject to, the approval of the Secretary of War, and authority is hereby granted said street railway company to construct a bridge for this purpose and have the exclusive use of the same over said Republican River, at a point to be selected by said Secretary of War, and to land the north end of this said bridge on said reservation and within 500 feet west of said Union Pacific Railroad bridge.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES O'ROURKE.

The bill (S. 1599) correcting the military record of Lieut. James O'Rourke was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That in view of the recommendation of the general court-martial in the case of James O'Rourke, late first lieutenant of the Fourth Regiment of New York Heavy Artillery Volunteers, to executive clemency, and of his former very excellent character as an officer and a gentleman, during a service of over seven years both in the regular and volunteer service, the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to issue to James O'Rourke a certificate of honorable discharge as first lieutenant of said Fourth Regiment of New York Heavy Artillery Volunteers, as of the date of September 22, 1865, notwithstanding the sentence of said court-martial.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUMMONS IN DISTRICT TENANCY CASES.

The bill (H. R. 3290) to amend section 685 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in line 14, before the word "years," to strike out "twelve" and insert "sixteen;" so as to make the bill read:

That section numbered 685 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 685. The summons shall be served like other writs of summons at least seven days before the appearance of the party complained of, but in case such party has left the District of Columbia, or can not be found, said summons may be served by delivering a written or printed, or partly written and partly printed copy thereof to the tenant, or to the agent or attorney of the defendant if he be known, or leaving the same with some person of suitable discretion above the age of sixteen years residing on or in possession of the premises; and in case no one is in actual possession of said premises or residing thereon, then by posting a copy of said summons on the premises where it may be conveniently read."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES MURPHY.

The bill (S. 661) for the relief of Charles Murphy was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the claim of Charles Murphy be remanded to the Court of Claims for a further hearing upon the testimony and papers formerly heard in said court, and upon such further testimony, including the claimant's evidence, as either party may file, pursuant to the rules of the court; and said court, in addition to the authority conferred upon it by existing laws, shall have equitable jurisdiction of all matters presented by the claimant in a new petition, to be filed within sixty days from the approval of this act; and said court is authorized and directed to render judgment for such amount as right and justice may demand, without reference to any statutes of limitation: Provided, That an appeal shall lie from such judgment to the Supreme Court of the United States, by either party, upon the entire record of law and fact considered by the Court of Claims.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS C. DICKEY.

The bill (H. R. 484) for the relief of Thomas C. Dickey was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Thomas C. Dickey, late postmaster at Murphy, N. C., $275.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM CLIFT.

The bill (S. 90) for the relief of William Clift was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William Clift, of Hamilton County, Tennessee, $3,000, for wood taken and used by the Army of the United States during the late war.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

L. A. DAVIS.

The bill (S. 2410) for the relief of L. A. Davis was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It refers to the Court of Claims the petition and papers of L. A. Davis, of Chehalis, Wash., in which he claims $14,844 for services in carrying the English mails both ways over mail route No. 15406, between Olympia and Monticello, in Washington Territory, from about August 1, 1868, to June 30, 1870, and the court is given jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim and render judgment for such sum as the claimant may be reasonably and equitably entitled to for and on account of extra services rendered by him on this mail route in transporting the English mails. No statute of limitations or other legal defense is to be available in the case.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL LIFE-SAVING STATIONS.

The bill (S. 705) to establish additional life-saving stations was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the provisions of this bill are incorporated in a bill that has passed the House of Representatives, and has already passed the Senate. If there be no objection, this bill will be passed over without prejudice.

ARBITRATION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND TEXAS.

The bill (H. R. 4375) to create a board of arbitration to settle and determine the controversy between the United States and the State of Texas relating to certain territory by them respectively claimed was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments. The first amendment was, after the word "Texas," in the second line of the preamble, to strike out the word "over" and insert "concerning;" in the same line, after the word "that," to strike out "territory" and insert "tract of land;" and in the sixth line, after the word "county," to insert "and on the National Atlas by Gray (1879) as part of the Indian Territory;" so as to make the clause read:

Whereas a controversy exists between the United States and the State of Texas concerning the title to that tract of land lying between the North and South Forks of Red River, east of the one hundredth degree of longitude, the same being designated on the maps of Texas as Greer County and on the National Atlas by Gray (1879) as part of the Indian Territory.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORTRESS MONROE.

The bill (S. 1177) for the erection of a public building at Fortress Monroe was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SACRAMENTO, CAL.

The bill (S. 1554) to increase the appropriation for the erection of the public building at Sacramento, Cal., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 6, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "one;" so as to make the section read:

That the amount heretofore fixed as the limit of cost for the erection of a public building, by the United States Government, at Sacramento, Cal., be, and the same is hereby, increased to $150,000, and that sum is hereby fixed as the limit of cost for the erection of said building, including site.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 1, before the word "sum," to insert "additional;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the additional sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used and expended for the purposes provided in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POSTAL CRIMES.

The bill (H. R. 7052) relating to postal crimes, and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with an amendment, at the end of section 2 to insert:

And all matter otherwise mailable by law upon the envelope or outside cover or wrapper of which, or postal card, upon which indecent, lewd, lascivious, obscene, libelous, scurrilous, or threatening delineations, epithets, terms, or language, or reflecting injuriously upon the character or conduct of another, may be written or printed, are hereby declared to be non-mailable matter, and shall not be conveyed in the mails, nor delivered from any post-office nor by any letter-carrier; and any person who shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery anything declared by this section to be non-mailable matter, and any person who shall knowingly take the same or cause the same to be taken from the mails, for the purpose of circulating or disposing of or of aiding in the circulation or disposition of the same, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, for each and every offense, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or imprisoned at hard labor not less than one year nor more than ten years, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

C. A. WILLIAMS AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 2411) for the relief of C. A. Williams and others was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Navy to inquire into the loss and damage caused to C. A. Williams & Co., owners of the schooners Roswell King and Era, by reason of the rescue and support of the crew of the schooner Isabella, shipwrecked in the Arctic seas in the year 1884, and provides for the payment of the amount so found, not exceeding $13,506.33, to C. A. Williams & Co., on the certificate of the Secretary of the Navy.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE GREELY EXPEDITION.

The bill (S. 961) for the presentation of badges to the officers and men of the Greely relief expedition was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Navy to procure and present to Commander Winfield Scott Schley and his officers and men, respectively, suitable badges to be worn by them as an expression of the high estimation in which Congress holds their services upon the expedition for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, in the year 1884, and appropriates a sufficient sum for that purpose.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the officers and men of this expedition deserve some notice from Congress. That they have not hitherto received it is due to the fact that a bill was introduced granting the thanks of Congress to the officers and men of the expedition. As is well known to Senators, a resolution of thanks of Congress carries with it certain results in the way of exemption from retirement, which it has not been thought advisable to give to the officers and men of this expedition. Moreover, it has been customary to reserve the thanks of Congress for naval and military heroes who have distinguished themselves in battle with the enemy. The proposition to give the thanks of Congress to the officers and men of this expedition, therefore, was dropped, and there has been substituted for it this simple proposition to grant badges to the officers and men without discrimination.

On the return of this expedition, on the 4th day of August, 1884, at Portsmouth, I gave a brief narrative of the expedition, which I desire to incorporate in my remarks, if there be no objection, and also to print the order of the Navy Department issued on the 5th day of August, 1884, announcing the return, commending the officers and men, and giving a list of their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. This is what I said on the occasion referred to:

In August, 1881, a United States signal station for Arctic observation and exploration was established at Lady Franklin Bay in Grinnell Land by a party carried and left there by the steam-sealer Proteus, composed of Lieut. A. W. Greely, of the Fifth United States Cavalry; Lieut. Frederick F. Kislingbury, of the Eleventh Infantry, Lieut. James B. Lockwood, of the Twenty-third Infantry; Acting Ass. Surg. Octave Pavy, and twenty-one non-commissioned officers and privates of the command, including two Eskimo.

It was promised by the Government that a vessel should visit the station during the summer of 1882, and that, if she failed to reach it, a relief ship should again be sent in 1883.

The instructions of the Chief Signal Officer, dated June 17, 1881, directed Lieutenant Greely, if not visited in 1882, "to abandon his station not later than September 1, 1883," and to "retreat southward by boat, following closely the east coast of Grinnell Land, until the relieving vessel is met or Littleton Island is reached."

A letter from Lieutenant Greely, written August 17, 1881, and brought by the Proteus from Lady Franklin Bay, specified the depots of supplies which he wished the relief ships to attempt to make, and stated that the relief party of 1883 "should then proceed to establish a winter station at Polaris winter quarters, Life Boat Cove (at Littleton Island), where their main duty would be to keep their telescopes on Cape Sabine and the land to the northward."

Between July 28 and September 2, 1882, the steamer Neptune, under Mr. William M. Beebe, jr., of the Signal Service, proceeded into Smith's Sound, but the ice failed to sufficiently open into Kennedy Channel, and the vessel returned, having left a few provisions at Cape Sabine and Littleton Island.

In 1883 the Proteus was again employed by the Chief Signal Officer for the voyage to Lady Franklin Bay, and placed in charge of Lieut. E. A. Garlington, of the Seventh United States Cavalry, and the steamer Yantic, of the United States Navy, commanded by Commander Frank Wildes, was detailed as a tender to accompany the Proteus as far as Littleton Island.

Lieutenant Garlington was informed by letter of the Chief Signal Officer of June 4, 1883, of the extreme peril of Lieutenant Greely and his party, was enjoined to spare no effort to push his vessel through to Lady Franklin Bay, and was also instructed as follows:

If it should become clearly apparent that the vessel can not be pushed through, you will retreat from your advanced position and land your party and stores at or near Life Boat Cove (at Littleton Island), discharge the relief vessel with orders to return to St. John's, Newfoundland, and prepare for remaining with your party until relieved next year.

Lieutenant Garlington was further instructed, as soon as possible, from this station at Littleton Island, to endeavor to communicate with Lieutenant Greely by sledge parties; the men not so employed to lose no time in preparing a house for the whole party and in securing the stores preparatory to the arrival of Lieutenant Greely.

The Proteus and Yantic were together at St. John's on June 27, and an agreement was made between Lieutenant Garlington and Commander Wildes contemplating their separation until August 25, but that the Yantic should go to Littleton Island, which should be the "headquarters," and should not leave there before that day. The Proteus preceded the Yantic to Disco Island, but the Yantic rejoined her, and they were together there from July 12 to July 15, at which latter date the Proteus once more left her tender, which, after waiting until the 26th, again sailed northward.

Instead of proceeding directly in the track of the Proteus, however, she diverged to Upernavik; was detained there by fogs from July 27 to 31, when she sailed, and was easily able to reach Littleton Island August 3. She there found, from records left, that the Proteus, on July 23, had been crushed in the ice and had sunk just north of Cape Sabine; that Lieutenant Garlington and his whole party had crossed to Littleton Island, and on July 28 had gone south, along the Greenland coast, in open boats. The Yantic thereupon turned southward, searching the coast of Cape York, and finding no traces of the Proteus people, went on to Upernavik, reaching there August 12. She left this place August 22 and reached Disco Island August 28, where she was overtaken August 31 by Lieut. J. C. Colwell, of the United States Navy, who had left at Cape York the Proteus party, to which he had been attached, and had reached Upernavik in an open boat August 23, and had on the same day, in a similar boat, kept up the pursuit of the Yantic. The Yantic then returned to Upernavik, found that the whole Proteus party had saved themselves and arrived, took them on board, and reached St. John's on September 12.

With the exception that it left a few rations and some clothing at Cape Sabine, the expedition of 1883, as well as that of 1882, wa failure. No attempt was made by either Lieutenant Garlington or Commander Wildes to establish a relief party at Littleton Island, for which point Lieutenant Greely was under orders to start not later than September 1.

The Army court of inquiry, under date of January 15, 1884, reported:

It may here be stated roughly that from July, 1882, to August, 1883, not less than 50,000 rations were taken in the steamers Neptune, Yantic, and Proteus up to or beyond Littleton Island, and of that number only about 1,000 were left in that vicinity, the remainder being returned to the United States or sunk with the Proteus.

The desperate condition in which Lieutenant Greely had thus been left led to careful and zealous preparation for the relief expedition of 1884. A board of Army and Navy officers recommended that it should be solely a naval enterprise, and suggested the method of organizing it. Congress was asked to grant to the President unlimited appropriations for fitting it out. The House committee, of which Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL was chairman, reported in favor of such appropriations, and Mr. RANDALL was energetic in urging forward the passage of the bill, and persistent in opposing any restrictions or limitations upon the power of the President, while Senator HALE, of the Senate committee, took successful charge of the measure in that body and most judiciously and indefatigably conducted it to a passage.

The steam-sealer Thetis was purchased in London by the United States minister, Mr. Lowell, aided by Lieut. Commander French E. Chadwick, of the United States Navy, an attaché of the legation; the Bear was bought at St. John's by the United States consul, Thomas N. Molloy, esq., who was unremitting in his labors in behalf of all the expeditions; the Alert was thoughtfully and generously donated by the British Government; and all were fitted and equipped for conflict with the ice and for a three years' stay if necessary in the Arctic regions. President Arthur took a lively interest in the work of preparation and in the selection of officers for the duty. The Secretary of War, Mr. Lincoln, gave time and labor and shared the responsibilities of the enterprise. The chiefs of the bureaus of the Navy Department gave personal attention to all details; and the ships sailed on the appointed days under the command of as efficient and brave naval officers as any country can claim—Commander Winfield Scott Schley, Commander George W. Coffin, and Lieut. William H. Emory.

The details of the rescue are too fresh in all minds to need repetition. The three relief vessels and the coaling-steamer Loch Garry boldly entered upon the navigation of Davis Straits and pushed across Melville Bay. The commanders of the Thetis and the Bear, watching their opportunities with untiring care, coolly and courageously thrust their ships into the ice and reached Littleton Island on the 22d of June, a fortnight earlier than any vessel had attained that point before. Finding there no record of the unfortunate explorers, on the same day they pressed over to Cape Sabine.

Their haste was necessary. Lieutenant Greely and his party had left Lady Franklin Bay on the 9th of August, ten months before, and after pushing on in boats, and drifting on ice-floes, vainly looking for help from the relief party which should have been at Littleton Island, "keeping its telescopes on Cape Sabine and the land to the northward," they had fixed their winter quarters at the latter point.

The provisions at Cape Sabine and Cape Isabella had lasted them until March, when they hoped to cross to Littleton Island and obtain the two hundred and fifty rations left there by the Neptune. But during all this time the ice of the entrance to Smith's Sound never closed, while the boats were lost or consumed for fuel, and meantime starvation and cold did their deadly work. One by one the feeble sufferers died, until only seven remained, and these had but a few hours to live. But help was now near at hand. On the evening of the 22d of June, when their fate seemed hopeless, the shrill whistle of the Thetis, the signal of rescue, was heard above the winds and waves. A relief party hurried forward and found them. Careful and tender hands bore them gently off. The ships turned their heads homeward, and on the 17th of July the American people, the whole civilized world, rejoiced at the telegraphic announcement that Lieutenant Greely had been found and saved.

To the rescuers and the rescued of this expedition of 1884 the receptions of Friday and of to-day have been most fitly given, and we are here assembled to do them honor.

But our first duty is to pay our tribute of praise and of mourning to those devoted men who, having completed their two years of fruitful labor, came southward to Cape Sabine, and after months of suffering and starvation, borne with heroic fortitude and patience, perished as truly on the field of duty as if they had met their fate at the cannon's mouth.

Lieutenant Lockwood died April 9, Lieutenant Kislingbury June 1, and Doctor Pavy June 6. The remains of George W. Rice, Nicholas Sailor, Jacob Bender, Doctor Pavy, and Hampton S. Gardner were buried in the ice-foot, and were swept away into the great deep. The Eskimo, Jens Edward, was drowned while sealing, and Frederic Thorlay Christiansen was buried at Disco. The bodies of Lockwood and Kislingbury, of Edward Israel, Winfield S. Jewell, David C. Ralston, William H. Cross, David Linn, Charles B. Henry, William Whisler, William A. Ellis, R. R. Schneider, and also of Joseph Elison, who died after being rescued, we now have with us, saved for the sacred rites of burial at home.

The people of the United States look back upon their record with a just though mournful pride, and wherever throughout the world the story of their heroic endeavor and suffering is told the memory of these martyrs to duty will forever be cherished and held in honor.

With special tenderness we turn to Lieutenant Greely and his rescued comrades, Sergt. David L. Brainard, Sergt. Julius Fredericks, Sergt. Francis Long, Steward Henry Biederbeck, and Private Maurice Connell. They are the only survivors of an American Arctic exploration party which reached out farther toward the pole than any previous explorers, and whose observations were extended into the Polar Ocean. Their coast and land journeys were extensive, and have mapped out with increased exactness the shore line of Greenland and the interior of Grinnell Land.

Their scientific observations, made at fearful cost, have resulted in valuable additions to our knowledge of the lands within the Arctic Circle. For their labors and their endurance we honor them, for their sufferings we give them our pity and sympathy, and to comfort, cheer, and encourage them we promise them the gratitude of their Government and their countrymen, as the sole survivors of a polar expedition which will always illustrate American enterprise and American heroism.

It is with a feeling of peculiar pride and satisfaction that I fulfill the welcome duty of commending and congratulating the officers and men of the relief expedition upon the brilliant success of their efforts. It was early decided that the force should be wholly naval, and the result showed the wisdom of the decision. The arduous responsibility could have fallen into no better hands. Every officer and man, from his first connection with the undertaking, has given it his best and most untiring effort. The preparations were carried out with zeal and promptness, and each ship was ready at the fixed hour of departure. In the perilous advance from Upernavik, with incessant vigilance and unwearied exertion, every lead was followed, every circumstance was utilized that could speed the ships forward on their way; nor could more have been done had the relief officers known what all now know, that every hour of delay was thinning the weakened band of survivors.

To the energetic commanding officer of the expedition, Commander Schley, of the Thetis, and to Lieutenant Emory, the efficient commander of the Bear, who share the credit of conducting their difficult and dangerous enterprise to a successful close, the Navy Department gives its warmest and most earnest thanks, and their brother officers throughout the service join in heartfelt greeting to those for whom a new chapter must be written in the long and noble record of naval achievement.

Nor must a due share of praise be omitted to Commander Coffin, of the Alert, to whom was intrusted the charge of the reserve, and who performed his duty with fidelity and skill. To each and all of you, officers and men of the expedition, your country extends a cordial welcome upon your safe return. The dangers you encountered and the success you accomplished in bringing succor to your countrymen and comrades of the Army, perishing one by one upon the Arctic shores, have aroused a glow of pride and satisfaction in the breast of every American, and the nation will always dwell with fond remembrance upon those who shared in the danger and the crowning success of the Greely Relief Expedition of 1884.

ORDER OF THE NAVY DEPARTMENT ON THE RETURN OF THE EXPEDITION.

[General Order No. 321.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, August 5, 1884.

The Navy Department announces to the service the safe arrival at Portsmouth, N. H., on the 1st of August, of the Thetis, Bear, and Alert, composing the Arctic Relief Squadron, after having successfully accomplished the object of their mission, in the rescue of Lieutenant Greely of the Army, and the other survivors of his party.

The Department extends its cordial and earnest congratulations to Commander Schley, commanding the expedition, and to the officers and men of his command, upon the distinguished success of their efforts, and takes this occasion of publicly commending the courage, zeal, and judgment with which they executed their difficult and dangerous duty.

The names of the officers and men of the vessels of the Relief Squadron form a part of this order.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 344) to relieve the Treasurer of the United States from the amount now charged to him and deposited with the several States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Perhaps that had better be passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

The bill (S. 1156) to encourage the holding of a national industrial exposition of the arts, mechanics, and products of the colored race throughout the United States of America, to be held in the years 1888 and 1889, was announced as next in order.

Mr. GEORGE. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

The bill (S. 163) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to apply the surplus money in the Treasury to the purchase of United States bonds or to prepayment of interest on the public debt was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill will be passed over without prejudice on the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES].

The bill (S. 2381) to so amend section 9646 of the Revised States as to allow the pensions of officers of the Army and Navy, their widows and dependent parents to be rated as of the rank held by such officers at the date of discharge, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that that be passed over without losing its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not a complicated bill at all, but let it go over.

PENSIONS FOR LOSS OF SIGHT.

The bill (S. 2446) granting an increase of pensions in certain cases therein mentioned was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to amend section 4698 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to allow to all persons who are now paid, or may hereafter be found entitled to, a pension for the loss of one eye or the sight thereof under existing laws for such disability, a pension of $16 per month in lieu of any lesser sum now by law provided therefor, the increase herein provided to take effect only from the passage of the act.

Nothing herein contained is to deprive a pensioner of the right to a higher rating by reason of his rating for total disability, as is now provided for by existing laws.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM P. THORNE.

The bill (H. R. 2365) for the relief of William P. Thorne was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to pay to William P. Thorne, of Henry County, Kentucky, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500.

Mr. HARRIS. Is that all of that bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read again.

The bill was read.

Mr. HARRIS. It is a remarkable bill.

Mr. BECK. It is a House bill. The report shows what it is for. Perhaps the report had better be read.

Mr. HARRIS. It is not necessary to read the report if it shows what the $500 is for. The report can be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BECK. The case is fully proved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed in the RECORD in connection with the bill, if there be no objection,

The report submitted by Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, March 19, 1888, is as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred bill (H. R. 2365), entitled "A bill for the relief of William P. Thorne," have examined the same, and beg leave to report as follows:

The Committee on Claims of the present House of Representatives, to whom the said House bill 2365 was referred, have reported the same favorably, and have adopted the statement of facts and the views thereon which had been presented to the House of Representatives by its Committee on Claims during the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, when such last committee had this case under consideration, and favorably reported the same. In our view, such statement of facts and views of the case are fully sustained by the evidence. We, therefore, report back such bill with a recommendation that it do pass, and do hereto subjoin the report of the House Committee of the Forty-ninth Congress as the basis of such recommendation.

"[House Report, Forty-ninth Congress.]

"It appears from the papers transmitted to the committee by the Attorney-General that William P. Thorne, a lawyer, residing in Henry County, Kentucky, was employed to defend a civil action instituted in the circuit court of Henry County against one A. J. Harrington, a deputy United States marshal, and also a criminal indictment against Harrington; that the services were able, successful, and reasonably worth $1,000; that they were rendered in the face of public odium, and at the risk of personal popularity.

"The case was: Harrington levied an execution, issued from the clerk's office of the Federal court against one Rowland H. Thomas, on a drove of cattle which was claimed by Cynthia Thomas; Cynthia Thomas sued Harrington for trespass, and he was also indicted. Mr. Thorne successfully defended both actions, in one of which there were three trials and a change of venue.

"His employment, his services, and their value are clearly established. But his claim was rejected by the Department as was explained by Attorney-General Brewster in a letter of December 29, 1884, from which we insert this extract:

"You were not commissioned by the Department. There is no evidence that you took the oath as special counsel. Sections 365 and 366 of the Revised Statutes require the commission to issue, the oath to be taken, and subsequently that the Department shall certify that the appointment was made, the oath taken, and that the services performed would not have been performed by an officer of this Department or the district attorney. Without such certificate from the Attorney-General, the accounting officers of the Treasury will not state your account and consider it.

"Very respectfully,

"BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
"Attorney-General.

"These are purely technical reasons, which do not affect the real merits of the claim. It is a just claim, and ought to be paid.

"We append hereto the letter of Judge Bland Ballard, who has since died, and the affidavits of General Murray and Colonel Burns:

"LOUISVILLE, April, 2, 1873.

"WILLIAM P. THORNE,
"Eminence, Ky.:

"A. J. Harrington, one of the officers of my court, is in some trouble in your county for an alleged seizure and sale of some property they claim was not subject. Please make such proper legal defense for him as you think best, and I will see that the United States pays you for your services.

"Mr. Harrington will be there in person and give you a full history of the case. From what he tells me I am apprehensive the stock sold by him was not liable for the debt.

"But we desire you to make such defense as in your judgment will uphold the dignity and process of the court A judgment against the United States marshal in your county at this particular time, when they are being intimidated by a class of lawless people, would be prejudicial to the usefulness of this tribunal in Kentucky, and I enjoin it upon you to make a bold defense for him, and when you come to the city call and see Colonel Wharton, the United States attorney, who will take great pleasure in giving you such aid and counsel as you may require upon the point of a removal of the case from the State to United States court.

"Sincerely,

"BLAND BALLARD."

"STATE OF KENTUCKY, County of Jefferson, ss:

"Personally appeared Eli H. Murray, ex-United States marshal of Kentucky, and Col. Thomas C. Burns, present marshal, and each say that from what we know of said cases against the deputy marshal, in the Henry circuit court, and the defense made for him, and towards upholding the dignity and process of the United States court by W. P. Thorne, his attorney, we believe a fee of $500 reasonable and just; we further say that such services were necessary and were all that the United States could have expected or wished, and rendered at a time when it was not safe for an officer of this court to go out into the country to attend any sort of official business.

"ELI H. MURRAY,
"Ex-United States Marshal of Kentucky.
"THOMAS C. BURNS, Marshal.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF CERTAIN NAVAL RECORDS.

The bill (H. R. 4601) to amend the naval record of Nickolas Leuschen, Peter Leuschen, and Loth Possum was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Committee on Naval Affairs reported an amendment to the second paragraph of the preamble, in line 5, before the word "Congressional," to strike out "Thirteenth" and insert "Thirtieth;" so as to read:

Whereas they were taken to Buffalo, in the State of New York, and there, without their knowledge or consent, sold as substitutes, so that their names now appear on the records of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting as substitutes, credited as such to the Thirtieth Congressional district, in the State of New York, instead of as volunteers from the Twenty-seventh Congressional district, in the State of Pennsylvania; and.

The preamble was agreed to.

The preamble as amended was agreed to.

J. HENRY RIVES.

The bill (S. 517) for the relief of J. Henry Rives was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to J. Henry Rives, of Lynchburgh, Virginia, $293.90, being the amount of expenses necessarily incurred by him in the arrest of John C. Henry, deputy collector, for embezzlement.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEWART & CO.

The next business on the Calendar was the resolution reported by Mr. MITCHELL March 21, 1888, from the Committee on Claims, relative to the bill (S. 800) for the relief of Stewart & Co., as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 800) entitled "A bill for the relief of Stewart & Co.," now pending in the Senate, together with all the accompanying papers, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, in pursuance of the provisions of the fourteenth section of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887. And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of said section of such act, and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over without prejudice.

JOHN L. BROOME.

The bill (S. 1463) to authorize an additional appointment on the retired-list of the Marine Corps was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to place Lieut. Col. John L. Broome on the retired-list of the Marine Corps, with the rank and pay of a colonel retired.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

JAMES H. BACON.

The bill (S. 1959) for the relief of James H. Bacon was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to the language of this bill. It says:

That the proceedings and sentence of the court-martial in the case of Private James H. Bacon, late of Company A, Second Maine Volunteers, be, and the same are hereby, suspended and declared null and void, and that he be granted an honorable discharge from the service; and that the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to pay, or cause to be paid, said James H. Bacon, all pay and allowances forfeited by the proceedings of said court-martial.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think I was not in the committee at the time the bill was considered and can not speak of the motives that actuated it. The Senator who has it in charge [Mr. DAVIS] is not here. Let it lie over.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply wanted to call attention to the language of it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think I was not present when it was acted on.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wanted to know if a majority of the Committee on Military Affairs wanted to indorse the doctrine stated in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

H. A. MYERS.

The bill (S. 975) for the relief of H. A. Myers was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to require the Paymaster-General of the Army to cause to be paid to H. A. Myers, late a private in the Eleventh Kansas Volunteers, a sum that shall be equal to the pay of a private soldier from the 17th of September, 1862, to July 7, 1864, the date of his discharge from the service of the United States, deducting therefrom any amount that may have been paid to him as such private soldier, and any amount that may be due from him to the Government.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOL AND UNIVERSITY LANDS IN WYOMING.

The bill (S. 1782) to authorize the leasing of the school and university lands in the Territory of Wyoming, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 5, after the word "lands," to insert "devoid of timber and known mineral deposits;" so as to read:

That the county commissioners of each of the counties organized or hereafter organized in the Territory of Wyoming are hereby authorized to lease the lands devoid of timber and known mineral deposits heretofore reserved or that may hereafter be reserved for school purposes in their respective counties, in such manner as may be provided by the laws of the said Territory.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 6 in the following words:

SEC. 6. That whenever the sixteenth or thirty-sixth section in each township within the Territory of Wyoming has been or may hereafter be found to be otherwise claimed or appropriated prior to survey, or to be deficient in quantity from any cause whatsoever, or worthless for agricultural purposes, as provided in section 2275 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or to be mineral in character, other lands may be selected in lieu thereof from the surveyed public lands within said Territory not otherwise claimed or appropriated at the time of said selection, in accordance with the principles of adjustment prescribed by section 2276 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. That said lands shall be so selected by an agent appointed by the governor of the Territory of Wyoming, who shall certify the fact of such selection to the Secretary of the Interior, with a statement of the land in the sixteenth and thirty-sixth section in lieu of which such selection is made.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 6. That where lands in the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections, in the Territory of Wyoming, are found upon survey to be in the occupancy, and covered by the improvements of an actual pre-emption or homestead settler, or where either of them are fractional in quantity, in whole or in part, or wanting because the townships are fractional, or have been or shall hereafter be reserved for public purposes, or found to be mineral in character, other lands may be selected by an agent appointed by the govonor of the Territory in lieu thereof, from the surveyed public lands within the Territory not otherwise legally claimed or appropriated at the time of selection, in accordance with the principles of adjustment prescribed by section 2276 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and upon a determination by the Interior Department that a portion of the smallest legal subdivision in a section numbered 16 or 36, in Wyoming, is mineral land, such smallest legal subdivision shall be excepted from the reservation for schools, and indemnity allowed for it in its entirety, and such subdivisions, or the portions of them remaining after segregation of the mineral lands or claims, shall be treated as other public lands or claims.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RESPONSIBILITY OF SIGNAL-CORPS MEN.

The bill (S. 2519) to make enlisted men of the Signal Corps responsible for public property was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADMISSION OF NEW STATES.

The next business on the Calendar was the resolution reported by Mr. CULLOM from the Committee on Territories, March 27, 1888, relative to the admission of new States.

Mr. HARRIS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over without prejudice.

STATE SOLDIERS' HOMES.

The bill (S. 2116) to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States and their widows and orphans was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 6, after the word "war," to insert, "who are disabled by age, disease, or otherwise, and by reason of such disability are incapable of earning a living, provided such disability was not incurred in service against the United States;" in line 10, after the word "sailor," to strike out "and widow or orphan thereof;" in line 11, after the word "home," to strike out "for one year the sum," and insert "at the rate," and in line 12, after the word "dollars," to insert "per annum;" so as to read:

That all States which have established, or which shall hereafter establish, State homes for disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States who served in the war of the rebellion or any previous war, and who are disabled by age, disease, or otherwise, and by reason of such disability are incapable of earning a living, providing such disability was not incurred in service against the United States, shall be paid for every such disabled soldier or sailor who may be admitted and cared for in such home at the rate of $100 per annum.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide aid to State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States."

PEREZ DICKINSON.

The bill (S. 94) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, surviving partner of the late firm of Cowan & Dickinson, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Perez Dickinson, surviving partner of the late firm of Cowan & Dickinson, of Knoxville, Tenn., of $96,192, being the amount found due him by the Court of Claims for two hundred and fifty-six bales of cotton taken by General Burnside and used in the construction of fortifications about Knoxville, in November, 1863.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. L. CAIN AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 97) for the relief of I. L. Cain and others, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Claims reported the bill with amendments, in line 10, to change the name of "I. L. Cain" to "J. L. Cain;" in line 22, to strike out "seventy-seven" and insert "seventy-five;" and after the word "dollars," to strike out "25 cents;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the respective sums of money as hereinafter provided to the respective persons named herein, or to their heirs or legal representatives, to wit, for cotton taken by order of General A. E. Burnside to strengthen the fortifications at Knoxville, Tenn., November 17 and 18, 1863, to wit, J. L. Cain, six bales, 2,399 pounds, at 75 cents per pound, $1,701.75; Hugh G. Kyle, administrator of A. A. Kyle, deceased, 7 bales 3,500 pounds, at 75 cents per pound, $2,625; Alexander Kennedy, 10 bales, 4,500 pounds, at 75 cents per pound, $3,375; W. C. Hazen, surviving partner of G. M. Hazen, deceased, 31 bales, 17,393 pounds, at 75 cents per pound, $12,975.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of J. L. Cain and others."

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF GEORGE M'DOUGALL.

The bill (S. 1171) for the relief of the legal representatives of George McDougall, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 8, after the word "administrator," to insert "to wit, $81,250," and in line 11, after "United States," to insert "but without interest or costs;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the legal representative of the estate of George McDougall the sum appropriated in the general deficiency bill of August 4, 1886, to pay the judgment of the Court of Claims in favor of John Paul Jones, administrator, to wit, $81,250, in the same manner as though said judgment had been affirmed on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, but without interest or costs.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM M. BRYANT.

The bill (S. 2501) for the relief of William M. Bryant was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

HENRY BROCK.

The bill (H. R. 6887) for the relief of Henry Brock was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying to Henry Brock $387 for rent of his house, numbered 200 New Jersey avenue, Washington, D. C., and damage to the same while it was being occupied under authority of the House of Representatives.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BREVET PROMOTIONS.

The bill (S. 1323) to confer brevet promotion on officers of the United States Army particularly distinguished by heroic action in Indian warfare, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was to strike out section 1, as follows:

That section 1209 of the Revised Statutes shall, on and after the passage of this act, be made applicable to every officer of the Army below the actual rank of brigadier-general, and who has not been previously brevetted to that rank, and who may be recommended by the commanding officer of the expedition for brevet promotion to the grade next above that in which he is actually commissioned, on account of heroic conduct in battle against hostile Indians, either on or outside of the territory of the United States.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, at his discretion, to nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint to brevet rank all officers of the United States Army, now on the active or retired list, who by their department commander and with the concurrence of the commanding General of the Army have been or may be recommended for gallant service in action against hostile Indians since January 1, 1867.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the beginning of section 2, to strike out:

That the foregoing section shall comprehend every officer of the Army still on the active-list who has particularly distinguished himself in action with Indians since the abrogation of the brevet privilege: Provided, however.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 5, before the word "brevet," to strike out "his" and insert "such;" after "brevet," to strike out "commission when issued" and insert "commissions as may be issued under the provisions of this act;" in line 7, before the word "Provided," to strike out "and;" after "Provided" to strike out "however;" and after the word "which," at the end of line 8, to strike out "he" and insert "the officer;" so as to make the section read:

That such brevet commissions as may be issued under the provisions of this act shall bear date only from the passage of this act: Provided, however, That the date of the particular heroic act for which the officer is promoted shall appear in his commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 4, as follows:

SEC. 4. That non-commissioned officers and privates of the Army who, on and after the passage of this act, may distinguish themselves by extraordinary bravery in Indian battles, shall, on recommendation of their ranking commanding officer present in the field, be entitled to the maximum of pay allowed for length of service in their respective grades; and further, shall be entitled to compete for commissions in the Army before a board of officers, when, if they should pass a successful examination, they shall be considered in the line of promotion next after the cadets who have graduated at the United States Military Academy.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BECK. I hope the chairman or some member of the Committee on Military Affairs will tell us something about this bill. I suppose everybody is brave and everybody is to be promoted. This is to promote everybody apparently. What is the scope of the bill?

Mr. MANDERSON. It has no such scope as is intimated by the Senator from Kentucky. If it did, I should certainly not be in favor of it. This bill is one that grows out of this condition of facts: Up to a certain time, about 1874 perhaps, brevet appointment, for gallant service in Indian campaigns being conferred by the President of the United States were usually confirmed by the Senate. At that time new light seems to have come to the Senate, and it held that because of the language of the law which said that there must be a state of warfare, and that the act of gallantry must have been with one of the enemies of the United States, that could not mean Indian warfare, and that Indians could not be considered within the general term "enemies of the United States."

So the failure to confirm as to these nominations seemed to be because of that construction of the law rather than from a desire on the part of the Senate not to confirm for such acts of gallantry.

If the Senator from Kentucky will glance over this bill as it is amended, he will see that it is very carefully guarded. It is not when an officer of the Army distinguishes himself in Indian service and receives the recommendation of his regimental commander or his district commander, but it is only when the act of gallantry is of such a character as to challenge the attention and secure the approbation and recommendation of his department commander, and after that the concurrence of the Commanding General of the Army, that the President is authorized to make a brevet appointment and the Senate to confirm it.

The bill is very carefully guarded to prevent any abuse and to prevent the indiscriminate throwing about of brevet commissions to cheapen them and make them of no value whatever. It carries no rank; it carries no precedence; it carries no pay. It is simply, in the opinion of the Committee on Military Affairs, a proper recognition of the distinguished services of many officers of the Army of the United States who have done as great deeds of heroism in Indian wars as ever were done in any war with a foreign power.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that the law under which brevet appointments were stopped was passed in March, 1869, very soon after the close of the war. There have been no brevet appointments since the passage of the act of March 1, 1869, instead of 1874.

Mr. MANDERSON. I may have been mistaken in the date; I speke from recollection only.

Mr. COCKRELL. A large number of brevet appointments have been attempted to be made since that time, but the Senate has uniformly rejected all such nominations on the ground stated by the Senator, that Indian tribes were not within the meaning of the law as enacted on the 1st of March, 1869.

Mr. MANDERSON. I will say further with reference to this bill that it has been very materially changed by the Committee on Military Affairs from the original draught; it has received the approval of General Sheridan and of the Secretary of War, and many of the changes that have been made in the bill have been at their instance. The report in this case is a brief one, and presents so succinctly the reasons that governed the Committee on Military Affairs that I ask that without reading it be printed in the RECORD, as fully explanatory of the changes made in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The printing of the report in the RECORD will be ordered, if there be no objection.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1323) entitled "A bill to confer brevet promotions on officers of the United States Army particularly distinguished by heroic action in Indian warfare, and for other purposes," have had the same under consideration, in connection with two other bills (S. 2021 and 2028) on the same subject, and herewith report back the bill S. 1323 amended, and recommend its passage.

By section 1230 of the Revised Statutes (not approved March 1, 1869) it is provided that the President, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may, in time of war, confer commissions by brevet * * * for distinguished conduct and public services in presence of the enemy," etc.

The Senate has refused to construe this provision as authorizing brevet rank to be conferred on officers who for "distinguished conduct and public services" in Indian wars would seem to be justly entitled to receive the benefits (honorary) of the law of 1859. The War Department and the Attorney-General have held that officers in Indian wars could be brevetted during the existence of Indian hostilities, and the reason assigned by the Senate for refusal to confirm has been that the Indian was not an "enemy," and that a conflict with Indians could not be termed "a time of war."

Assuming this construction of the act of 1869 to be sound, your committee are of the opinion that the construction measures the extent of the reason why it should be extended to include officers who have distinguished themselves as aforesaid in Indian campaigns. In 1869 a number of brevets for services in Indian wars were submitted to the Senate, some of which were confirmed; but there have been no confirmations of this character since.

In 1874 and in 1875 nominations for brevet appointments, based on services rendered in the Modoc and Arizona Indian campaigns, were submitted to the Senate, but were not confirmed.

In January, 1876, all these nominations were resubmitted, but the Senate again adjourned without action.

No further nominations have been made, save in one instance, that of Lieut. E. S. Farrow, Twenty-first Infantry, made in April, 1880, and not confirmed.

In 1878 the President requested the views of the Secretary of War as to the propriety of again submitting to the Senate nominations for brevets for service in Indian campaigns.

On the general proposition, that of conferring brevet rank for distinguished services or heroic action in Indian wars, your committee can conceive of no good reason that would be valid in any war which would not apply with equal force in granting brevets in Indian wars, and concur with General W. T. Sherman, who says:

"If brevet commissions are right, and should be conferred for any wars whatever, they should be for Indian wars, because these wars call for the largest measures of risk, exposure, and toil, and every possible stimulus of honor and profit should be held out to encourage officers to struggle for success."

A favorable report was made on this subject from this committee in the last Congress, at which time the committee was in receipt of numerous letters from Army officers of all grades urging that this brevet recognition be awarded; one of the documents, numerously signed by officers, contained the following:

"The measure, as reported, authorizes the President to nominate and, with the consent of the Senate, to appoint to brevet rank all officers, active or retired, who have been recommended to this distinction for gallant service in action against hostile Indians since January 1, 1867. The rank thus proposed is entirely honorary, carrying no additional pay; the aim is simply to reward special deeds of heroism. In any other country the gallant exploits of the last twenty years in border warfare would have been acknowledged not only by awarding increased rank but increased pay.

"During the war for the Union brevet rank was constantly conferred; and a distinguished general officer once said, brevet commissions certainly belong to Indian wars, if any, inasmuch as they call for the largest measure of risk exposure, and toil; and every possible stimulus of honor and profit should be held out to encourage officers to struggle for success. In war with civilized nations the soldier has an opportunity to make a name that will be remembered in history; whereas the minor character of Indian operations prevents them from attracting as great attention and from securing permanent distinction to the participants.

"Yet the labor and the peril are as great in these small operations as in larger ones. The responsibility, courage, endurance, and good judgment required are also as great in Indian warfare; while over it hangs the terrible consciousness that capture often means death by torture with all the fiendish atrocities that savagery can invent. Even were this danger of a horrible death taken away, there is no more reason for depriving heroism of its just reward when displayed in the lonely cañons of the Sierra Madre than when shown in storming the defenses of Petersburgh.

"There is still another reason why the pending measure ought to be enacted. There now exists a statute which authorizes the conferring of brevet rank upon commissioned officers 'for distinguished conduct and public service in presence of the enemy.' Why, then, is not this sufficient? Simply because certain jurists of the Senate have in past years successfully called in question whether a Geronimo or a Sitting Bull is an 'enemy' in the sense meant by the statute.

"It may seem incredible that for twenty years, in the matter of interpretation, the doubt has always been against officers nominated for brevets on account of splendid acts of heroism. This, however, is the case, and in one instance of adverse action on such nominations the Senate Military Committee expressely said that it had no doubt of the meritorious character of the services rendered. Thus a score or more of officers have been deprived of the reward they would otherwise have received, and many of them are now with the dead."

These views accord with those expressed by a House committee which considered this subject in the last Congress:

"In other campaigns there is a certain glory or distinction to be won, and an opportunity for promotion and reward, which, owing to the limited theater of operations and the peculiar nature of wars against savages, does not and can not exist in these campaigns. And yet every highest attribute of a good soldier and officer is called for in these wars. Courage, skill, vigilance, endurance, wisdom, judgment, and unflagging energy, while usually remote from and beyond communication with officers of high rank, are all demanded in these disagreeable and thankless campaigns to protect our remote frontiers."

And with those expressed by General Crook, who said:

"OMAHA, February 11, 1887.

"MY DEAR GENERAL: I see by the papers that the bill allowing brevets for Indian service has passed the House. I do hope you will do all you can to have it pass the Senate, as it is a righteous and just bill. Gallant service should be recognized without reference to the kind of foe engaged. You are well aware of the onerous and dangerous nature of this Indian service, and as brevets is all that is asked, I hope they will not be withheld longer from the persons who so richly deserve them.

"Yours, sincerely,

"GEORGE CROOK.

"To CHARLES F. MANDERSON."

Capt. E. A. Snow gives quite a graphic account of the heroism and valor displayed by men upon whom it is proposed to confer this brevet rank. He says:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., January 19, 1888.

"DEAR SIR: I have the honor to very respectfully submit to you the following, which are but a few from among many of the instances of personal valor on the battle-field that have come to my notice in Indian warfare:

"Captain Bourke distinguished himself on the field so frequently in the Apache campaigns from 1870 to 1873 as to be four times mentioned in general orders for his gallant and heroic conduct, and in other campaigns has frequently been the recipient of honorable and praiseworthy mention for his valor and services in the field, and he has been several times recommended for brevet promotion; but under existing laws, being unable to confer this recognition for valor, the officers ceased to ask for it, or there would be a larger number of instances which I could refer to.

"To omit many instances, I will observe that he distinguished himself by leading a charge, on the 17th of March, 1876, on Powder River, and in several charges on the Rosebud, on the 17th of June, 1876, in an engagement with the same Indians who massacred General Custer's command, and eight days before that fight. In this engagement, at the Rosebud, Captain Bourke saved my life after I was shot in the right elbow and left wrist joints, causing total disability. He rode into the very midst of the Indians and rescued me, although the nearest skirmish line was at least a thousand yards away. I could give other instances, but it would make this letter too long.

"Major Henry, of the Tenth Cavalry, distinguished himself in this engagement, and so did Major Mills, of the Ninth Cavalry; and Major Mills whipped the Indians and won the first victory after the Custer massacre, and it was one of the most brilliant ones of the campaign. Colonel Hatch, of the Ninth Cavalry, distinguished at a more recent date, and many others. But it will occur that from the frequent and constant Indian warfare that the instances of valor are numerous, and your bill will enable the President and Senate to recognize it by a nominal promotion.

"I have the honor to remain, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"E. A. SNOW.

"Hon. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
"United States Senator for Nebraska."

After full consideration of the subject-matter your committee have struck out the preamble of the bill (S. 1323) and have amended the title and the bill so as to allow brevet rank to be conferred on "all officers of the Army now on the active or retired lists, who, by their department commander and with the concurrence of the commanding general of the Army, have been or may be recommended for gallant service in action against hostile Indians since January 1, 1867," the brevet commissions to bear date only from the passage of this act; the date of the heroic action for which the brevet rank is conferred to appear in the commission, such rank to be only honorary, without privilege of precedence or command not already provided for by the statutes which embody the rules and articles governing the Army.

As amended the measure has the approval of Lieutenant-General Sheridan, under date of March 29, 1888.

Your committee accordingly report the bill (S. 1323) back favorably, amended as heretofore stated, and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the President to confer brevet rank on officers of the United States Army for gallant services in Indian campaigns."

The preamble was stricken out.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. REAGAN submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2851) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887; which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, and Mr. BUTLER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to interfere with the desire of any Senator to proceed with legislative business; but it is necessary to have a brief executive session, and unless there be some objection I will now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before submitting that question the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being the bill (H. R. 8560) to establish a department of labor. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 17, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

WEDNESDAY, May 16, 1888.

The House met at 10 o'clock a. m.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

HEIRS OF SOLOMON SPITZER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution originating in the House of Representatives and concurred in by the Senate, I return herewith the bill (H. R. 2699) entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of the late Solomon Spitzer."

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, May 15, 1888.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the communication just read will be laid on the table for the present until the House shall determine what disposition shall be made of the bill to which it relates.

BRANCH SOLDIERS' HOME, GRANT COUNTY, INDIANA.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] has withdrawn his objection to the bill which I called up yesterday, and I now ask unanimous consent that it be taken up and put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] asks unanimous consent to take up for present consideration a bill (H. R. 8391) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in Grant County, Indiana, and for other purposes. Is the reading of the bill demanded?

Mr. McMILLIN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear a statement from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] as to the necessity for this home.

Mr. STEELE. The Committee on Military Affairs authorized me to report this bill, there being a necessity for additional homes. The Superintendent of the National Home reports that there are over nine thousand soldiers in the poor-houses, and that every single home now existing is not only full, but that soldiers are sleeping on the floors, and that there is an actual necessity for additional accommodations. In pursuance of that statement this bill has been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. It is proposed by the citizens of the place where the home is to be located to furnish fuel and light free for all time to come. The fuel and light at the Dayton home cost last year over $58,000, to say nothing about the cost of the cartage of ashes and débris away from the home. It is thought to be in the interest of economy that there should be a home of this character established, and established in the center of the region whence most of the soldiers came during the late war. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of this bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. The point that I was anxious to have a statement about was as to the necessity for the home. Of course, if there is a necessity for it no patriotic citizen will object, but, with a diminishing demand for such homes, which is inevitable either now or in the near future, I want to ask the gentleman whether it is certain that the creation of this new home is a necessity.

Mr. STEELE. The board of managers report that so far from there being a decreasing demand it is constantly increasing, and increasing in a very large ratio. They so state in their annual report dated the 2d of January last.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is there any other home in Indiana?

Mr. STEELE. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] whether this bill provides for the erection of a home under the auspices of the national Board of Managers; that is, will it receive soldiers from other States than Indiana?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think it would be well to have the bill read.

Mr. FARQUHAR. There is no question at all about its propriety if it contains that provision. I wish to say to the House, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN], that the State of New York, through the Grand Army of the Republic, has built homes for its own soldiers, and yet there are now nearly four hundred soldiers that can not find room at the home at Bath.

Mr. STEELE. That is the condition of affairs throughout the country.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I know that is the case in my own State.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has Indiana built any soldiers' homes of its own?

Mr. STEELE. It has built a soldiers' orphans' home, which is more than full now.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the appropriation which this bill contains?

Mr. STEELE. Only $200,000.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is there a provision limiting it to that amount?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. The State of Illinois has built a soldiers' home at Springfield, a large and well-appointed institution, and is paying all the expenses of it out of the State treasury.

Mr. STEELE. So I understand.

Mr. SPRINGER. And I do not know but that if this bill passes I shall ask to have that Illinois institution turned over to the General Government.

Mr. BIGGS. I would like to have the bill read.

Mr. BURROWS. It was read yesterday.

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Military Affairs gave this measure very careful consideration before theyd ecided to report it favorably. There can be no reasonable objection to the bill and it ought to pass.

Mr. BIGGS. I withdraw the demand for the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. There are several amendments, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 1, line 7, strike out "three hundred and twenty" and insert "two hundred" [meaning acres of land].

Section 3, line 9, after the word "building," insert "and shall supply an adequate quantity of such gas free of cost to the Government."

Section 4, line 1, strike out "and fifty;" making the sum $200,000, instead of $250,000.

The amendments were severally agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEELE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ABBIE SHARP.

Mr. RICE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 4775) for the relief of Abbie Sharp, formerly Abbie Gardner, be taken from the Private Calendar and put on its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the sum of $2,500 out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Abbie Sharp, formerly Abbie Gardner, who was captured and whose family was killed by the Sioux Indians at Spirit Lake, in the State of Iowa, on the 8th day of March, A. D. 1857.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREEDMEN OF THE CHOCTAW NATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with accompanying paper, a report from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the present condition of freedmen of the Choctaw Nation, Indian Territory, and submitting a draught of a proposed bill for their relief; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting an amended estimate from the Secretary of State of the appropriation for expenses of obtaining and searching for records in French spoliation claims; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DAMAGES TO SCHOONER SARAH C. WHARF.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries of appropriation to pay damages sustained by the schooner Sarah C. Wharf by collision with the Fish Commission steamer Fish Hawk; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were read a first and second time, and referred as indicated:

The bill (S. 2039) for the relief of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (S. 437) for the relief of Claude H. Mastin, surviving partner of the firm of Le Vert & Mastin, of Mobile, Ala.—to the Committee on War Claims.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 9793) authorizing a loan of arms and equipments to the Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company; when the Speaker signed the same.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I call for the regular order. I move that the morning hour for the call of committees be dispensed with, and that gentlemen desiring to make reports may file them with the Clerk for reference to the appropriate Calendars.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that to-day, immediately after the reading of the Journal, was by special order set apart for the consideration of bills and resolutions reported from the Committee on Labor. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] whether any arrangement has been made or is contemplated by which the business of the Labor Committee may be assigned to some other day. I make this inquiry in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Labor, and because I am unable to communicate with him.

Mr. McMILLIN. As the chairman of the committee is absent, I can not communicate with him. All I can say to the gentleman from New Jersey is that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL], the chairman of the Labor Committee, introduced a day or two ago a resolution, which was properly referred, looking to the assignment of a future day for the business of the committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman recollect the date fixed in that resolution?

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not.

The SPEAKER. The resolution was introduced on last Monday, and according to the recollection of the Chair it provides for the assignment of some day during next week. The Chair thinks it is the understanding that such assignment shall be made.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Would it be in order, then, for me to ask unanimous consent now that the execution of this special order be deferred for one week?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order, if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] yields for the motion.

Mr. McMILLIN. The chairman of the Committee on Labor has already taken steps looking to the accomplishment of the object which the gentleman from New Jersey seeks. The resolution introduced by the chairman of the committee has been regularly referred. I sympathize with the desire of the gentleman from New Jersey in regard to an assignment for that business, but I think the resolution on the subject ought to take the regular course.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The regular course, Mr. Speaker, is for the House now to proceed with the execution of the order already made; and under the regular order the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee would be out of order, because under the special order there is no morning hour to-day.

The SPEAKER. If the Committee on Labor should call up any bill, there would be no morning hour; and unless some arrangement should be made, the only way to prevent the consideration of measures from that committee to-day would be to raise the question of consideration against each bill as called up.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have no desire to prolong this discussion or to interpose any difficulty. In the absence of the chairman of the committee I simply desired to know the situation.

The SPEAKER. The question is, then, on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] ask unanimous consent that the order with reference to business of the Labor Committee be postponed for one week?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from New Jersey, that there was a motion pending. The gentleman can make his request for unanimous consent if action on the pending motion be suspended.

Mr. DINGLEY. It seems to me there ought to be some arrangement about this matter.

Mr. MCMILLIN. There will be no difficulty about it. There was an understanding that a future day would be assigned. That understanding, I infer from all that has occurred, is satisfactory to the chairman of the Committee on Labor; and therefore I have made this motion.

Mr. DINGLEY. If that is the understanding, I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is the information I desired to elicit.

Mr. TARSNEY. The chairman of the committee [Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri] is here now. Let us hear from him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair ascertains that May 22 is the day designated in the resolution offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The understanding between the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. MILLS] and myself was that the day for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Labor should be deferred until Tuesday next.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am perfectly content.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. That was the understanding.

Mr. DINGLEY. Why not ask unanimous consent now that the day which has been suggested be fixed?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I will ask unanimous consent——

Mr. MCMILLIN. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules; why not let the matter rest in that shape?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. It was the understanding that they would report the resolution back and give us that day.

Mr. TAULBEE. Does the committee agree to report it back?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. We understand from members of the Committee on Rules that there will be no difficulty about it.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MCMILLIN, that the morning hour for the consideration of reports be dispensed with, and that leave be granted to file reports with the Clerk, it was agreed to.

TARIFF.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Mr. Chairman, a prominent question is now agitating the public mind, which largely affects both labor and capital. Its ramifications penetrate into all the varied industries of the country, which make up the bulk of our prosperity. That one question may be summed up in the proposition that if MILLS of Texas does not shut up, most of the other mills of the country will have to. If this mention of the name of the honorable chairman of the Ways and Means Committee should be considered offensive or unparliamentary, I apologize for it in advance.

That the industries of the nation during the deluge of debate upon the tariff question have been much disturbed is thoroughly well known; and the interests involved are to-day anxiously looking for the course of legislation in Congress upon this momentous question, whether the over-swollen Treasury shall be relieved by a reduction of the tariff which at the same time will tend to paralyze the manufacturing industries, and thus produce more financial disasters than would exist were the present surplus to be maintained or increased, or whether the surplus should be reduced by a reduction in internal-revenue taxation or by the purchase and retirement of national bonds, or by a wise distribution of the surplus funds in internal improvements. This subject is well worthy the consideration of every patriotic and thoughtful man.

That the present tariff system is by no means perfect will be admitted by every one acquainted with its practical operations. Its so-called iniquities have recently been embalmed in quotations of prose and poetry by more than a score of able speakers, while another score have contended that the protective system which underlies the present tariff, inaugurated more than a century ago, under which our aggregate national wealth has increased from $13,000,000,000 in 1860 to over $43,000,000,000 in 1880, is not to be rudely overthrown by any party or power not in sympathy with that system by which our country has been so largely benefited.

This is the issue now presented before this Congress and the country and upon which the next Presidential election will undoubtedly turn, for the Democratic party which presents this tariff bill before this House and before the country have, by the message of the President elected by that party and otherwise, practically declared itself against the protective system and in favor of a modified system which they call "fair trade," but which is the opening wedge to what may properly be called free trade.

That question not only affects the manufacturing industries of the country, but it also largely affects its agricultural interests.

It is my privilege, Mr. Chairman, to represent in this Congress a district composed of one county in the State of New York, named after that honored Democrat, James Monroe, and which is the second county in the United States in point of agricultural importance, having an area of nearly 350,000 acres, and divided into nearly 6,000 farms. All the agricultural products incident to that section of the country are included in the crops of these farms, and among the live-stock are to-day nearly 60,000 sheep. While it may be true that in certain sections of our country, in the far West, that are wholly agricultural, a less active interest is felt in a protective tariff than exists in the East, this can not be said of the section which I have the honor to represent, because of its nearness to the Canadian border, where large quantities of agricultural products are raised, which under any system approximating to free trade would come directly in conflict with like products raised in Western New York.

In addition to the importance of our agricultural products our manufacturing establishments number nearly twelve hundred, affording employment to about twenty-five thousand men, to whom is paid annually about $6,000,000 in wages, while the capital invested in our manufacturing concerns amounts to about $30,000,000. The value of our farm products during the year preceding the census of 1880 was nearly $6,400,000, while the products of our manufacturing establishments aggregated but a little less than $30,000,000, and the annual consumption of material therein was about $20,000,000.

The population of Monroe County to-day is full 200,000, and is estimated to be nearer 225,000, so that it needs no argument to show that the interests of my constituency are deeply concerned in any measure proposing a change in the tariff system.

"The timidity of capital is proverbial," "Wealth is but consolidated labor." No more striking illustration of the truth of these proverbs can be had than in the fact so widely known and which has been chronicled far and wide in the press of both parties, that capital and labor throughout our country are to-day seriously agitated upon the tariff question. Men fear to embark in any new enterprise which this question affects, or even to expand enterprises already established, for fear that pending legislation may affect the security of the one or the welfare and prosperity of the other.

My district is a hive of industry, embracing the manufactures of much the larger part of all things created by the hand of man that are necessary to the comfort of mankind. In that district is consumed large quantities of the wool of Ohio, Texas, and other States, the cotton of the South, the iron and coal of Pennsylvania, the silver of the mines of New Mexico and Nevada, and the gold of California, while from our harbor, ranking second upon the south shore of Lake Ontario, is shipped immense quantities of coal from the mines of Pennsylvania and vast amounts of the products of our soil and manufactories.

We produce the choicest nursery stock, and the seeds of the rarest flowers; we compete with Europe in the finest of optical works, and in the production of some of the finer fabrics, while the clothing and shoes of the city of Rochester may be found in every city and State in our country, and upon the persons of both the rich and the poor.

I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that these interests, which are but a type of those found in other cities throughout the land, demand a continuance of our established policy of protection, and their past prosperity and present welfare is a loud protest against the recently developed free-trade policy of the Cobden Club as exemplified by the present position of the Democratic party. We believe that a policy which has insured the success and prosperity which has made the city of Rochester famous throughout our country is good enough for the whole country and should be maintained.

There is no doubt that the inventive genius of the American nation, which gives it its foremost rank to-day among the nations of the world in all labor-saving appliances employed in manufactures, has been largely stimulated by the protective system. The Centennial Exposition of 1876, held in the city of Philadelphia, opened the eyes of many people from abroad to the wonderful resources of the United States in regard to their inventive genius, and this led to the introduction abroad of samples of many of the classes of labor-saving inventions which have there been copied and put into active use, and this has led to a large development in European countries of their manufacturing industries and to a cheapening of labor, which has largely reduced the price of European products. So that now we are face to face with the cheap products of Europe which have been practically brought about by the protected labor and genius of the United States. The importance of this fact ought to be well understood in considering whether the protective system should be further maintained.

Free wool appears to be the corner-stone of this Democratic edifice of free-trade, with a protective tariff of 40 per cent. upon the manufactured products; but this would destroy the wool-growing industry of the United States, including the large wool interests of the State which has for one of its Representatives the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. His responsibility for this action he must settle with his constituents.

The duty on clothing wool of the cheaper class, valued at not exceeding 30 cents a pound, is 10 cents a pound; which, at the maximum value, is 33⅓ per cent. ad valorem.

The duty on manufactures of wool not specially enumerated, valued at not exceeding 80 cents a pound, is 35 cents a pound and 35 per cent. ad valorem. Those rates, at the value stated, of 80 cents a pound, amount to 78 per cent. ad valorem. Deducting the duties of 33 per cent. on the wool leaves a net duty on the goods of 45 per cent. ad valorem. On clothing, ready-made, the duty is 5 per cent. more, or 50 per cent. ad valorem.

The duty proposed by the Mills bill (with free wool) on woolen goods not enumerated is 40 per cent. ad valorem. The value of the pretense that this proposed tariff will give cheaper clothing to the poor and the laboring class can therefore be fairly estimated, especially when it is borne in mind that the average rate of duty proposed by that bill is about 41 per cent. ad valorem.

Free wool under these circumstances means a destruction of our wool-growing interests, a reduction of duty on woolen goods not sufficient to destroy the manufacturers and entirely too small to be of any practical benefit to the laboring class. Neither the manufacturers nor the wool growers are found here clamoring for the proposed change. They are content to let well enough alone, and I have been informed by reliable sources that on some classes of goods with a duty of 40 per cent. ad valorem and free wool the duty would be entirely prohibitory, because the goods can be made in the United States at a less cost than they can be made in Europe with a 40 per cent. duty added. The proposition of free wool under these circumstances is base hypocrisy so far as concerns the cheaper clothing of the laboring classes.

I have heard it stated that my distinguished and honored friend from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, once on a time in a city within the Republican State of Rhode Island, said that such a thing as a seamless sock has not been made in the United States, and they were only made in Europe by a secret process, the secret being carefully guarded, and that they could not possibly be made in this county, and that it is foolish to maintain the duty upon them, etc. I beg at this point to read a letter which I have received, and it is introduced to be followed by an object-lesson to my friend and to those who have been misled by his false teachings. Here is the letter, and here is the object-lesson:

ROCHESTER, N. Y., May 14, 1888.

DEAR SIR: We take the liberty of writing you, as the member of Congress from our district to direct your attention to the effect the Mills tariff bill, if passed in its present form, would have upon the industry in which we are engaged. We employ about two hundred and fifty persons in the manufacture of seamless hosiery, and should this bill become a law would be obliged either to force our operatives to accept much less wages, or close our factory. At present prices our operatives make only a fair living, but should we be compelled to compete with the factories of Europe manufacturing similar goods, with their poorly paid labor, we can not see how they could earn enough to keep body and soul together.

We understand Mr. Mills at a meeting held on the 19th of February last at Providence, R. I., stated that seamless hosiery was not made in this country, but manufactured entirely in Europe by a secret process. To disabuse your mind of this erroneous statement should it have come to your ears, we herewith send you a few pairs of the hose made in our factory. There are about five hundred factories in this country engaged in making these goods. All of these factories, we believe, would be seriously crippled, if not compelled to close their doors by the passage of this bill. Trusting you will use your utmost efforts to effect the defeat of this pernicious measure, we remain,

Yours, very respectfully,

ROCHESTER HOSIERY COMPANY,
By E. W. OSBURN, President.

Hon. CHARLES S. BAKER, Washington, D. C.

These goods now exhibited are of wool, protected wool, loyal wool, and are manufactured in my city. They display the colors of the American flag—red, white, and blue. If my friend will visit my city during the coming campaign I will take pleasure in making his stay pleasant in a social way, and introduce him to the factory and to the fair hands that daily turn out these goods by the thousand. The larger ones may be sufficient in size to meet the needs of any gentleman from Texas, or from any part of that warm section of our country which is so potential in the management of affairs, and which is so largely represented on the Committee on Ways and Means. [Laughter.] If the bill now under consideration should by any unforeseen calamity become a law, the larger ones would be sufficient to hold the scant surplus left in the Treasury after a brief operation of the law if his anticipations shall be realized and he be not mistaken in the effect of his own bill, while the smaller ones would be far too ample for the scant remembrances of affection likely to be bestowed upon him at next Christmas tide by the industries he is endeavoring in his peculiar way to "assist." [Renewed laughter.] I have the honor to present these to my good friend from Texas. They will prove to him to be the only samples of free wool upon which his eyes will ever feast. [Laughter.] If he chooses he may divide these samples, sending the red ones to the President, the white ones to the Speaker, and the blue ones he may retain for himself, as typical of his feelings at the end of the session when he beholds the defeat of the measure on which he has staked the fortunes of his party. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

In a speech made by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in my city during the last Presidential canvass he had much to say about the protective policy of the political party with which he was then affiliated. He attempted to convince my people that the party to which he then belonged was not a free-trade party. I hope he will visit our city again this fall, and if he will tell the people the truth as to his former political associates (which he no doubt sadly regrets he did not do then), I assure him that the majority of 5,076 then given for the Republican ticket will be swollen to 7,500, especially if our candidate shall be able to steer clear of alliterating divines during his canvass. I but voice the sentiments of my people when advising a repeal or a material modification of internal-revenue taxes at the very earliest day practicable. They are inquisitorial in their nature, fetter the products of our own country, are antagonistic to the principles of both of the great political parties as they existed at the time of their adoption, and were only created to meet the necessities of the war—a necessity which no longer exists. [Applause.]

We would be glad to have the inequalities of the tariff revised, but it looks as if any such action will have to wait for the Fifty-first Congress to have it wisely done, as at that time I confidently expect that the party with which I have the honor to be identified will administer the reins of Government, and so shape the course of legislation. Meanwhile we may observe the entire lack of a wise and statesmanlike course pursued by our Democratic friends in upholding their professions presented to the country in other lines than those of tariff as a justification of our lack of confidence in any revision of the tariff which they could possibly make. Their so-called civil-service reform has become the laughing-stock of the country. Their administration of the postal laws and regulations, both as concerns our domestic intercourse and those affecting our intercourse with Canada, have been the subject of loud complaints from many quarters. It would seem as if that party were the lineal descendants of the gentleman who stood on the corner of one of the streets in Jerusalem and thanked God that he was not as other men were, and then went off and exemplified by his life and actions that he was below the level of his fellow-men.

The nearness of my district to the Canadian border necessarily makes intimate relations between the interests of my constituents and those of our neighbors residing upon the other side of our boundary. On the 2d day of last month I introduced a resolution into this House calling attention to the situation at that date of the breach of faith of the Canadian Government in exacting duties upon nursery stock and seeds, which were put upon our free-list in 1883. That resolution is as follows:

Whereas "Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada," did by due statutory enactment, assented to May 15, 1879, provide that "any or all of the following articles, that is to say, animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables, including potatoes and other roots; plants, trees, and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, peas and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat, and all other grain; flour of wheat and flour of rye, Indian meal and oatmeal, and flour or meal of any other grain; butter, cheese, fish (salted or smoked), lard, tallow, meats (fresh, salted, or smoked), and lumber, may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this act, upon proclamation of the governor in council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation when imported into Canada;" and

Whereas the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled did, by act approved March 3, 1883, duly provide that plants, trees, shrubs, and vines of all kinds, and seeds of all kinds, fresh fish, fruits, green, ripe, or dried, eggs, and a large number of articles specifically named should be admitted into the United States free of duty; in consequence whereof it appears that large quantities of plants, trees, shrubs, vines, and seeds, eggs, aggregating in value in the year 1885 $1,831,000; in the year 1886, $1,728,000; in the year 1887, $1,827,000, and great quantities of fish and other products of the Dominion of Canada have been imported into the United States duty free, while that government has neglected, failed, and refused to keep or observe Her Majesty's standing offer of reciprocity in respect of the articles specified, or of many of them, and have, as is alleged, exacted large sums by way of duty upon many of the articles specified, which have been imported into Canada from the United States; and have, as is alleged, levied and assessed ad valorem duties upon American goods at the actual retail price or value at which such goods are sold for home consumption even when shipped, imported, and sold in large quantities at wholesale prices, notwithstanding and in disregard and violation of the spirit and letter of the Canadian statutes; and

Whereas it is claimed on the part of Canadian officials that the citizens of the United States can avail themselves of the privileges of reciprocity under the act first above quoted only after all the articles therein specified shall be admitted free of duty by United States laws: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report as speedily as practicable to this House the kinds and quantities of goods and products imported into the United States from Canada free of duty during the past five years, and also the quantities of similar goods and products exported from the United States into Canada during the same period, together with a statement in detail, showing the amount of duties, specific and ad valorem, paid thereon, to the end and purpose of ultimate recovery thereof, and of an adjustment of the differences resulting from such breach of faith on the part of the Canadian Government.

Resolved, further, That the Committee on Ways and Means report to the House within ten days a bill providing:

First. For an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent. upon all plants, trees, shrubs, and vines of all kinds imported into the United States from the Dominion of Canada.

Second. For a specific duty of 5 cents per dozen upon eggs so imported.

Third. For a specific duty of 1 cent a pound upon all fish so imported.

Fourth. That in all cases a duty shall be imposed upon all goods and products now on the free-list whenever similar goods and products are subject to duty under the laws of Canada, at a rate equal to that imposed thereunder.

Fifth. That ad valorem duties imposed by the laws of the United States on goods, wares, and merchandise imported from foreign countries shall be assessed upon the actual retail price or value at which such goods are sold for home consumption in the country of production or export, whenever in the country of such production or export ad valorem duties upon goods, wares, and merchandise imported into such country from the United States are assessed upon the retail price or value at which such goods are sold for home consumption in the United States.

This resolution was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and, under the rules of the House, should have been reported within seven days, but thus far no report has been made; but, in common with the many petitions and communications that have been sent to that committee in behalf of American industries, it has, I fear, slept the sleep that knows no waking. Despairing of any action of the committee, I addressed the Canadian authorities upon the subject, and deem it but fair to state that they have since, somewhat reluctantly, declared nursery stock free, and, by a later proclamation, have also put seeds on their free-list.

Nevertheless, I am assured that there has been inaugurated in the Canadian House of Commons a measure to restore the duty upon some or all of those articles of commerce, while the people of the Dominion continue to avail themselves, and, with confidence of uninterruption, of the privileges accorded by the measures adopted by our Congress for their benefit.

During the three years last past we have paid for eggs from Canada $5,386,000, while the products of the great American hen have gone entirely unprotected.

"Can these things be, and overcome us like a summer cloud, without our special wonder?"

Early in the present session I introduced a bill to correct the injustice under which two large industries in my city suffer under the present tariff, which bill was referred to the Ways and Means Committee. The merits of the case were made plain in a letter which I had printed and presented to the committee, which letter I will read, because it gives facts which should be understood by this House and by the country.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., January 26, 1888.

Hon. C. S. BAKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: As constituents of yours doing business at Rochester, N. Y., we desire to submit for your consideration, and through you to call the attention of Congress to certain facts and statements in support of the bill (H. R. 5660) introduced by you into the House of Representatives on January 23, 1888, to regulate the admission into the United States of photographic print-paper, which bill was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Our business consists in the preparation of this class of paper by special treatment for the use of photographers. The plain paper of this grade is all made at two mills, one situated near Lyons, France, and the other one at Malmedy, Germany. The difficulties attendant upon its manufacture have been so great, and the consumption of the paper so comparatively small, that the two mills specified have for the past ten or fifteen years practically monopolized its manufacture and, no doubt, will continue to do so. Some efforts have been made to manufacture it in the United States, but because of the small quantity of it used and the difficulties connected with its manufacture these efforts have not been crowned with success.

From 1861 to 1883 the duty on this class of paper was 35 per cent. ad valorem, and under the tariff of 1883, now in force, it is 25 per cent., it being included under the provision for "paper not otherwise provided for," so that for over twenty-five years there has been a substantial protective duty on this class of paper, sufficient to develop its production in this country if there was any likelihood of its being made a profitable branch of industry. It is of a peculiar character, readily distinguishable from any other grade or class of paper by any expert in paper, quite as much so as "printing-paper, unsized, used for books and newspapers exclusively," or "paper sized or glued, suitable only for printing-paper," for each of which classes special provision is made in the tariff at rates of duty far below those fixed on the general class of paper not specially named in the tariff.

Photographic print paper commands a very high price, costing, delivered in New York without duty, from 50 to 55 cents per pound. When imported in sheets the name of the manufacturer is impressed in a water-mark on each sheet, and when imported in rolls the water-mark appears on every 3 feet of the roll. Aside, however, from its distinguishing characteristics, its price is so high as to make it unsuitable for any other use than its legitimate one of printing pictures from negatives taken by photographers. There would, therefore, be no danger to the revenue in giving this grade of paper a separate classification under the tariff, no more so than in the case of paper for books and newspapers and printing-paper, and the special provisions made in the tariff for these classes of paper have been attended with no difficulties in the way of their execution, the character of the paper being found to be a sufficient test to determine its classification. This statement will apply with equal force to photographic print paper.

II. Before the paper is available for the uses to which it is to be applied, it must undergo several processes. One is called albumenizing, which consists in coating the paper with the white of eggs. Another is in coating the paper with a mixture of gelatine and bromide of silver. This process is called sensitizing. The paper is imported in three conditions, namely, plain, abumenized, and sensitized. It is sold to photographers only in two conditions: first, sensitized, in which condition it is ready for use; and, second, albumenized. When sold in the latter condition the photographer himself performs the work of sensitizing. The business of albuminizing and sensitizing paper in the United States was commenced only a few years since, but has already become an important branch of industry, and with proper encouragement can be enlarged both for our own and foreign markets.

Messrs. D. Hovey's Sons, one of the firms whose names are attached hereto, are engaged in the business of albumenizing the paper, and in this work they have been accustomed to use from six hundred to a thousand dozen of eggs per day, the whites of the eggs only being used for this purpose, the yelks being barreled and shipped to Gloversville, N. Y., to be used in dressing leather for the manufacture of gloves. This gives a large market to the poultry products of that region, and is a material help to the farming interests. In their business they have been accustomed to employ as many as 100 hands, and about the same number are employed by the Eastman Company, the other firm signing this memorial. The latter firm, in their business of sensitizing paper, use about $5,000 worth of silver per month, or $60,000 per year.

The machinery they use is intricate and expensive, and it has been invented and patented by persons connected with the company. It is only by their superior processes, aided by their machinery, that they have at all been able to compete with the foreign product, the foreigners having the great advantage of cheap materials and cheap labor. In addition to supplying the home market, the Eastman Company are large exporters of coated paper, and if they could have their raw paper free and a reasonable duty on their finished product, they could command a very much larger trade abroad. They paid duty last year amounting to some $2,000 on paper which they had coated and which was exported to foreign countries, which duty was not returned to them by way of drawback.

III. The duty on both the plain paper and the coated article was originally held to be, under the tariff act of 1883, 25 per cent. ad valorem, the article, whether coated or plain, being regarded only as paper, dutiable under the provisions for "paper not otherwise provided for." This arrangement still gave the foreigner an advantage, because it enabled him to import his finished product at the same rate of duty as was imposed on the plain paper, and it was then only by our improved processes and machinery, developed at a great expenditure of time and money, that we were enabled to compete with the foreign article and thereby control a part of the home trade.

But last year the Treasury Department put in force a ruling founded on the verdict of a jury in a case brought before a United States court, that the albumenized and sensitized paper was no longer paper, but was an article which, by the distinct and additional processes it had undergone, was to be regarded as "a manufacture of paper," dutiable under the act of 1883 at only 15 per cent. ad valorem, and that ruling is still in force. This presents the anomalous condition of the finished product paying a less rate of duty than the raw material or plain paper from which it is made, and reverses all ordinary and well-established principles of tariff legislation.

It was a serious blow to an industry which, under the former condition of affairs, was already struggling for existence, and we believe that no argument is necessary to convince you or any other member of Congress that the present condition of the tariff in this respect should not be permitted to continue, but that a duty sufficient to encourage the domestic manufacturer should be placed on the coated paper, leaving the plain paper to be placed on the free-list or to bear a very low rate of duty. We do not seek to have the duty on the finished article placed so high as to increase the cost to the ultimate consumer; but we do ask that we may be placed in a position where we can furnish the article to the consumer somewhere near as cheaply as the foreigner does.

As the tariff now stands, the foreign albumenized paper can be delivered here at a cost of $5 less than the article coated in the United States. If the plain paper is put at the same rate of duty as the albumenized, the foreign article could be delivered here for $4 a ream less than the paper coated here. If the plain paper is made free of duty and the coated article is put at 15 per cent. ad valorem the cost of the foreign article would be $2.50 per ream less than that made here. If the plain paper is put at 15 per cent. ad valorem and the coated article at 25 per cent. ad valorem the foreign article can be delivered here for $2 per ream less than the home product. If the plain paper is made free of duty and the coated paper 25 per cent. ad valorem the foreign article can still be delivered here for 60 cents less than the article coated in the United States. Grouping these statements and numbering them for ready reference we have:

No. 1. (Same as now) $5 against American industry.
No. 2. (Both at 15 per cent.) $4 against.
No. 3. (Plain free, coated 15 per cent.) $2.50 against.
No. 4. (Plain 15 per cent., coated 25 per cent.) $2 against.
No. 5. (Plain free, coated 25 per cent.) 60 cents against.

The propositions that we favor the most, and which should be adopted as a matter of fairness and justice to domestic interests, are those marked three and five, in both of which the plain paper is made free and the coated paper is put at 15 or 25 per cent. ad valorem. A duty of 15 per cent. on the coated paper, with plain paper free of duty, would be a substantial benefit to us; but the only change which would really meet the situation and establish both branches of our business on a positive basis would be the admission of the plain paper free of duty, and a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem on the coated article.

We respectfully ask that you urge upon the Committee on Ways and Means, and upon the other members of Congress, that a provision of the character last named be embodied in any tariff bill which may be adopted by Congress.

Respectfully, yours,

D. HOVEY SONS, AND
THE EASTMAN DRY-PLATE AND FILM CO.,
Of Rochester, New York.

This communication, as well as the bill introduced by me to correct that manifest injustice, like the resolution before mentioned, are both enjoying that endless sleep in the committee-room so fatal to many other remonstrances of like character. The Mills bill takes no notice of the proposed measure, nor does it propose to interfere with the foreign productions of which my friends are competitors, though one of the firms signing the petition uses one thousand dozen of eggs a week in the process of albumenizing photographic paper, and the other uses $5,000 worth of silver a month in sensitizing paper for use in photography.

Is it good policy to allow such industries to languish and die, employing as they do about two hundred hands, on which some seven hundred or more people are dependent for their daily bread? I say, and with a reverential spirit, that the prayer taught us by our Divine Master is, "Give us this day our daily bread," but that is subject to the caution that the Lord helps those who help themselves, and to the further command that charity, which is the greatest of all virtues, begins at home.

I do not intend to fail in impressing upon this House, even at the hazard of repetition, the importance of the relations which exist between Western New York and Canada. And on that point it will be well to observe the recent master stroke of diplomacy by which our Postmaster-General, coming as he does from that State where rural and backwoods simplicity not wholly Jeffersonian is supposed to prevail, has secured an amendment to the recent postal treaty between our Government and the Dominion of Canada, by which the rates of postage on merchandise both ways are largely increased, and for which the people of both countries will undoubtedly bless their respective but not respected Postmasters-General. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Executive Document 293, of May 3, is respectfully recommended to the House and the country for consideration in this connection. Nor must I fail to mention the policy our Canadian friends have seen fit to pursue in the matter of their valuation of our imports. I have caused to be examined the various tariffs of the nations of the world, and, so far as they make distinct mention of the subject, they are in accord with our own, which fixes the ad valorem duties upon the wholesale price of the commodity in the markets of the country of production. This rule is in accordance with the laws of trade, as all commercial transactions of any moment are based on that rule. But Canada has seen fit to make a very harassing exception to this rule, and imposes her duties upon the retail value at which the goods are sold for consumption in the countries of production, and as the United States in the great bulk of her common necessities is the only country she has to deal with, it means an assessment of duty upon the retail value, the value at which goods enter into daily consumption in the homes, and not in the markets, of the United States.

The New York Tribune of Monday, May 14, instant, contained an able letter by Mr. Joseph Nimmo, jr., upon the subject of our commercial relations with Canada, which should be read by every one. In his comments upon that letter the editor, in the same issue, said:

OUR NORTHERN NEIGHBOR.

Mr. Nimmo's letter published on another page contains information that is greatly needed by Congress and the country. It treats of the relations of the Dominion of Canada to Great Britain and the United States, and of various violations of treaty law and covenanted reciprocity. Senator FRYE late in January sent to the Committee on Foreign Relations resolutions of inquiry respecting these abuses, and this letter virtually supplies the information which was then called for. It also refers in detail to the grievances which Representatives DINGLEY, NUTTING, and BAKER have brought to light in the House. Mr. Nimmo is not only master of the subject, but also of his temper. The relations of the Dominion to the United States are discussed with as much dignity as intelligence, and his statements of fact are not vitiated by a single unfriendly expression or the faintest reference to the subject of annexation.

Some of the specific counts in the indictment against Canada may be briefly mentioned. By an order of council a rebate of 18 cents per ton has been allowed on the tolls on grain passing through the Welland and St. Lawrence canals, if shipment be made to Montreal. This is a premium offered for the diversion of American commerce from American seaports and transportation lines. This is an open infraction of article 27 of the treaty of Washington, and should be met by the immediate imposition of a tonnage tax on all Canadian vessels passing through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal. In like manner the international arrangements relating to the transit trade, which is of immense value to Canadian corporations, are violated in Manitoba, where the Dominion Government refuses to allow grain to be shipped in bond over American railroads to Montreal. For five years Canada has failed to place on the free-list various articles from which duty was entirely taken off in the United States when the tariff was revised; and this neglect is in direct violation of an act passed by the Dominion Parliament in 1879 providing for reciprocity in this respect whenever the same articles should be admitted from Canada without payment of duty. Other instances of bad faith are given in connection with a brief summary of the denial of commercial privileges to American fishermen in Canadian harbors.

The conclusion of the whole matter is this: Canada has been allowed to impose upon the forbearance and good nature of the United States. The restraints of international law and the engagements of reciprocal compacts do not interfere with sharp practice by which temporary advantages may be secured for the commerce of the Dominion. The ambitious designs of Canada have been pursued in a particularly aggressive spirit since the present Administration has been in power in Washington. Its Government and railway corporations have acted on the principle that any favor that might be wanted would readily be granted by the State and Treasury Departments, and that no indignities or outrages offered to fishermen would be resented, and that no commercial privileges withheld in violation of positive engagements would be demanded under menace of retaliation. The time is rapidly approaching when retaliation must be the answer to every act of injustice and every infringement upon the principles of international comity. Canada, by persisting in taking advantage of American tolerance and magnanimity, must in the end exhaust the patience of the powerful nation which freely and generously shares with it all the advantages of its geographical position.

I take pleasure, Mr. Chairman, in commending to this House and to the country these matters, believing that if the people's Representatives much longer neglect their duty in respect of these things, the people will in thunder tones be heard in condemnation of all those who by vote and voice shall strike down our American industries for the benefit of those of Canada or of any other Government.

Let me ask, Mr. Chairman, are we as a nation ready to admit the people and the industries of Canada or of any other country to all the rights, benefits, and privileges of our country; to the enjoyment without let or hinderance of our markets upon the thin pretext that we must needs have a free foreign market for our surplus products, and without imposing any of the duties and obligations under which every American citizen rests?

It has been stated that England's labor produces in twelve days all that is required for a year's consumption. If that be true, what wonder, then, that England, backed by her Cobden Club and her American allies, should engage in the great effort now being made to command the markets of the New World for the surplus of her cheap and underpaid labor? The debate upon this all-absorbing topic, able, exhaustive, destined, in my judgment, to rank as the greatest of modern times, has impressed me as calling for but one of two results. While the pending bill professes to be only a modification of the existing tariff the logic of all the arguments in favor of it is irresistably towards free trade by the shortest route possible under existing circumstances.

While the voice of the great masses who unfortunately are represented by the minority upon this floor is overwhelmingly opposed to the bill "as tending to break down the barriers which defend American labor from competition with the pauper labor of Europe and Asia, and to reduce the families of the American workingmen to the foreign level of cheapness and poverty," I may be permitted at this point to introduce tables (for which I am indebted to our worthy Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, Col. W. F. Switzler) illustrating the comparative weight of influence of those now asserting the right to control the future of our American industries as against the great North, the West, and the East, where the bulk of our industries are located. If the gentlemen now engaged in this "great rebellion" against the prosperity of our industrial interests would display equal zeal in inviting the industry and enterprise that have combined to make us great as a nation to locate in and spread over the "Sunny South," we should see in less than a decade a new order of things there, and the Cobden Club would look in vain for recruits upon the floors of Congress.

Observe these tables. They are freighted with interesting and suggestive figures.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., May 15, 1888.

SIR: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to transmit to you herewith the following tables, compiled from the census of 1880, to wit:

Table A, showing the value of farm products in each State and Territory of the United States.

Table B, showing the capital invested, number of employés, amount of wages paid, and value of the products of manufactures in each State and Territory of the United States.

Respectfully, yours,

WM. F. SWITZLER,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. CHARLES S. BAKER, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, May 15, 1883.

Therefore, whenever the tariff is properly revised, whether in its rates of duty or in its administrative provisions, it should be revised by its friends, it should be done carefully and discreetly and with a reference to the wants of our people rather than to those of foreign nations, who, however they may supply us with their surplus of population, have no identity of interest with us and have no right to absorb our surplus of wealth by methods of legalized injustice.

That the bill now before us is not an honest bill will, I think, be apparent to any unprejudiced mind that gives it proper consideration. It covers only a portion of the tariff and laps over on to the tariff of 1883, and so will produce perplexing questions for the Department and the courts as to what commodities are dutiable under the old tariff and what under the new.

It would undoubtedly place ores not specified, in the free-list, because the provision for "mineral substances in a crude state and metals unwrought" at lines 130 and 131 of the free-list are amply sufficient to cover all ores not specified, even though such ores may be mentioned in the prior tariff, as it is a familiar principle of law that where a statute covers the same ground as that previously in existence and which is repugnant thereto the former statute is repealed. If this action was intended, why not come out and declare iron and other ores on the free-list; if it was not so intended, why not make it so plain that even a Democrat appointed to sit at the receipt of custom by this severely honest Administration may not administer it without dispute?

Many features of the bill seem to indicate a series of "strikes and trades." First, strike either by omission or commission some prominent branch of industry. Then wait and see what support can be gathered to the other part of the bill by correcting what was inserted or by supplying what was omitted.

The sugar of Louisiana was prominently attacked in the bill first produced, as well as the sugar-refining industry, by a "strike" against the drawback on refined sugar, and then when the proper "trade" has been had the "strike" was struck out, and the sugar schedule was amended to meet the wants of those whose votes were desired.

The sunny section of the South was thus largely favored, as were also the interests of that section, by placing cotton-ties for the baling of cotton on the free-list, and enhancing the duty on rice, which is produced exclusively below the now happily obliterated line which formerly marked the "sections" of this country.

Fair play is a jewel, but no such glittering gem appears to have adorned the breast of our Democratic neighbors when defining their position on this great question. [Applause.]

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPINOLA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York may be extended for fifteen minutes.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Considering only the facts and the necessities surrounding us, I shall most regretfully be compelled to object.

Mr. BAKER, of New York. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for making the request, but I had about concluded what I desired to say.

Mr. BOUND. Mr. Chairman, during the past two weeks of tariff discussion in the House I have been confined to my home by a very severe inflammation of one of my eyes, in consequence of which I have not only been prevented from attending the regular sessions of Congress, but also deprived of the pleasure of perusing the debates on the tariff, as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, at a cost of about $5,000 to $8,000 a day to our heavily burdened tax-payers! Whether I am to be congratulated or commiserated with on this account I leave entirely to the judgment of my more fortunate brethren who were able to be present. Permit me to say, however, in this connection, that I do not believe that anything that has been said, or that may hereafter be uttered upon this floor, will have the slightest effect in changing or altering the vote of a single member in regard to the Mills tariff bill! King Caucus has laid down the programme to be followed by the majority, and if the party lash can effect it—if the power and patronage of the Executive can accomplish it—no change nor alteration in any important provision of this bill will be allowed by the majority.

Thus believing, it would seem to be the part of wisdom to remain silent and content myself with voting against this iniquitous tariff bill as a whole, and every part thereof. But, sir, coming as I do from one of the largest mining and manufacturing districts in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and feeling a deep interest in the prosperity, happiness, and permanent welfare of a generous constituency, I would consider myself false and recreant to every obligation devolving upon me as their representative if I failed to denounce this pro-British, free-trade tariff bill as it deserves. This bill is a long stride in the direction of free trade, and is the inauguration of a tariff policy that must eventually prove ruinous and disastrous to many important industries in which my people are largely interested!

Sir, the President of the United States has boldly demanded tariff reduction in his annual message, and, no matter how seriously the business interests of the country may be affected thereby, commands his Democratic followers to see that his wishes are complied with. He informs them that there is a large and a largely increasing surplus of money in the Treasury, and that it must be reduced. Sir, it may be a great misfortune to be blessed with too much money! But, sir, is this our only danger as a people? Would it not be a far greater evil to close up our rolling-mills, furnaces, forges, factories, and workshops? Would it not be far more terrible to stop the busy hum of industry in our mines, our factories and workshops, and turn thousands and tens of thousands of honest workmen out of remunerative employment? That, in my opinion, would be a very poor way to reduce the surplus—stop the factories and open the poor-houses!

Sir, I am glad of one thing, and thank the President for tearing the mask from the faces of his Democratic free-trade followers. One thing is absolutely certain; we will have no such cries nor banners in Pennsylvania emblazoned with a living lie at next election as "Polk, Dallas, Shunk, and the tariff of '42; we dare the Whigs to repeal it!" We will have no "favorite son of Pennsylvania" deceiving our honest laboring men, mechanics, and artisans with the shameless cry that "James K. Polk is a better tariff man than Henry Clay!" And our people will see to it that no other recreant son of Pennsylvania, nor of any other State in the Union, will give a casting vote in the United States Senate by which free trade is established as the law of the land and ruin and desolation brought to our firesides and hearth-stones in the great Keystone State.

Our esteemed colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will hardly have the effrontery to parade this free-trade banner in the great manufacturing States of New York, New Jersey, and Connecticut before the workingmen as the gonfalon of protection to American industry. He can not again with any consistency, nor without belying his past record, even try to save those States to the Democratic party next fall, as he did four years ago! If the Democratic party intends to commit political hari-kari by passing the Mills tariff bill, I feel very sure that brother RANDALL will hardly be one of the chief mourners at the sad obsequies!

Mr. Chairman, I am a protectionist from principle. I was born and raised in a State that is wedded to the protective policy. We have witnessed, enjoyed, and greatly profited by reason of protection to American industry. We have grown great and powerful and wealthy through the fostering care of the National Government. Our infant industries have grown to a stalwart manhood, and to-day—I say it with pride—there is no State in the Union that is so thoroughly independent and self-reliant, and none that can so well withstand the assaults upon American industry, American laboring men, and American mechanics and artisans as the grand old Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. And as we owe so much to wise legislation on the part of the National Government, we of the Keystone State wish to see our sister Commonwealths, through the same beneficent policy of protection, in like manner grow great and powerful and wealthy by continuing in the same line of policy.

Mr. Chairman, only a few short years ago we in Pennsylvania looked with some apprehension upon the giant strides made by Alabama in developing her great iron industries. With her vast mineral deposits developed, with her coal and iron ore and limestone lying together in such close proximity, with her cheap labor and her cheap food, her hospitable climate, enabling her mechanics and artisans and laboring men to toil in the open air all the year round, requiring but little shelter and less clothing than we of the inhospitable North, it became a serious problem just how soon Selma, and Bessemer, and Birmingham would become the Pittsburghs and Johnstowns of Pennsylvania. And, sir, but for the discovery of natural gas and its adaptability to manufacturing purposes the problem would not long have remained unsolved. Natural gas has revolutionized the iron industry in Pennsylvania to such an extent that the manufacture of flat, and bar, and round iron east of the Alleghanies has ceased to be profitable unless the works are favorably located.

Mr. Chairman, I live in one of the great mining and manufacturing districts of Pennsylvania. Hundreds of millions of dollars are invested in mining and manufacturing. In the counties of Northumberland and Dauphin we have vast deposits of anthracite coal, in the county of Lebanon, the other county composing my Congressional district, we have mountains of iron ore, the Cornwall iron mines, near the city of Lebanon, alone having turned out over 8,000,000 tons of iron ore since they were opened, and the supply is simply inexhaustible.

I was born and raised in the county of Northumberland and can speak from actual knowledge and experience of the coal and iron industries in that county, and that kind of knowledge is of far more practical importance than all the diaphanous theories of free-trade dreamers. Over fifty years of knowledge and experience in the coal and iron trade of my district entitle me to speak with some degree of assurance. And this brings me to the consideration of the Mills tariff bill, the President's message, and the question of wages, and the rights of labor likely to be affected thereby.

Mr. Chairman, almost my sole interest in this tariff question consists in its effects and relations to labor and the rights of the laboring man as affected thereby. I have been a laboring man all my life, and this makes me stand close beside the toiling millions in all their efforts to elevate the dignity of labor, and share in its just rewards. And here let me add that in every struggle betwixt capital and labor all my sympathies and all my yearnings are with the laboring classes. I care but little for the capitalist in this struggle, for capital is always able to take care of itself. But just in so far as the interests of capital and labor are closely identified I am the friend of both. There ought not to be any real antagonism between capital and labor, and there is none except when purse-proud avarice would rob labor of her rights and refuses to share with labor her rightful earnings. You may do as you please and vote as you please and legislate as you choose, but if your legislation is not in the interests of labor and for higher wages and better pay for the laboring man my voice and vote will be unalterably against you.

The President of the United States, in his annual message to Congress, talks very glibly about the reduced price of goods compensating for any reduction in wages which might be brought about by his tariff policy. And this is to a great extent the stock in trade of the free-trade theorists. With a million men to-day standing idle in the labor market begging for employment, with their wives and children begging for bread, the Chief Magistrate of this great Republic, with an annual salary of $50,000 at his back, coldly reasons about cheaper food and cheaper clothing making up for cheap wages, or even no wages at all. Why, sir, if a man is penniless and brown-stone fronts were selling for a farthing apiece, a poor starving devil could not raise money enough to buy a door-knob!

Others of these tariff reformers, who wish to equalize the wages of labor throughout the world by free trade, are eloquent in their praises of the farmer and planter; that they alone are the real producers of all wealth. They are full of Horace Greeley's gush about "going West, young man." This is all very nice; but if the young man has not money enough to buy a loaf of bread, what is the use of taunting him and his family of children, if he has any, with the delusive advice to go West? Why, sir, so many of them have gone there in this plight, that after working hard for years they find their farms embellished with a first-class mortgage and all their hard earnings in the hands of money-sharks.

Oh, yes, cheap goods and cheap products of the workshop and the farm are the things to make men happy and contented with their lot in life. I deny it utterly. Adults, with no one dependent upon them, may be satisfied with a bare living. But, sir, the wage-worker, the toiler in summer's lassitude and winter's frosts and snows, wants more than a living. He wants something for old age—something for his children. Besides being fed and clothed they want books to read, and pens and ink and paper and pencil; they want an education with which to fight life's battle. No matter how poor a man or a woman is, he does not live for himself alone. This is a land of great opportunities. The beggar on the dung-hill to-day may be the man of destiny to-morrow. God-given genius is our only patent of nobility in this land of equal sovereigns. A man may be great in spite of all obstacles, a child may rise to power and place from the almshouse, and in progress of time "fill the sounding trump of fame" with the record of his grand achievements; but, sir, without money, without friends, without education, he is far more likely to fill a felon's cell or a pauper's grave, than to rise to power and station and fame.

Sir, go talk to the toilers in the iron hills and coal mountains of Pennsylvania and Virginia, or the bituminous-coal deposits of the great West about the advantages of cheap food, and cheap clothing, and cheap commodities of every description, and they will tell you very quickly that what they want is steady employment and good wages and they will take care of the food and clothing part of this whole business.

For myself, I say to you very frankly that I am opposed to cheap goods and cheap agricultural products. Cheap goods and cheap products mean cheap labor—starvation wages for toiling slaves, without hope and without ambition for the future. Huts, and hovels, and nakedness, and pauperism, and crime follow sadly after the procession of cheap labor.

Need I point to downtrodden Ireland in proof of this—stripped bare and naked by the accursed greed and avarice of free-trade England? Need I further point to the grain fields of Egypt, and the cotton and rice fields of India, where the miserable coolies at the point of English bayonets and the mouths of English cannon are compelled to labor for unpaid toil? And this is the kind of labor and the kind of toil that you farmers of the great West are compelled to compete with in the markets of the world! Laborers who toil from sun, to sun, with breechclouts for raiment, with mud hovels and bamboo huts for dwelling-places, and a handful of rice for their daily food; such is the banquet that free-trade England invites you to sit down to, farmers of America!

No, sir; give the laboring man, the mechanic, and the artisan steady employment at decent wages, and he will find a pleasant home for his wife and children, decent clothing for their bodies, wholesome food for their stomachs, and all the necessaries and many of the luxuries of life. With good wages, you may hold your souls in patience, for the laboring man will neither starve himself nor allow his family to want as long as he is blessed with health and strength to work.

Yes, you may prate about cheap imported goods manufactured in the noisome factories of Leeds, and Sheffield and Birmingham. You may talk about the cheap products of foreign paupers and of convict laborers, and how they will compensate for the reduced wages of honest American mechanics brought into competition in their production and thrown upon the American markets by a low tariff or no tariff at all; but you can not fool intelligent American workingmen by any such stuff. They understand just as well as you do that $500,000,000 or $1,000,000,000 worth of such goods thrown upon the American market takes the place of just that many million dollars' worth of American fabrics and robs the American mechanic and artisan of the profit of just that amount of labor. And the million of American laborers standing idle to-day, waiting for employment, know that their chances are lessened just the amount of labor necessary to make those goods in foreign countries.

More than this, they know full well that the beggarly daily pittance paid the hands to fabricate those goods—less than half of what American mechanics would work for in this country—is paid for a day's work of twelve, fourteen, and sixteen hours! Some gentleman on the other side of this Chamber likened the protective policy to a Chinese wall. A Chinese wall, indeed! Why, sir, rather than see the wheat of India brought into the port of New York to compete with the products of the American farmers, rather than see this country flooded with foreign goods, wares, and merchandise and the wages of American mechanics and workingmen brought down to the level of Continental Europe, Asia, Africa, and China and Japan, instead of a Chinese wall I would rather see the great Atlantic Ocean turned into a sea of fire. What do we care for the trade of Europe? What do our farmers care for it? There is not a tenth of our agricultural products shipped abroad.

Oh, yes, our friends on the other side have become great admirers of our merchant marine. They want to see the flag of the Republic float upon every sea and ocean. They are always ballooning, struggling after the unattainable. Oh, yes, build up a grand merchant marine that will command the markets of the world! Why, sir, if it was left to those gentleman from the South on the Ways and Means Committee to build a merchant fleet, if it was left to the States which they represent, with their great lines of seacoast in Arkansas, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and their wonderful harbors and ports of entry, judging of the future by the past, it would take them about a thousand years to fit up an ordinary canal-boat! What is the use of all this fooling; whenever we want a foreign merchant marine we will build it.

Whenever it is made apparent that foreign trade and commerce are more profitable than our coastwise trade, whenever it is made manifest that our capital can be better and more profitably employed in constructing a merchant marine to engage in foreign trade, just that soon, and no sooner, will ships be built for the purpose, just that soon will every sea and lake and ocean in foreign lands be whitened with the sails of American commerce! Whenever the foreign carrying trade becomes sufficiently profitable to challenge American enterprise the ship-yards of all New England will resound with the busy hum of industry.

Do not misunderstand me. I am by no means opposed to the putting forth of every effort to acquire foreign trade, and especially in Central and South America. Indeed, it is a reproach to this great Republic that we do not to-day control that valuable trade. We are their best customers, and every year the balance of trade is steadily against us; whilst England, 3,000 miles farther removed from us, by reason of a liberal and enlightened trade policy, not only controls that trade, but always has a balance of trade in her favor. Sir, had that matchless statesman and thorough American, James G. Blaine, been elected to the Presidency instead of Grover Cleveland, four years ago, that valuable trade would now have been assured to us by wise treaty and close commercial intercourse so irrevocably that all of our surplus manufactures would have found a ready and profitable market, to the great advantage of American mechanics, artisans, and capitalists.

But I am diverging. I want to tell you why I am in favor of a protective tariff. In my native county, thirty years ago, the Shamokin coal region was almost a barren waste, a region of stunted timber growing on the sides of rugged hills and mountains, so destitute of soil that the wonder was how the trees and shrubs managed to exist amidst the rocks and stones. The land was so poor and barren that it would have bankrupted any ordinary man to pay the taxes! Indeed, year after year the lands were disposed of at treasurer's sales for default in payment of taxes, and to-day many of the most valuable coal tracts are held by tax-titles. Had you traveled through that region forty years ago you would hardly have taken the lands as a gift. To-day they are worth the wealth of empires!

We have coal enough to warm all our friends, and iron enough to welcome all our enemies "with bloody hands to hospitable graves," as witness the heights of Gettysburgh and the bloody plains of Antietam. To-day large towns and cities cover those stony hillsides filled with a thrifty, industrious, enterprising population. Towns of ten and twelve thousand inhabitants. In fact the whole region is a succession of towns and villages from Shamokin on the north to Port Clinton and Pottsville on the south and east. The region is literally gridironed with railroads, bearing to Eastern markets the black diamonds from the Shamokin and Schuylkill coal basins. Sir, without a protective tariff that whole region, whose wealth is reckoned in hundreds of millions, would still be a comparative wilderness.

What has accomplished this wonderful transformation? Labor, and capital, and enterprise. Sir, the glare from workshops, furnaces, and rolling-mills makes the darkest night almost as light as the noon-day sun. And the wierd forms of the stalwart men with lanterns on their hats who go down into the coal mines seeking dusky diamonds—and the gleam from the rolling-mills, furnaces, and factories illuminate the workman's manly forms stripped to the waist as they toil at the puddling furnaces looking more like gnomes and genii than things of flesh and blood. Every town and city in that vast region, every railroad train, every breaker and colliery filled with busy workmen, every house and business place, every school, and college, and hospital, and cathedral speaks in eloquent praise of the doctrine of protection to American industry.

Sir, visionary theorists may crack their throats in proclaiming the beauties of free trade, every scribbler and babbler may rant about robber tariffs, but it takes capital, and labor, and enterprise to transmute the yellow ore into iron bars. Our mechanics and miners and artisans understand these things well, and our farmers understand them well in the greatly enhanced value of their farm products.

My home is in the northern part of Northumberland County, in the beautiful valley of the Susquehanna, as rich and fertile in agricultural resources as the Shamokin region is in mineral wealth. There and in the Lackawanna region our farmers find a home market for all their surplus wheat and small grains, their fruits and butter and eggs and poultry. We ship little or nothing to the great Eastern cities, because at less cost of transportation we find a better market in the coal regions.

Why, sir, before these regions were opened up and railroads constructed I remember well that butter used to sell the year round for from 8 to 10 cents a pound, and eggs for 3 to 8 cents a dozen, chickens and ducks for 25 cents a pair, hay for from $6 to $8 a ton, and oats and corn in like proportion; potatoes for 25 cents a bushel, and no sale for these products at any price. To-day and for years past eggs average 25 cents a dozen, butter 30 to 40 cents a pound the year round, and potatoes 50 cents a bushel, and our farmers have a ready market for all they can raise; and during all this time farm lands have more than doubled and trebled in value.

More than this, twenty-odd years ago we in the agricultural portions of our county were obliged to bear the burden of taxation. The truth was that the undeveloped coal region was too poor to pay any considerable portion of the county rates and levies. To-day and for years that region of country pays much the largest share of our county taxes. And just so it is throughout the length and breadth of our great Commonwealth; the coal regions and the iron regions, and the great manufacturing towns and cities, beside furnishing our farmers with a good home market for their products, bear far the largest share of all local taxation. Our railroads and canals and our great corporations pay the largest share of our public burdens, and in another year we mean to make them pay all the expenses of our State government. And but for a protective tariff these great carrying companies would never even have had an existence.

Mr. Chairman, in the neighborhood of all our great manufacturing centers, such as Lebanon, Harrisburg, and Steelton, in my district, farm lands have appreciated in value from 100 to 500 per cent. Why, sir, not many years ago the town site of the borough of Steelton was a quagmire and swamp; to-day you will find raw material and manufactured products lying stacked upon the ground worth in money millions of dollars, and you could not buy a town lot in the heart of the city for what you could have purchased the whole town site for thirty years ago. All this phenomenal growth is due to protection. And so it is throughout our entire State.

Facts like these speak far more eloquently than all the gauzy theories of free-trade dreamers. And so it is, and so it will be throughout all this broad land of ours, in the neighborhood of all great manufacturing centers. And so it will be in the great South with all her agricultural sylvan, and mineral wealth. As it is at Selma and Bessemer and Birmingham so will it be throughout all the Southern and Western States.

On Saturday last I heard the eccentric gentleman from Mississippi complaining that our robber protective tariff made the cotton planters of his State pay 47 per cent. to New England, and to old England also, in order to have her cotton crop manufactured.

Did it never occur to the gentleman that by establishing cotton factories in his State convenient to the great cotton fields that he could not only save this 47 per cent. to his own people, to say nothing of the cost of transporting the cotton crop from Mississippi to either New England or old England? And in such case they could skin the New England Yankees instead of being skinned by them! I know croaking and complaining will never do it; but capital and thrift, and energy and enterprise, will do it just as it is done in New England, or in Liverpool, or Birmingham. But you can never do it as long as you belittle and degrade labor. You can never do it as long as you lie on your backs and dream as to whether or not it is better to own labor or hire labor.

You will never get skilled mechanics and artisans, either from New England or old England, to work in the cotton fields or cotton factories of Mississippi for unpaid toil. You will not get free white labor from the North to work fourteen or sixteen hours a day for 50 cents a day. The truth of the matter is you are a quarter of a century behind the age; you have never gotten over the idea of the cheap labor of your pro-slavery days, and you will never see genuine prosperity dawn upon you in the South until you do. Indolence and cheap labor are the curse of the planting States of the South, and the delusion of cheap goods and free trade are the bane of your existence as a people. Elevate the dignity of labor, pay the toiler an honest price for his toil, and prosperity and happiness will be your reward.

The New South, thank God! is just awakening to a true realization of all her grand possibilities. There is no room for croakers and fault-finders there. You must get out of the way or be ground to powder under the wheels of progress! Quit brooding and worrying over the dead past, and try to realize the fact that this is an age of wonderful business activity. Try to catch on as the train of progress passes by, or you will surely be left behind. Stop bothering about how much of the robber-tariff money the poor laboring men have laid up in the Massachusetts savings-banks. Get your laboring men to follow their example; and if you will only pay them decent wages, they will have good bank accounts too.

The truth of the matter is there is little or none of your money in their savings! Why, the mass of your people do not buy enough nor consume enough to furnish New England nor Old England much profit either. You hardly import enough goods into the port of Charleston to pay the salaries of the customs officers! The Northern, Eastern, Middle, and Western States pay the great bulk of the robber-tariff duties, and they are not complaining about it either. Start up cotton and woolen and iron mills, pay your mechanics living wages, keep your money at home, and you will find large balances to labor's credit in Southern savings-banks!

Mr. Chairman, if the protective features of the existing tariff are not striken down, as proposed in the Mills bill, by this House and our ports thrown open to unlimited importations of foreign merchandise, the New South to-day is just standing upon the threshold of her greatest prosperity. Before her are just now opening vistas of wealth and prosperity such as were never dreamed of in the dark days of slavery and sloth and indolence. Strike down the protective system and how soon all your bright hopes will be clouded and dissipated. Capital, which is now eagerly seeking investment in your midst—always cowardly—will leave you as if fleeing from a pestilence. Northern capital and Northern brains and genius and enterprise will forsake you as if pursued by the demon of destruction.

Sir, with protection guarantied, the States of Virginia, and Georgia, and Tennessee, and Alabama will increase in wealth and power and population at a ratio that will cause the bleak hills and rugged mountains of my native State to hide their diminished heads in shame. You have a soil and a climate such as we of the North may well envy. You have your virgin forests, your rich agricultural lands, and your vast deposits of mineral wealth, and all you want is energy and capital to develop them. With all these natural advantages in your favor you have retrograded in the past and allowed your less-favored sister States to far outstrip you in all that constitutes the true grandeur and greatness and wealth of trade and commerce.

You know that all this is true just as well as I do. The late terrible civil strife ought to have demonstrated to you the vital importance of diversified industries in the South, and the utter folly of depending upon New England or Old England for what you are so abundantly able to produce yourselves. To be truly great, every State, like every nation, ought to be truly independent. With factories, and furnaces, and rolling-mills, and machine-shops in the South twenty-odd years ago it would have been as utterly impossible for the North to have overcome you as it would be to-day for the world in arms to destroy this great Republic!

I implore you, therefore, to stand by the policy under which this great Republic has prospered beyond anything in the history of civilized governments.

Let us not be beguiled by the voice of the free-trade charmer, "charm she never so sweetly!" Let us remain true to the policy of the fathers of the Republic under and by reason of which we have grown so great, so wealthy, so powerful and strong! Blessed with every variety of soil and climate—nearly every State an empire within herself, capable of manufacturing within herself nearly everything, from a needle to an anchor, from a pleasure-yacht to the grandest iron-clads that ever defied the fury of old Neptune—why should we be in any way dependent upon any nation or all the nations of the world combined for anything?

Proud, lofty America! Standing alone in the matchless grandeur of her imperial power and greatness, with her matchless mechanics and artisans, her fair women and noble men, let the civilized world learn wisdom from our example in mechanism as well as in the science of true government! And let us be grand and free as a people from any dependence upon foreign workshops, foreign mechanics, and foreign artisans, as we are free and great in the principles of enlightened liberty! [Applause.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration, named by compliment the "Mills bill," proposes a total reduction in our national revenue of $53,720,447, based on importations of 1887. The value of these importations was $79,879,108 on the free-list and $178,329,048 on the dutiable-list, or a total of $258,208,157. The bill also proposes an internal-revenue tax reduction of $24,455,607, which, added to the reduction of import duties, gives a total proposed reduction of $78,176,054.

A majority of the Ways and Means Committee of this House assume the sponsorship of the bill, namely, Mr. MILLS of Texas, Mr. MCMILLIN of Tennessee, Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas, Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky, Mr. TURNER of Georgia, Mr. WILSON of West Virginia, Mr. SCOTT of Pennsylvania, and Mr. BYNUM of Indiana—all Democrats. Six of them represent Southern and two of them Northern States. The minority members of the committee—Mr. KELLEY of Pennsylvania, Mr. BROWNE of Indiana, Mr. REED of Maine, Mr. MCKINLEY of Ohio, and Mr. BURROWS of Michigan—all Republicans and all representing Northern States—declare that when the measure was completed by the majority and presented to the full committee, the majority refused to enter into consideration of its provisions or to disclose any data upon which their action was based, and allowed no modification of the bill unless it was suggested by the majority. So the bill is distinctively a partisan measure—more exclusively partisan than any measure presented to any United States Congress.

The bill is also sectional in its character. It is framed in the interest of the South and Southwest as against the North and Northeast. In addition to its sectionalism, it raids the manufacturing sections of the country to divide booty with the purely agricultural. It is legalized communism in the form of national legislation.

And before I proceed further in my remarks, I desire to call the attention of the House to the professional make-up of our present Ways and Means Committee. In its membership are found eleven lawyers, one cotton planter, and one railroad manager. They are all gentlemen of more than ordinary legislative experience, of high political standing in their several States, and yet were the title of the committee changed from Ways and Means to Judiciary, it would seem natural and appropriate. I hope the eleven lawyers, the cotton-planter, and the railroad manager will not take it as a breach of good manners on my part nor an infraction of the courtesies of the House when I thus publicly call the attention of the farmers, the manufacturers, the product-distributers, the product-carriers, the mechanics, the laborers, and the bankers to the anomalous, or rather abnormal, make-up of a committee charged with the regulation of the nation's commercial, financial, industrial, and social economic interests. The great State of New York—the Empire State of the nation—with more than $650,000,000 of capital invested in manufacturing, with over $1,000,000,000 of product annually turned out of her mills and shops, and with 600,000 wage-earners within her borders, has no representative on this committee, Democrat or Republican; but the States of Texas, Arkansas, Kentucky, Tennessee and Georgia, which, as shown by the census of 1880, had only $98,776,985 of capital invested in manufacturing, and all together employing 81,426 hands, have each a representative on the committee. What a farce!

FREE-TRADE LEGISLATION.

Of course we all know the reason for this abnormal constitution of the Ways and Means Committee. Mind you, I am not condemning the practice of forming our committees with the benefiting of party politics in view; I am deprecating the fact that current political opinion can or should tolerate it. And I will not remain silent, as a New York Representative, when the interests of our great State are ignored in preparatory legislation, let the offending party be Democratic or Republican. Mind you I am making no direct criticism on the able Speaker of this House, who is popularly supposed to be "the author and finisher" of our committees. It has been my privilege to know, and in some cases intimately, every Speaker who has occupied that chair since the days of James L. Orr, and I am free to say here before Democratic and Republican Representatives, that no fairer or abler parliamentarian has presided over the deliberations of this body than Mr. JOHN G. CARLISLE. But this vital business question has passed beyond the impartial judgment of a Speaker; it has become a partisan question.

With a Democratic Executive in the Presidential chair and a Democratic majority in the House it is natural, when tariff legislation is uppermost in Congress, that our committees should be constituted in the interests of free trade. It is also natural that the South, where free-trade opinion rules almost supreme, should hold the majority of and control the action of our important committees, especially those of Ways and Means and the Merchant Marine, for the South demands free trade in British ships as well as British manufactures.

During all the years of chattel slavery within the old Union, when King Cotton sat upon the free-trade throne, the political battle against Northern civilization raged almost incessantly in these Halls; and when secession abortively attempted a confederacy of its own and ordained a written constitution, the eighth section of article 1 declared:

> The congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, etc., but no bounties shall be granted, etc., nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry.

Can it fairly be presumed that the lapse of twenty-five years, however advantaged for a change of policies or principles, would mark the dissolution or subversion of free-trade conceptions and prejudices imprinted on the Southern mind by iteration through a century? As the dominant power in the party, the Southern free-trader vaults into the saddle, and the Northern Democrat submissively goes afoot.

WHO PAYS THE TAX?

As general debate on this question is very near its close, and the House has been supplied with matter and argument approaching surfeit, I will content myself with some observations on a few features of the labor and wages questions as they are now or may be affected by tariff revision on the free-trade plan.

A Democratic speech on the tariff would be an inane partisan effort if it did not saddle the consumer with the tariff tax on the imported article he buys, or, by severer logic, prove that even the home-produced article is enhanced in price by the addition of the duty. The cue for Democratic effort in this line may be found in the following paragraph in President Cleveland's late message:

> Our present tariff laws, the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation, ought to be at once revised and amended. These laws, as their primary and plain effect, raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties. Thus the amount of the duty measures the tax paid by those who purchase for use these imported articles. Many of these things, however, are raised or manufactured in our own country, and the duties now levied upon foreign goods and products are called protection to these home manufactures, because they render it possible for those of our people who are manufacturers to make these taxed articles and sell them for a price equal to that demanded for the imported goods that have paid customs duty.

Now, I grant this is a conceivable theory, and it has been adopted generally by the tariff orators on the other side of the House, who are always loyal followers of a leader, if not logical reasoners.

Sixty years ago, when our industries were weak and undiversified, there was considerable reason for the President's assumption; thirty years ago there was less reason, and now there is hardly any. The ordinary object of protection is not to give any such enhancement of the profit of any particular production over the average rate, but merely to sustain it during the temporary stage of its domestication. Great Britain owes her industrial greatness to her adherence to this policy, for five centuries ago she was little more than an agricultural nation, dependent on continental manufactures for even the clothing worn by her subjects, although they raised the "raw material" at home. And she accomplished her industrial supremacy, not by higgling over 40 per cent., 80 per cent., or 100 per cent. imposts, but by doubling or trebling duties; and when that would not yield the desired protection she enacted prohibitory and penal laws for the protection of her growing industries.

As bearing directly on the question of duties for revenue and duties for protection, I quote the following paragraph from Professor Robert Ellis Thompson's standard work on Political Economy:

Protective duties yield for a considerable period a large revenue to the State, but that is not the object of their imposition. Duties for revenue—i. e., too low to be protective—in spite of their appearance of moderation are highly unjust. They inflict all the hardships of indirect and unequal taxation without even the purpose of benefiting the consumer. Duties for protection, while they bring large revenues, have another purpose, and benefit the consumer to a far greater extent than they tax him, while their amount is equally available for public uses. Their object is their own abolition, for they aim at such a development of the national industry as shall render impossible the importation of the dutiable articles. To impose revenue duties is to accept indirect taxation as a permanent method of finance; to impose protective duties is not.

But let us return to the question. Who pays the tax or duty? Well, that depends upon, first, the quality, price, and supply of the home product against which the imported product must compete, and, second, upon the trade relations existing between the consignor and consignee. Then, possibly, no one in fact pays the duty as a tax, for a careful examination of the interesting report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the revision of the tariff (February 16, 1886) demonstrates the fact that foreign manufacturers often invoice their products for this market through special agencies at a much greater discount from price-lists than those allowed in their home markets, therefore placing their goods here, upon which duty is paid, far below the market value there.

Setting aside the troublesome question of undervaluations, let me present the views of an impartial gentleman (impartial at least as regards the policy dividing Democrats and Republicans), Mr. H. J. Pettifer, secretary of the Workman's Association for Defense of British Industry. Discussing lately this very question, he says:

Take the case of a manufacturer who is trying to compete in a country in which industry is defended with an article also produced in that country. Suppose, for instance, the Americans can produce a certain article for 1 shilling, while we in England can produce and deliver it for 10 pence, we could, if we had free trade with America, undersell them in their own market by 2 pence; but the American is not so foolish as to allow us to do this, so he puts 50 per cent. duty on the article. Now, 50 per cent. on 10 pence is 5 pence, which brings the English article up to 1 shilling, 3 pence, and as it would be absurd for us to offer it for 1 shilling 3 pence when the American can make and sell it for 1 shilling, what we have to do, if we are to sell it in that country at all, is to reduce profits and cut down wages and deliver it at 8 pence, when the 50 per cent. brings it up to the American level. But who has paid the duty? Why, certainly we lose 2 pence, and the American buyer loses 2 pence, but the American Treasury gets the whole of the 4 pence duty toward paying the taxation of the country.

But look at it from another point of view. Suppose we, in England, getting fair profits and paying fair wages, can turn out an article for 1 shilling, and the Germans can deliver it here for 10 pence, what do we do then? Do "we" level up? Certainly not; we level down; we have to reduce profits and cut down wages, in this case just as we did in the other, until we can produce at the German price, without making the German pay the slightest amount toward the taxation of this country, in which he has a free and open market. Is it not time we asked ourselves the question: Which system is best for the workingman, the American, which keeps wages up, or the English, which brings wages down?

Another illustration, one at President Cleveland's old home. Suppose wheat is selling in the Buffalo market at $1 a bushel. The tariff for the protection of the American farmer is 20 cents a bushel. An Erie County farmer drives into town, sells his wheat, and pockets his dollar. A Canadian farmer crosses the Niagara River, pays 20 cents duty, sells his wheat, and pockets 80 cents. Who pays the duty? Ask the Canadian.

But, high duty or low duty, do not let us quarrel over non-essentials. As long as we make foreigners pay a large share of our governmental expenses, and our sixty millions of people do not care enough about the matter to go to the trouble of signing a respectably-sized petition, or even hold a neighborhood mass-meeting in the way of caution or protest against the present method and purpose of collecting impost revenue, we are safe in lowering taxation and shutting off the accumulation of surplus revenue in some other manner, and I hope that is the way all this tariff discussion and legislation will end. Leastwise, if through partisan prejudice and pressure we can not or do not settle this question of fair, patriotic, and business-like principles while we have the opportunity, the people will determine it for us and themselves at the polls within a few months. [Applause.]

STEAM-POWER AND LABOR-SAVING MACHINERY.

I have searched in vain through all the speeches delivered in this House during the past fortnight for some solution of the wages problem involved in the present question. The regular readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD have been lately furnished by industrious wielders of the paste-pot and scissors with "tabulated statements" sufficient in diversity and quantity to keep the mathematically inclined busy until election time. These tables prove little or nothing; for any expert journalist knows that percentages can be juggled to prove either side of an argument, and notably in this line of falsification are the tariff arithmetical wonders performed by that free-trade propagandist who signs himself "A Parsee Merchant;" he takes the sweepstakes.

Before giving an opinion upon the probable effect a lowering of the tariff may have upon work and wages I wish to call the attention of the House to some forces and tendencies which have within the past eighty years wrought revolution in the labor world.

Since the time of the adoption of our national Constitution the civilized nations of the earth have successively passed through sudden transitions in their industrial economy, chiefly on account of changes from hand to steam power, and, adding to the power of steam, the invention and use of labor-saving machinery.

During that period or since, James Watt devised the condensing steam-engine; Hargreaves, the spinning-jenny; Arkwright, the spinning-frame and the factory system; Crompton, the mule-jenny; Cartwright, the power-loom; Whitney, the cotton-gin; Fitch, the steam-ship; Oliver Evans, the high-pressure engine; Stephenson, the locomotive; Morse, the telegraph; Howe, the sewing-machine; Bell, the telephone; Hoe, Bullock, and Scott, the lightning printing-presses; in short, the whole century has been agitated and crowded by inventions in the whole field of applied mechanics and science. And during all this time the workingman, skilled or unskilled, has been forced to adapt himself to unexpected and rapidly-changed conditions. Especially within the past fifty years the conflicts between muscle and brains, the man and the machine, capital and labor, the employer and employé, have been waged unceasingly in Great Britain, continental Europe, and America, and, I am sorry to say, the beginning of the end is not visible.

Allow me to direct your attention to Commissioner Carroll D. Wright's first annual report (1886), and especially to the chapter on "Machinery and overproduction." There you will find the controlling cause of strikes lockouts, and labor disorganization. Think of the hundreds of thousands of American workmen who have been forced to adjust themselves to the changes, generally disadvantageous, wrought by labor-saving machinery and its powerful ally, steam. In the school-book of our fathers it was said that "it takes ten men to make a pin." Now we have a machine that only needs to be fed with wire, oiled and supplied with steam-power, to turn out complete pins, sort them, and even thrust them into the papers in the right numbers and in straight rows. What has become of the ten pin-makers? One probably runs the new machine, and the other nine swell the ranks of unemployed labor, ultimately dropping into the unskilled class below them.

Out of the many illustrations relative to the displacement of labor furnished by Commissioner Wright, I have time only to select a few. In the manufacture of agricultural implements new machinery during the past fifteen or twenty years has displaced fully 50 per cent. of the muscular labor formerly employed. In one establishment cited 600 employés are doing the work which under former conditions would have required 2,145 employés, a displacement of 1,545. In brick-making, improved devices displace 10 per cent. of the labor, and in manufacturing fire-brick 40 per cent. has been displaced. In the manufacture of boots and shoes, the Commissioner gives some very astonishing results. He says:

In one large and long-established manufactory in one of the Eastern States the proprietors testify that it would require five hundred persons working by hand processes to make as many women's boots and shoes as one hundred persons now make with the aid of machinery—a displacement of 80 per cent. In another class of the same industry the number of men required to produce a given quantity of boots and shoes has been reduced one-half. In another locality, and on another quality of boots, being entirely for women's wear, where formerly a first-class workman could turn out six pairs in one week he will now turn out eighteen pairs.

A well-known firm, engaged in manufacturing boots and shoes in the West states that in the grade of goods manufactured by it, it would take 120 persons working by hand to produce the amount of work done in its factory by 60 employés, and the hand-work would not compare in workmanship and appearance, as expressed by the concern, by 50 per cent. Goodyear's sewing-machine for turned shoes, with 1 man, will sew 250 pairs in one day. It would require 8 men working by hand to sew the same number. By the use of King's heel-shaver or trimmer 1 man will trim 300 pairs of shoes a day, where it formerly took 3 men to do the same.

One man, with the McKay machine, can handle 300 pairs of shoes per day, while, without the machine, he could handle but 5 pairs in the same time. In nailing on heels, by the use of machinery, 1 man and a boy can heel 300 pairs of shoes per day. It would require 5 men to do this by hand. In finishing the bottoms of shoes, 1 man with a sand-papering machine can handle 300 pairs, while it would require 4 men to do the same by hand. A large Philadelphia firm, engaged in the manufacture of boys' and children's shoes, states—and the foreman of the establishment corroborates the evidence—that the introduction of new machinery within the past thirty years has displaced about six times the amount of hand labor required, and that the cost of the product has been reduced one-half. On another grade of goods, manufactured in Maine, the facts collected by the agents of the bureau show that 1 man can now do the work which twenty years ago required 10 men.

In the manufacture of carpets the improvement in machinery in the past thirty years, taking weaving, spinning, and all the processes together, have displaced from ten to twenty times the number of persons now necessary.

In the manufacture of clothing, a cutting-machine will do six times the amount of work formerly done by one man in the old way. In the manufacture of soft and stiff hats there has been a displacement in the proportion of 9 to 1.

In the olden time, in the cotton-goods industry, an adult hand-loom weaver wove from 42 to 48 yards of common shirting per week. A weaver tending six power-looms in a cotton factory of to-day would produce 1,500 yards a week.

In the manufacture of furniture, from one-half to three-fourths only of the old number of persons is now required.

In the lumber business 12 co-laborers with a Bucker machine will dress 12,000 staves; the same number of men by hand process would dress but 2,500. One boy running a planing-machine in turning woodwork for musical instruments and materials does the work of 25 men.

In manufactures of railroad supplies, rubber boots and shoes, silk, and soap the displacement is 50 per cent. in each.

But there is another factor in the displacement of hand and muscular processes, partially taken into account in the above statistics, which trebles man's productive force. It is stated by the bureau of statistics in Berlin that four-fifths of the engines now working in the world have been constructed during the past twenty-five years. The force equivalent to the working steam-engines represents—in the United States, 7,500,000 horse-power; in England, 7,000,000 horse-power; in Germany, 4,500,000 horse-power; in France, 3,000,000, and in Austria, 1,500,000. Add the horse-power represented by locomotives, 3,000,000, and the total is 46,000,000 horse-power. A steam horse-power is equal to three actual horses' power, and a living horse is equal to seven men. The steam-engines of the world represent, therefore, the work of 1,000,000,000 men.

Recent calculations by Hon. Edward Appleton, of Massachusetts, place the number of locomotives in the United States at 28,600. Commissioner Wright thus summarizes Mr. Appleton's data:

To do the work of these locomotives upon the existing common roads of the country and the equivalent of that which has been done upon the railroads the past year (1885) would require, in round numbers, 54,000,000 horses and 13,500,000 men. The work is now done, so far as men are concerned, by 250,000. The present cost of operating the railroads of the country with steam power is, in round numbers, $502,600,000 per annum; but to carry on the same amount of work with men and horses would cost the country $11,308,500,000.

REFORM THE REFORMERS.

Now, gentlemen, many of you are ready to ask, what connection has this wonderful array of statistical information to do with the tariff or the Mills bill? Well, frankly, I know of no better way to enlist the regard of the Ways and Means Committee or arouse the attention of this House to the amount of our machinery power and the magnitude of our industries, or to the vicious partisan policy which has projected a crude measure, in my opinion, into a Congress imperfectly prepared to fairly consider it. My best judgment is against dragging tariff revision into politics. Our capitalists, manufacturers, and bread-winners in general are of all shades of political opinion, and why half the industrial interests of the country should be brought into a game of battledoor and shuttlecock by politicians who have nothing at stake except transient honors and temporary spoils, must seem to every right-thinking citizen a blundering and vicious proceeding. An enactment covering not over four pages of bill-paper could dispose of the present surplus and provide a just measure of revenue for the future.

Our manufacturers and workingmen will not be deceived by the free-trade cries of "monopolies," "trusts," "cotton lords," "robber barons," and so forth. Three hundred and twenty-five men in any given industry know more about just wage rates, hours of labor, profits of their employers, and justice between man and man, than the three hundred and twenty-five Congressmen here assembled give them credit for.

REGULATION OF WAGES.

How are wages in the trades in this country established and regulated? Are wage schedules mere matters of chance or caprice? Do the "robber barons" or "monopolists" pay such rates as they please? Go into any trades union, Knights of Labor assembly, labor union, or workingmen's association and you will get the correct answer. In these halls of organized labor rates of wages and rules governing trades are proposed, discussed, passed upon, promulgated, and sustained. They are the workingmen's legislatures, where wage, social, arbitrative, and economic questions are settled. What an immense industrial army the united ranks of the Unionists and Knights aggregate, over one million by actual count; and not a member of the Cobden Club, honorary or active, carried on their muster-rolls. [Applause.]

It is safe to assert that these two great bodies of organized labor regulate and uphold directly one-third of the wage scales paid in this country and Canada. Indirectly, but surely, the other two-thirds feel and acknowledge this supreme power in wage regulation, craft discipline, and industrial well-being. It is only during the abnormal period of a "strike" that the attention of the general public is called to these great organizations of skilled and unskilled labor, yet every day in the year witnesses and records the assembling and legislative action of thousands upon thousands of these unions and assemblies. In the very nature of things these men associate for the protection of American labor, and in this connection I would direct the attention of members on both sides of this House to the remarks made by Mr. FORAN, of Ohio, a week ago.

Mr. FORAN and myself are generally far apart on political questions, but on the labor problem, on the wages question, and especially in our views on the Mills bill, we agree. Why? Because as representatives of organized skilled labor we see disorganization of and disaster to the well-being of the wage-earners in the possible passage of an act which subordinates every interest of the workingman to the attainment of cheap products through cheapened labor. The bill strikes at the producer, whether capitalist or workingman. By its ramshackle provisions, lawyers, doctors, commissionaires, doctrinaires, office-holders, speculators, coupon-clippers, middlemen, and the whole army of do-nothings—people who create nothing and try to control everything—are to be benefited at the expense of the American toilers who earn their living by exertion of brain or muscle, or both. The 5,000,000 workers of America are to be pitted against the 30,000,000 workers of Europe.

The free-list, which has steadily grown of late years, is to be further enlarged. In 1870 it aggregated one-ninth of the dutiable list; to-day it is about one-half; so that one-third of all imported goods now come in free of duty. All this talk about the "international comity of trade" and "the fixed economic principles which regulate trade and commerce between nations" has no interest to the American workingman. The truth is, he believes that the $240,000,000 worth of foreign goods which annually come into this market from abroad ought to be made here. He reasons the whole question of "the surplus" and "protection" in this way: If the locking up of $100,000,000 of our currency in our national Treasury, collected (he may admit) in the shape of taxes, causes congestion, contraction, and premonitory symptoms of a national panic, what would be the condition of our country if the balance of trade to the same amount went against us for only four years of free trade, and in that time $400,000,000 of our gold left our shores, never to return, to swell the coffers of our commercial rivals? No arguments of Cobden Club parasites or free-trade professors drawing fixed incomes from college funds can argue the American workman into any policy which exports American wages. He believes in keeping the wage-earning power here; he wants the field of labor enlarged, not contracted, and to secure the enlargement of that field he advocates diversity of production and expansion of development.

I want to say just here that while it may be possible to pass this bill in whole or emasculated, as a party measure, there are revising committees in all labor assemblies which will pass upon its merits independent of politics; and these great bodies of intelligent wage-earners will stand like a wall of iron against the proposed free-list and the cutting of wages foreshadowed in the impaired duties named in the dutiable list. American workmen have battled too long and sacrificed too much in gaining the position they now hold, to now tamely submit to any partisan demand. During this and the last Congress their power has been felt in this hall; a power which has both persuaded and constrained legislation for a more equal distribution of privileges, and unmasked the wrongs committed by monopoly and stall-fed avarice. [Applause.]

But suppose we let some of these workingmen speak for themselves. On the 8th of the present month a workingmen's mass-meeting was held in the large hall of Cooper Union, New York City. Its officers—Michael Breslin, president, and Jesse G. Miller, secretary—have sent me the following official copy of the resolutions adopted at the meeting:

Whereas, the so-called Mills tariff bill, now under discussion in the House, of Representatives, by placing on the free-list many articles that come into competition with the products of American labor, and by sweeping reductions in the duties upon others, menaces the ruin of many of our industries, and would if enacted into a law, entail great loss of employment and widespread suffering, among working people; and

Whereas, the workingmen of this country have been contemptuously denied a hearing by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, which framed the bill; and

Whereas, it is now apparent to every workingman that the prevailing agitation of the tariff question and the proposed reduction of duties are destroying confidence in business, reducing wages in some occupations and stopping altogether the wages in others;

Therefore, we, the workingmen of the city of New York, in mass meeting assembled, earnestly protesting against the passage of the Mills tariff bill and against any and all measures of a similar character which threaten the labor and industry of our country and propose to lower the American standard of wages, do hereby declare and proclaim the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we demand of the Representatives in Congress from this city that they not only vote against this most recent attack on the prosperity of American labor, but that they use their utmost endeavors to secure its defeat.

Resolved, That we protest against a bill which puts raw material on the free-list when that so-called raw material is the product of American labor.

Resolved, That we protest against a bill which would break down the barrier which defends American labor from competition with the pauper labor of Europe and Asia, and aims to reduce our families to the foreign level of cheapness and poverty.

Resolved, That we demand that the internal-revenue war taxes be repealed, and that protection to American labor be maintained and made more effective.

Resolved, That we call upon our fellow-workingmen in all parts of the land to rise up and denounce the Mills tariff bill as a menace to our welfare and to our rights as citizens, which threatens to deprive us of the opportunities of education afforded by the American system of high wages, and we denounce as a fraud the free-trade argument that the cost of living in this country is increased in proportion to the rates of duty on imports, except as we choose and are able to live better here than our unfortunate rivals in foreign countries.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the President and every member of Congress.

COMPETITION AND CHEAPNESS.

The chief end of the Democratic tariff argument is universal competition and cheap goods. Sir Edward Sullivan, an authority seldom quoted by Cobdenites, says that—free trade means untaxed foreign competition; that foreign competition means competition in cheapness; competition in cheapness means competition in cheap labor; competition in cheap labor means competition in flesh and blood; and competition in flesh and blood is slavery.

Facilis est descensus Averni.

I say again, it has cost the American workmen millions of dollars in wages and lost time to reach the vantage-ground which they now occupy. The capitalist and the wage-earner, the employer and the employé, after fierce years of struggle and misunderstanding, now generally respect and consult each other's interests. What benefits one benefits the other. Arbitration is supplanting strikes; co-operative production will succeed arbitration, as co-operation is the child of confidence. He is a mean workman who begrudges his employer fair remuneration for his capital, and he is a mean employer who does not pay a fair day's wage for a fair day's work; for good labor at good wages is cheaper than poor labor at poor wages. Professor Thompson says:

The lowest wages that you can get a man to live on will not get the best work out of him. Put a whole people on such wages, and keep them there, if you can, for two our three generations, and you will have crushed the energy, the spirit, the heart out of that people, and made them a very inferior and unprofitable class of workmen. On the other hand, wages that put heart and hope into a man, that make him feel that his personal efforts and his best work are needed to keep them at present rates, that offer him the prospect of becoming his own master by frugality, that enable him to educate his children to fill a place like his own intelligently, or perhaps to rise to a higher place, such wages are in the long run the best of investments.

The President and his party profess sympathy for and protection to the interests of labor. How that can be done by taking thirty or forty fairly established American industries from the dutiable list and consigning them to a free-list grave is more than I can comprehend. I believe—and my belief is shared by every intelligent workingman in this country—that the only safe policy for the protection and promotion of American labor is to compel every European manufacturer to pay into the Treasury of the United States the difference in wages he has saved by not paying his workmen as much as American workmen receive, before he is allowed to sell his goods in this country.

A tariff revised on such a principle would meet the views of every fair-minded citizen, would allay alarm, give stability to industry, satisfy the employer and employé, equalize the consumer's taxes, prevent destructive competition, encourage new industries, and keep this nation, as it is confessedly now, in the front rank of the nations of the earth in material progress and Christian civilization. [Applause.]

Mr. J. H. Walker, in an address delivered before the Massachusetts Club a short time ago, said:

In view of the difficulty of individual investigation and agreement, it is only fair that all disputants accept the rate of wages given in the United States or Massachusetts reports for the different countries. I have taken the highest rate for each country given by either report, and I find the following yearly earnings. A family of four persons average to furnish two wage-workers. The total possible earnings of a man and woman in each country, in eight occupations, are as follows:

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the gentleman from New York may be allowed to proceed, if he wishes to do so.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am very grateful for the request, but shall not occupy further time as other gentlemen desire to occupy the floor.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, the platforms of the political organizations in this country adopted in their great national conventions, presumably at least, represent their sentiments and convictions on public affairs and the policies of the parties adopting them. The Democratic party has year after year adopted platforms in the various States, and every four years has adopted a national platform expressive of what it thinks would catch votes. In 1856, upon this all-engrossing and commanding issue of the tariff, the Democrati Ncational Convention resolved—

That justice and sound policy forbid the Federal Government to foster one branch of industry to the detriment of another; or to cherish the interests of one portion to the injury of another portion of our common country.

Its platform of 1856 reaffirmed the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions of 1798, which averred among other things in substance that the power of the Federal Government to levy taxes for the purpose of protecting the industries of the country did not exist; and the substance of that provision of those resolutions was incorporated into the Confederate constitution when it forbade the levying of taxes for the protection of American industries.

The platforms of 1860 of both the Douglas and the Breckinridge conventions were silent upon the subject of the tariff. The Douglas contingent of the Democratic party at that time had, I presume, no very pronounced ideas upon the subject, represented, perhaps, a variety of opinions upon the question of protection, and did not seek to embody them in any platform.

The Breckinridge contingent of the Democratic party at the same time had in view, beyond all doubt, the establishment of the Southern Confederacy; and its views of the policy that should obtain were expressed in the Confederate constitution in the way I have spoken of.

The Democratic platform of 1864 was also silent upon the subject of the tariff. In the convention of 1864 only the tail of the Democratic party was represented; the dog had not been admitted, and the delegates who had been chosen in the States that were represented in that convention saw fit to give no expression of opinion upon this subject.

The Democratic platform of 1868 favored incidental protection in this language:

A tariff for revenue upon foreign imports and such equal taxation under the internal-revenue laws as will afford protection to domestic manufacturers, and as will, without impairing the revenue, impose the least burden upon and best promote and encourage the great industrial interests of the country.

That platform was more nearly the assertion of the theory of protection than any other which the national conventions of the Democratic party have ever adopted. The Democratic platform of 1872 averred:

That there are in our midst honest but irreconcilable differences of opinion with regard to the respective systems of protection and free trade; and we remit the decision of the subject to the people, to their Congressional districts, and to the decision of Congress thereof, wholly free from executive interference and dictation.

It semed to be the leading idea of the Democratic party at that time that for an Executive to dictate the policy of the party was more than a violation of the amenities and courtesies of politics. It amounted perhaps to an infringement of the theory of our Government, that legislation upon this subject should originate in the House of Representatives. With the proposition embodied that the Congressional districts should for themselves regulate the subject I am not disposed to quarrel.

The platform of 1876 demanded:

That all custom-house taxation shall be only for revenue.

The Democratic party at that juncture of its history had gone back to its original view asserted in the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions of 1798.

The Democratic platform of 1880 also favored the tariff for revenue only; but the Democratic platform of 1884, upon which Grover Cleveland was elected, straddled the subject. It declared:

We therefore denounce the abuses of the existing tariff, and subject to the preceding limitations, which are, first, that taxation shall be limited to the requirements of economical government; second, that the reduction of taxation can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with the foreign labor, and without imposing lower rates of duty than will amply cover any increased cost in production which may exist in consequence of the higher rate of wages prevailing in this country; we demand that the Federal taxation shall be exclusively for public purposes, and shall not exceed the needs of the Government economically administered.

That is the platform upon which President Cleveland was elected.

President Cleveland in view of that declaration would have done well, it seems to me, if he had permitted the subject of tariff revision to have been managed exclusively and solely by the House of Representatives, which has really control of the subject. But instead of doing that, President Cleveland sent to the House of Representatives at the opening of this session of Congress a message upon the subject of tariff revision which is without a parallel in the history of the American Republic. No other President in any emergency of the country at any other time has sent to the House of Representatives a message so positively and clearly indicating a line of policy upon an economic question as has President Cleveland in this case.

Having done that, it is said that through the influence of the Administration exerted in various ways Democratic nominations in various Congressional districts of the country have been controlled by the Administration in the interest of free trade or in the interest of the President's policy as indicated in his message. The Administration has not only done that, but it is reported in the newspapers that Democrats of good standing and of influential position who have heretofore been looked upon as leaders of the party have been denied the benefit of patronage, have been denied access to the President in consultations, have been refused an opportunity of presenting their views and insisting upon them, and have been driven by every expedient at the command of the Administration from the ranks of the Democratic party. It is even asserted, with what truth I do not pretend to say, that public measures involving the public interest have been denied the Executive sanction because of the attitude of Representatives in Congress upon the subject of tariff legislation. And it has been shown that the Administration, by an approval of the most charming and beautiful character, has commended the attitude of a recalcitrant Pennsylvanian when he espoused the cause of the Mills bill upon the floor of the House of Representatives to the detriment of his State and the injury of the whole country. [Applause.]

Without parallel I have said is the action of the Administration on the question of tariff legislation in the House of Representatives. At no time in the history of the whole country has an administration or a President undertaken to influence so directly and so compulsorily the legislation of the House of Representatives as has been evinced and as is being daily evinced by this Administration upon this economic problem which the House is now considering.

Mr. REED. The next thing to it was in the case of the Kansas-Nebraska bill.

Mr. BAYNE. Yes; there was a similar effort at that time by a Democratic administration in behalf of the extension of slavery.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of this platform of 1884, which manifestly straddled the subject of protection, which was of such tenor and import that my colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] could go into the State of New York and the State of New Jersey and explain to the people of those States that protection was safe in the hands of the Democratic party; in view of the fact that representatives could go into the free-trade States of this country and represent that the platform of 1884 was in favor of a revision of the tariff and in favor of free trade, is it fair, is is fair play that a President elected on that platform should influence the House of Representatives with a view to the enforcement of his policy? Is it fair to the people of the country that the House of Representatives, elected on that platform, many of whose members appear to be subject to coercion, should enact tariff legislation looking toward free trade when that platform of 1884 was susceptible of a construction looking towards protection? My conclusion is that it is not right, that fair play requires that the voters of the United States, Democrats and Republicans, should have an opportunity of voting on this subject before any action is taken by the House of Representatives. That chance should be given to the voters of this country before we enact tariff legislation.

But, Mr. Chairman, in view of the duplex Democratic declaration of 1884, in view of the explanation given it in New York and New Jersey by Mr. RANDALL and other Democrats, what shall be said of the appointment of a Ways and Means Committee, embracing six members from free-trade States, who absolutely represent almost nothing of the economic interests of this country as compared with the great Northern States? It is true there is a representative upon that committee from the State of Pennsylvania, and there is a member on that committee from the State of Indiana, but those gentlemen, distinguished as they are, are but the tail, and can be wagged ad libitum by the Democratic dog. I mean this in no disrespectful sense. I mean it simply in the sense of outvoting the representatives from the Northern States. The six representatives on the Ways and Means Committee from the Southern States and the two Democratic members of that committee from the Northern States formulated the Mills bill from beginning to end. The Republican members of the committee had nothing to do with it—they were not permitted to have anything to do with it. So the six Southern Democrats on that committee could do as they pleased, and there was nothing left for the two Northern Democrats to do but to fall into line, which they appear to have done, gracefully.

Why should these gentleman, forsooth, formulate and prepare a measure on the subject of tariff revision, which involves not only the prosperity of capital, but the employment of labor also? They are not business men. Tariff revision deals with a business problem. They are not interested in the objects sought by protection. Protection is specially solicitous about the welfare of labor. Now, judge these gentleman by what their States represent in this respect.

According to the census of 1880 the amount of wages paid in Arkansas was, in round numbers, $925,000; in Georgia, $5,266,000; in Kentucky, $11,670,000; in Tennessee, $5,254,000; in Texas, $3,343,000; and in West Virginia, $4,313,000; an aggregate of about $30,750,000. Now, in my own little county of Allegheny, represented by my colleague on my right [Mr. DALZELL] and myself, there were paid in wages that year $22,371,000. Thus the one county of Allegheny paid within eight millions as much wages as the entire amount paid by those States represented by a majority of the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. ADAMS. What is that aggregate?

Mr. BAYNE. Thirty million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars was the amount paid by all the six States represented by the Southern members of the Committee on Ways and Means who formulated the tariff bill under discussion.

Mr. ADAMS. My own county in Illinois paid $37,000,000 in 1880, and last year paid $74,000,000 in wages.

Mr. BAYNE. And the city of Philadelphia paid $64,000,000 in 1880, and the State of Pennsylvania $134,000,000, and the great city of New York, not represented on the committee at all, paid $198,000,000.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. BAYNE. I have not the time. I have only a half hour. I will yield for a question if my time be extended.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I have no power to do that, but I should like to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, as it is in the aggregate so it is in detail with these States. Take the wool statistics.

Wool statistics.

States.	Number of spindles.	Foreign wool in condition, purchased.	Domestic wool purchased.	Scoured wool (not including waste or shoddy) purchased.
		Pounds.	Pounds.	Pounds.
Arkansas	1,360	.....	189,000	174,000
Georgia	2,224	.....	366,274	310,074
Kentucky	14,110	.....	1,230,075	1,230,075
Tennessee	6,860	.....	883,338	805,836
Texas	600	.....	175,000	770,000
Total	25,154	.....	2,843,687	.....
Vermont	46,264	161,404	3,441,787	1,719,580
Rhode Island	160,524	2,198,726	17,151,957	9,520,553
Massachusetts	461,776	7,391,993	48,748,041	28,034,931

This table shows that the little State of Vermont has more spindles and purchased more wool than all the States represented by the gentlemen who controlled the formulation of this bill. The little State of Rhode Island, with but two Representatives in the House, exceeded all those States fivefold, and the State of Massachusetts did fifteen times the amount of business.

Now, take the boot and shoe industry—I select that article to please my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL]. Here is a table which shows the number of establishments and the amount of wages paid in 1880:

TABLE B.

States.	Number of establishments.	Wages paid in year.
Arkansas
Georgia	4	$11,445
Kentucky	15	159,587
Tennessee	3	9,905
Texas
West Virginia	1	3,500
Total	22	185,437
Massachusetts	982	24,875,106

And by this it is shown that the six States honored with representatives on the Committee of Ways and Means had but 22 establishments, and paid in wages but $185,437, while the State of Massachusetts had 982 establishments and paid nearly $25,000,000 in wages.

Here is a table with reference to iron and steel:

Iron and steel.

States.	Number of establishments.	Total wages paid in year.
Arkansas
Georgia	14	$185,489
Kentucky	29	1,344,400
Tennessee	43	659,773
Texas	1	27,720
West Virginia	29	1,541,816
Total	116	3,759,198
Pennsylvania	366	25,095,850
New York	89	4,099,451

Now, here is a table which makes a like exhibit and tells a like story. Take leather, tanned, and this is what is shown:

States.	Number of establishments.	Total wages paid.
Arkansas	4	$942
Georgia	79	18,040
Kentucky	46	33,263
Tennessee	113	27,700
Texas	21	3,924
West Virginia	93	99,338
Total	356	184,207
California	63	132,629
New Jersey	56	762,697

I have tried hard to find out something that they do down there, something they manufacture. I have looked over the long list with that object in view, and I have found that they do some leather tanning. They have 356 leather-tanning establishments, and they paid in wages $184,207. California, having but 63 establishments, paid out $132,000; and New Jersey, with but 56, paid over $762,000 a year in wages. It required but $319 to run an establishment in the States that have a majority of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, while in New Jersey and California it required over $7,000. No wonder they have no strikes down there. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mixed textiles make a like showing:

States.	Number of establishments.	Total wages paid.
Arkansas
Georgia
Kentucky	5	$135,948
Tennessee	1	7,500
Texas
West Virginia
Total	6	143,448
Connecticut	43	888,843
Pennsylvania	126	11,536,813

Now, an examination of this table shows that the little State of Connecticut paid nearly a million dollars in wages, while all the States of the Ways and Means Committee south of Mason and Dixon's line paid but $143,000, and the great State of Pennsylvania paid eleven and a half millions.

Next I have selected the glass establishments, and I have taken the number of establishments and the capital employed, and the total wages paid as shown by the census of 1880. Here is the exhibit:

States.	Number of glass establishments.	Capital.	Total wages paid in year.
Arkansas
Georgia
Kentucky	5	$795,000	$150,322
Tennessee
Texas
West Virginia	1		700
Total	6	795,000	151,022
New Jersey	27	2,728,021	1,309,638
Pennsylvania	78	7,639,706	3,807,306

All the States of the South having representatives on the Ways and Means Committee had but 6 establishments, with a total capital of $725,000, and they paid but $151,000 in wages, while New Jersey had 27 establishments and Pennsylvania 78, and the gentlemen who represent States largely devoid of this industry undertake to legislate upon it, as if they were quite capable of understanding the subject, and with a confidence which few men would dare to arrogate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, why should a committee representing no more business enterprise than that, knowing no more about the economic problem which is presented by this bill than these figures imply—why should such a committee undertake to formulate legislation for the control of the business interests of this country? This is a business matter and business men should look into it and manage it. But, sir, I aver, and I challenge contradiction, that while we of the North are in favor of high wages to workingmen, you of the South are in favor of low wages. You want to keep wages down. I aver that you want to keep them down and that you mean to keep them down, and I know the reason you want to keep wages down. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] was honest enough to admit it the other day. You want to keep wages low because the few own the property in the Southern States, and if you raise wages you will put the wage-workers in competition with the few. Those wage-workers will gradually pick up little bodies of land and take to growing cotton and sugar and other things in competition with you, and I aver that the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means want low wages, and do not want any legislation that will maintain or raise the wages of the workingmen of this country.

Mr. HOOKER. I say to the gentleman that the negroes of the South, in my region at least, are the best paid laborers in this country or anywhere else.

Mr. FUNSTON. Yes; they get $8 a month.

Mr. HOPKINS, of Illinois. No; they do not get $8 on an average.

Mr. BLAND (to Mr. BAYNE). How about your coal region in Pennsylvania and the Carnegie works, and your fights and your strikes?

Mr. BAYNE. I have given the reason why they have no strikes down South. It is because they have nobody to strike and nothing to strike for. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I endeavored to show in the first place by the declaration of the Democratic party in its national conventions, and by the course pursued by that party in States like New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania that it was not fair to revise the tariff at this session of Congress, because the issue had not been fairly and squarely made in the campaign of 1884, or since that time; and my next endeavor has been to show that the gentlemen from the six Southern States on the Ways and Means Committee have the power to control their two Democratic associates from the Northern States, and that those gentlemen are wholly unfit to revise the tariff in a business-like way and according to practical business principles, because they are utterly lacking in that business knowledge which is requisite to such an undertaking.

While I have thus, however, endeavored to show that the consideration of the question should be postponed until a Congress shall have been elected upon the square issue presented by the President's message, there is no sort of doubt that the Democratic majority will persist in its endeavor to foist upon the country the product of its theoretical knowledge of economical questions, because that party has always placed its dependence upon theories rather then upon facts, and looks with more favor upon the à priori method of reaching conclusions than it does upon the practical course of deriving conclusions from actual experience.

The Democratic party in the past, whenever it came into power, has reduced tariff duties. During the ninety-nine years of our national existence under the present Constitution there have been over one hundred and thirty-five acts of Congress relating to tariff. The history of the country presents periods of alternation between protection and tariff for revenue. Every period of tariff for revenue was the result of Democratic ascendancy, and every period of protection was the result of the success of the Whig or Republican party. During the progress of this great debate—a debate I believe to be unequaled in the history of the country for learning, versatility, and the citation of facts—during the progress, I say, of this debate, one great and important feature of the system of protection has not been elaborated anything like as fully as its importance would seem to require. I refer to the effect which tariff legislation would have upon our financial system.

The student of our history and the clerk capable of single-entry bookkeeping will alike come to the conclusion that our financial system depends largely upon practical protection. The student of history will ascertain by an examination of our past that in every period of low tariff the precious metals were drained out of the country. The precious metals were sent abroad to purchase the products of foreign countries. The panic of 1837 and the panic of 1857 occurred after and in consequence of the tariff of 1833 and after and in consequence of the tariff of 1846. The gold and silver had been drained out of the country. The banks were unable to redeem their paper. By many persons who have not thought upon the subject the conclusion is arrived at that bad management was solely responsible for that. The truth is, that in nearly all cases it was the interest of the State banks to preserve their integrity and their solvency and to redeem their paper and to maintain themselves as respectable, solvent institutions.

The men who were interested in those banks had put their money in them; they had the pride of success, and the misfortunes of the banks meant losses to them, but they could not help it. The misfortunes to the banks were the results of national legislation which caused the precious metals to go abroad, and which thus disabled the banks so that they could not redeem their paper. Up to 1860 the United States mints had coined over six hundred millions of dollars of gold, and yet at that time there was but about one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty millions of gold in the United States. Four hundred and fifty million dollars of this sum and all the gold we had obtained in the years preceding that time had gone abroad. Now, the presence of gold and silver coin, and the paper of the banks and of the Government redeeming paper currency with gold and silver coin, make the paper currency of the country equally as good as coin. We have now a paper currency which is just as good as gold. It is just as good as gold, because it can be converted into gold at any moment of time.

Now, I want you to think for a moment about what the tariff of 1861 has done in this behalf. The balance of trade in all the history of the country before 1861 was against us, excepting an occasional year now and then, but the high tariff of 1861, notwithstanding the great war, notwithstanding the fact that we purchased largely from abroad, and notwithstanding the fact that we borrowed great sums of money from foreign countries, enabled us to redeem all our bonds held abroad, to pay for products which were purchased abroad, and so early as 1868 or 1870 the balance of trade began to turn in our favor, and from that time on each succeeding year brought gold and silver into our country from foreign countries to pay for what we sold to foreign countries in excess of what we bought from them, and to such an extent has this trade been in our favor that the vast aggregate is not less now than one thousand four hundred millions of dollars.

Now, anybody who would theorize about this would conclude that we ought to have in the United States a large quantity of gold and silver; and what is the fact? Why the fact is we have an immense quantity of gold and silver—a greater quantity than we have ever had at any former period of our history. It is estimated that there is now in the United States between eight and nine hundred millions of dollars of gold bullion and gold coin, and we have over three hundred millions, including fractional currency, of silver coin. There are more than two coined dollars back of every paper dollar, and every paper dollar is consequently as good as a coined dollar. It was the Republican policy of protection that brought about this condition of things.

Now, suppose you supplant the Republican policy of protection with the Democratic plan. What is the result going to be? Simply a vast increase of imports without a corresponding increase of exports. Our exports are absolutely regulated by the law of supply and demand. We cannot sell one bushel more of wheat in London under a free-trade policy than we can sell under the protection policy.

It has been asserted over and over again in this debate that the value of wheat is fixed by the quantity offered at Mark Lane. That proposition ignores the important factor of home consumption as if Mark Lane came over here and fixed our price, while in truth the price fixed here is owing to the home supply and the home demand, and that those two regulate the quantity which we offer in Europe. Now, while it is true that Mark Lane fixes the value of wheat over there, wheat is made neither higher nor lower by protection or free trade supposing the present conditions to continue. But if the policy of free trade shall obtain the value of wheat and of all other farm products is likely to become much less both in this country and in Europe, and for this simple reason: If the operatives and capital now engaged in manufacturing interests should be driven to other employments many of them would turn their attention to agriculture, and while the number of home consumers would not be increased, the number of producers would be augmented.

Now, how any sensible people having such resources as we have in this country, having such a home market as ours is, and having the power by reason of our great resources to make the United States the gold treasury of the world—why any sensible people should abandon a policy which secured beyond all doubt these great advantages to us, is a mystery to me, and it seems to me it should be a mystery to every patriotic citizen of the country. It is without justification or excuse. It is a bad time to make the change, for in the calendar year of 1887 our domestic exports were about $703,000,000, while our imports were $708,000,000, and for the first time in fifteen or sixteen years has the balance of trade turned against us. If the Mills bill should become a law the balance of trade would become still greater and greater against us. History would repeat itself. The Democratic policy, which has always heretofore driven from the country our precious metals and drawn into the country the products of foreign countries, would drive our vast accumulation of precious metals abroad and would draw in the products of foreign manufacturers.

When our gold and silver should have gone abroad and our paper should not be convertible into coin, and commercial credits should be brought to the test which the absence of good money always brings about, we should have a repetition of the experience of 1837 and of 1857. That is the outlook which the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee, and the Democratic majority in the House of Representatives, and the Democratic President of the United States invite. They do not invite it, perhaps, intentionally; they do it unwittingly. Some do it, perhaps, through motives of jealousy; there may be real envy here and there. It is not difficult to discern that most of the Southern Democrats would just as leave buy what they want from Old England as from New England. On memorial occasions, or when an appropriation is wanted for some public exhibition at New Orleans or at some other point, sectional lines seem to be obliterated and the gush of fraternal regard seems to fill the lips and hearts of our Southern friends to overflowing. But when it comes to a practical test of friendship, when it comes to a question whether a few cents more shall be paid for the blanket manufactured in Iowa or in New England over the price demanded for such a blanket by Old England, then the gush subsides and the fraternal spirit takes a rest.

We want no tariff legislation at this session of Congress. When the tariff shall be revised we want it revised by its friends. The Republicans, however, are perfectly willing to reduce the revenue of the Government. They are willing to take the tax off domestic tobacco, which will reduce the revenue $30,000,000. They are willing to take the duties off raw sugar and to place a small duty on refined sugar, and to pay a bounty equivalent to the present rate of duty on the home production of sugar. They are willing to release from duty the spirits used in the arts and to discontinue special liquor licenses. There they want to stop. This simple proposition will reduce the revenue between $80,000,000 and $90,000,000, as much as and probably more than it should be reduced. The Republicans feel it to be their duty to remember the soldiers of the Republic, most of whom are now a good way past the meridian of life and many of them needing that assistance which the Government should not hesitate to freely give. It is therefore the aim of the Republican party to maintain a sufficient income by the Government to provide for such as these.

The cry of the President and the Democratic party as to the great danger resulting from the vast surplus in the Treasury is the invention of the politician, and not the outgiving of the statesman. The President knows that the national banks all over the country have deposits of money belonging to the Government, and he knows that the money thus deposited is being used for commercial purposes. The list of banks obtained from the Secretary of the Treasury by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] shows that there are about three hundred of them having deposits. The President and the Secretary of the Treasury know it now if they did not know it before, that they have the power to purchase United States bonds with the money that comes into the Treasury, and it is obviously within their power to reduce the surplus by the purchase of bonds to whatever extent they may deem advisable. In the face of these two facts, the distribution of the money throughout the country to the national banks, and the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase Government bonds, to raise a hue and cry about the danger of the surplus interfering with the business of the country is sheer nonsense. The business of the country is threatened with infinitely greater disaster by the legislation proposed in the Mills bill, and next November, when the people of the country will have an opportunity of deciding whether the Republicans be right or the Democrats be right, if I am not greatly mistaken the verdict will be decisively in favor of the Republicans.

Mr. LAIRD was recognized.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, as I am to follow the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD], it may as well be understood now by the Chair and by the House that I have agreed to yield him ten minutes of my time, to begin at the end of his own time.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, the financial condition of this country to-day is such as to alarm thinking men into reflection.

Speaking of this condition, the President of the United States, in his message of December 6, 1887, uses the following language:

> You are confronted at the threshold of your legislative duties with a condition of the national finances which imperatively demands immediate and careful consideration.
> This condition of our Treasury is not altogether new; and it has more than once of late been submitted to the people's representatives in the Congress, who alone can apply a remedy. And yet the situation still continues, with aggravated incidents, more than ever presaging financial convulsion and wide-spread disaster.
> It will not do to neglect this situation because its dangers are not now palpably imminent and apparent. They exist none the less certainly, and await the unforeseen and unexpected occasion when suddenly they will be precipitated upon us.

Proceeding, he says that the accumulations by the 30th of June, 1888, will swell the surplus to $140,000,000. This is the condition as confessed to by this officer, and I accompany it by a statement made by a leading banking concern of New York, which shows that the amount of money now withdrawn from the circulation and at present available for the redemption of the debt of the United States is not, as stated by Mr. Cleveland, $140,000,000, but, on the contrary, reaches the enormous sum of $330,000,000. Here is the statement:

> The following figures are from the official statement of James W. Hyatt, Treasurer United States, issued March 31, 1888: Gross amount of cash in his hands as Treasurer, $673,158,371.60; against which has been issued in gold, silver, and legal-tender-note certificates, $292,395,394; leaving net money in his hands as Treasurer, $380,762,977.60, out of which the Treasurer has $61,231,647.36 lying in the national banks, secured by deposit with him of Government bonds.
> Of this vast sum now out of use, $100,000,000 is retained as a reserve against the legal-tender notes; $37,249,253.08 is retained to cover various appropriations; $99,192,622.15 is the actual net amount retained to cover redemptions of national-bank notes, leaving $130,326,758.54 as the actual surplus at that date. Of this amount $25,752,828.20 is fractional silver.
> The spirit of all laws of Congress is that only $100,000,000 shall be kept idle, but from this statement we see $230,326,758.54 is kept idle, and with the nearly $100,000,000 also idle awaiting the slow process of redeeming national-bank notes, we have a grand total of idle money of upwards of $330,000,000, or sufficient to redeem on a 2 per cent. basis all the outstanding 4½ per cent. bonds due in 1891, and with the additional accumulation of surplus up to end of the fiscal year June 30, 1888—say $56,000,000—would then leave the $100,000,000 reserve against legal tenders intact and some $25,000,000 besides.
> If the remedy for the "trouble" depends on "Congress" it should awake at once.

In the light of this statement of the business men, taken from the report of his Treasurer, Mr. Cleveland conceals the true situation by minifying the amount of available surplus $200,000,000. Not much of a difference to the Executive, perhaps, but a difference to the shrunken volume of currency, which weighs every hour of its continuance with untold peril.

In my judgment all that is here said by the Executive and by the bankers concerning the evil consequences of the sequestration of the enormous sums of money represented by the Treasury surplus is true, and more.

Nor are the evils of the situation hidden in the prospective; they are now "palpably imminent and apparent."

The demoralizing effect of the withdrawal and withholding of the money of the people from the great business enterprises recently entered upon or projected can be seen by any careful observer of affairs.

When all securities, stocks, and bonds, Government as well as others, are going down and interest is going up; when wheat and the great staples of the West, when iron and its manifold products are declining; when wages are falling and strikes are choking the great lines of transportation and threatening general revolt and the stoppage of internal carriage and the commerce dependent thereon, and others still have but recently released their hands from the vital supply of coal; when trusts are springing up on every side inspired to unholy activity by the example of the Government, and are on every side combining with evil fortune and hard times to further depress universal trade and defeat individual endeavor; while these trusts, the monsters of traffic, defying lawful methods, are with one hand crushing out contracts, and with the other sowing the seed of desperation that soon may ripen into anarchy, the President of the United States confronts the situation by saying in his message that there is no authority for the application of these funds to the purchase of bonds not now due, except that—> found in an appropriation bill passed a number of years ago, and it is subject to the suspicion that it was intended as temporary and limited in its application.

Here, Mr. Chairman, is the law referred to by the Executive as "subject to suspicion" and supposed to be "temporary:"

> Act of March 3, 1881, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase United States bonds with his surplus money.
> Be it enacted, etc.
> SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds: Provided, That the bonds so purchased or redeemed shall constitute no part of the sinking fund, but shall be canceled.
> Approved March 3, 1881.

It has stood upon the statute-books unchallenged until now, and under it subsequent administrations without question bought up and redeemed $182,241,750 of the bonds of the United States, and under which, as the only and sufficient authority, his own Secretary of the Treasury has already purchased not only the 4½ per cent. bonds due in 1891, but also the 4 per cents. due in 1907, paying for the former 108 cents on the dollar and for the latter 127 cents on the dollar, expending in the purchase of $18,088,000 of such bonds $21,665,500 of the surplus under this authority repudiated by the President.

Mr. Chairman, does not the President go to desperate lengths to relieve himself and his administration of the responsibilities of the situation when he says that because the law of 1881 is "subject to suspicion" he therefore refuses to proceed under it? What is this but repudiation of the laws? Who is "suspicious" of the law? Who has said it was temporary? Has the court said so? Has the Congress repealed it? And if not where does he obtain the power to set aside at will a law passed and approved four years before he came to power?

From whence does he obtain the authority to nullify the acts of Congress? We supposed we had a servant committed by his oath to the execution of the laws. We awake to find we have a master before whose imperial will the laws must bend or yield.

Thus far this Administration has furnished the country much food for reflection, but none so startling as this.

There was one of the subordinate officers of the Government who, intoxicated with power, undertook the suspension of the laws "upon suspicion," and this same President placidly broke his official neck, to the entire satisfaction of all well-wishers of good government. It is unnecessary, sir, to say that I refer to the late unlamented Mr. William Andrew Jackson Sparks.

Will His Excellency make his own significant commentary and restrain his exuberant impetuosity when he is tempted to use the imperial veto on laws he can only obey, or disobeying, take the consequences.

But, sir, supposing the President sincere in his reference to the law of 1881, how will he or his champions explain the fact that he refused his approval to exactly such a law as he says the situation now needs, and if now has always during his term of office needed?

The Forty-ninth Congress passed what is known as the "Morrison surplus resolution" July 30, and sent it on that day to the President. He did not return it, and Congress adjourned August 7, 1885, and the resolution was killed by the deliberate act of the man who now lays all the evils of the surplus to want of authority to buy bonds, which he is buying, or, in other words, to Congress.

And, Mr. Chairman, if the situation is so perilous and the demand for relief so imperative, why is it that the bill to provide for the purchase of bonds, which passed the House February 29, 1888, went to the Senate, was amended, returned to the House, and referred to the Committee on Finance March 1, and reported back to the House March 6, has not been called up, considered, and passed? Who is responsible for this?

Is it not the duty of the majority to save the industries of the country from death by financial inanition, to the end that they may try the effects of tariff reform on them, for the benefit of science, if nothing else?

Mr. Chairman, one of the objections of the President to the law of 1881, directing the application of the surplus to the purchase of undue bonds, is that it is found in an appropriation bill. This is not without a precedent other than that furnished by a Republican administration.

In Polk's message of December, 1847, he said:

> It is recommended that as soon as the war shall be over (with Mexico), all the surplus in the Treasury not needed for other indispensable objects shall constitute a sinking fund, and be applied to the purchase of the funded debt, and that authority be conferred by law for that purpose.

In accordance therewith came the tardy act, section 9 of the appropriation bill of March 3, 1853, whereby the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized "to purchase at the current market rate any of the outstanding bonds of the United States that he may deem most advisable from any 'surplus' funds in the Treasury," but the surplus must not be reduced below six millions (Statutes at Large, volume 10, page 212).

Under this act of 1853 the Democratic administration paid as high as 21 per cent. premium for bonds due in twenty years. Here is the statement:

In from three to four years the Secretary of the Treasury, under the act of 1853, had paid in premiums over $4,600,000, and claimed he had saved in interest $14,600,000.

Mr. Chairman, before the hoarded treasures of the Government had reached their present dangerous sum the prosperity of the country west of the Missouri River was never greater. The amount of internal improvement during the years 1886–'87 was unparalleled, and yet to-day hundreds of miles of graded railroad line through Kansas, Nebraska, Dakota, and Wyoming lie tieless and unironed, waiting for the will and power of the great corporate owners and projectors to give the "touch of life" to their work and deliverance to the country they penetrate, which is now hopelessly cut off from the commercial world.

You ask the managers of great Western systems, which a year ago began work that was to end on the shores of the Pacific, why it is that they have suspended, and they will answer you it is because they can not profitably get the means with which to proceed, that they dare not take the risks, that capitalists and stockholders are stricken with a sudden dismay, and that they are halting between hope and fear until the millions in the Treasury are unlocked and the surplus ceases to menace the country with ruin.

The shadow of caution, distrust, and fear has fallen upon the business of the country, and the nation seems to have wakened suddenly to the fact that its very life-blood is congested; that its medium of exchange, its money, its gold, all that which circulating through the peaceful channels of business constitutes the calm health of nations, is being "pooled," "cornered," and "combined" in the "dead-lock" of the Treasury, from whence its influence issues like a malediction, paralyzing credit and capital into conservative inactivity.

In view of this condition of the country and its business, incident to the condition of the Treasury, it is truly time to call a halt, and not only ask but know what is the trouble and who is responsible for it; what is the remedy, and apply it.

The remedy and responsibility, sir, under existing laws, rest with the Secretary of the Treasury and the executive head of the Government, and if those responsible will at once undertake the purchase and redemption of the two hundred and thirty millions of 4½ per cent. bonds due in 1891, which can be bought at a premium of 8 per cent., and an annual saving of 2 or 2½ per cent. on the entire interest, then the burden which is weighing the country down will be lifted and the great work of development now standing at a halt can go forward.

The theory of the Democratic majority is that the tariff is at fault, and that all the evils of the times are to be laid upon it. I will not stop at this moment to discuss a theory which may remotely affect the situation. Whether the surplus sprang from the tariff or not, it is still true that in either event the Democratic party is responsible, for it alone had the power to lower the taxes and stop the accumulations. Whether good or evil, the surplus is a fact, and as such demanded the attention of the majority party and its Executive, and that attention they have stubbornly or ignorantly refused to give. And so I appeal from their theory to this fact: Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury should to-morrow call in the sixty-one millions of money of the Government loaned without interest to the national banks of the country, and they in turn should call on their customers who are carrying on vast undertakings based upon this credit, would not this contraction produce a crash that would involve the commercial world in ruin? This, I take it, would give us a result for which we would not be indebted to theory, and which would be so dire and complete that no man on this floor cares to invoke the test.

Mr. Chairman, the mismanagement of the surplus was not the first mistake of this political Moses. Has the country forgotten that the first act of Mr. Cleveland's Administration was to advertise in his annual message of 1885 for a panic? He asked the world to furnish him a panic to prove that his theory that silver was the enemy of gold and would drive the latter across the seas was true.

The President had borrowed this prediction from the financial prophets of the Administration in Wall street—from gentlemen who inherit their disinterested ability to shape the financial course of this nation in a direct line of transmission from the money-changers that Christ recommended should be scourged from the temple.

There was no panic. The prediction failed. The much-conjured devil of destruction was too decent to come forth. The loaded dice of the Administration, thrown in conspiracy with the proposed Wall-street gold corner, failed to produce the expected, if not the desired, result. Not fate and chance, but the laws of business, incapable of corruption or the influence of man, defended us.

Take it all in all, Mr. Chairman, the result of the financial policy of the Administration has not been happy upon the West. Whether that policy had its origin in ignorance, indifference, or mendacity, its culmination has produced results costing us millions in additional interest charges upon our loans, and renewals of the same; millions snatched, by the Government "corner" on the money, from the toil-stained hands of the farmers of the West, whose life is a patient struggle waged with unpretending courage against "a sea of troubles."

It was a cruel blow to a class of men numbering all told over 7,000,000, and including directly or indirectly one-third of the entire population of the United States. And they are a class that deserve well of the Republic. They are neither socialists, anarchists, nor grumblers. Under all the terrible temptations of impending ruin they are still the living promise of the country's peace, prosperity, and stability. They are as fundamental as the Andes or the Rockies, and constitute the backbone of both our system of business and of government. And so long as they can live I have no fear for the Republic.

Mr. Chairman, here is a verification of the disastrous effects of the surplus policy of this Administration on the farm products of this country—nor is its full loss to the country west of the Missouri computed here, nor can it be with any just degree of certainty, because of the additional loss to the far West on account of transportation.

Average export prices of certain commodities for the fiscal years from 1854 to 1861 compared with 1885, 1886, and 1887.

Years.	Corn, per bushel.	Wheat, per bushel.	Cotton, per pound.	Butter, per pound.	Cheese, per pound.
1854 to 1861	$0.75	$1.33	$0.10⅝	$0.17½	$0.09⅜
1885, 1886, 1887	.50⅝	.87⅞	.10	.16⅛	.09
Difference	.24⅛	.45⅛	.00⅝	.01⅝	.00⅜

Comparative yearly loss to American farmers on said crops between above periods.

On corn	$366,000,000
On wheat	205,580,000
On cotton	22,000,000
On dairy products	56,290,000
Total yearly loss	649,870,000

From the first table it appears that the total average yearly loss to agriculture during the years 1885, 1886, 1887, as compared with the years from 1854 to 1861, is $649,870,000, or a total loss for the three years of the monstrous sum of $1,949,610,000. And this loss is contemporaneous with the policy of "cornering" the money of the country in the United States Treasury commenced with his own administration, and now, by his own admission, about to culminate in ruin.

I omit, Mr. Chairman, any special reference to the tables comparing the years from 1860 to 1869 and from 1868 to 1878 with the three years of Mr. Cleveland's surplus policy for the obvious reason that the condition of values during that time was so unsettled that it might and would be said that the startling disclosures made by the figures were chargeable to that and not to the policy under consideration.

Average export prices for the fiscal years from 1876 to 1885, compared with 1885, 1886, and 1887.

	Corn per bushel.	Wheat per bushel.	Cotton per pound.	Butter per pound.	Cheese per pound.
1876 to 1885	$0.58⅛	$1.16⅛	$0.11	$0.18⅛	$0.10⅛
1885, 1886, 1887	.50⅝	.87⅞	.10	.16⅛	.09
Decline	.07½	.29⅜	.01	.02⅛	.01⅛

Comparative yearly loss to American farmers on said crops between above periods:

On corn	$112,500,000
On wheat	130,500,000
On cotton	27,000,000
On dairy products	98,000,000
Total yearly loss	468,000,000

The table showing the comparative loss to agriculture for the years 1885, 1886, and 1887, as contrasted with the period from 1876 to 1885, is not open to that objection, and the total yearly loss on corn, wheat, cotton, and dairy products for this period of $468,000,000 is not explainable otherwise than by reference to the condition of the currency. The aggregate for the three years, 1885, 1886, and 1887, of the comparative losses thus established is $1,404,000,000, from which I deduct the comparative loss on the cotton crop of the Southern planter, and find the net comparative loss on corn, wheat, and dairy products to have been $1,323,000,000, most of which fell upon the country west of the Mississippi.

It can not be answered that these results are chargeable to overproduction of wheat, for, as appears by the following table, the production of Europe in the three years next preceding, 1885, 1886, and 1887, was 69,000,000 bushels less than for those years.

Average per year	35,940,748½	423,553,000	.78½

And a comparison of the wheat crop in this country for the three years of 1885, 1886, and 1887 with the three years previous shows an annual average decrease for 1885, 1886, and 1887 of 55,812,176 bushels, or a total decrease of this product for the three years of 167,436,528 bushels.

Leaving this branch of the subject, Mr. Chairman, I repeat that the losses of the farmers of this country, aggregating millions per year, are chargeable to the reduction of the volume of the currency by the policy of the present Administration, a policy which, ignorantly or intelligently, makes the Government the principal factor in the combinations of capital which compel the producers to sell their products at such prices as renders the business of bread-raising a practical failure.

Mr. Chairman, the estimated expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year, June 30, 1888, to June 30, 1889, are placed at $325,000,000. Its incomes from all sources are placed at $383,000,000, derived as follows:

From sales of public lands	$10,000,000.00
From national banks	2,000,000.00
From interest and sinking fund, Pacific railways	2,000,000.00
From customs fees, fines, penalties, etc	1,150,000.00
From fees consular, letters patent, and lands	3,500,000.00
From sales of public property	300,000.00
From profits on coinage, assays, etc	9,000,000.00
From deposits for surveying public lands	150,000.00
From revenues of the District of Columbia	2,400,000.00
From miscellaneous sources	4,500,000.00
Internal-revenue sources	120,000,000.00
Customs	228,000,000.00
Aggregating the sum of	383,000,000.00

Assuming, as we may, that the estimates will be cut at least $15,000,000, the gross amount appropriated for the conduct of the Government for the period named will stand at $310,000,000, which, deducted from the gross incomes, leaves $73,000,000 as the excess of the incomes over the expenses of the Government for the period named.

This, if the present surplus be not reduced by its application to the purchase of the $230,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds, would make the aggregate available cash in the Treasury June 30, 1889, according to Mr. Cleveland's estimate, $213,000,000, or, according to the calculation of the New York bankers, based on the Treasurer's statement for March 31, 1888, $403,000,000.

I see nothing but danger in the surplus, and therefore am opposed to its further accumulation and am in favor of attacking it at both ends. Pay the debts with what is already piled up, and stop the useless accumulation of more by a reduction of customs duties and internal taxes.

Something might be said of the necessity of a navy, but since I listened to the speech of my eloquent friend from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] in the Forty-eighth Congress on that subject, I have lost all hope. It will be remembered that that gentleman declared that all the navy we needed, in order to become the terror of the seas, could be built out of "two hemlock logs lashed together, and an American flag." And this sublime suggestion for the national defense met with the enthusiastic approval of his party.

Something might be said of the need of ordnance and defensive works for the protection of our 15,000 miles of undefended rivers, coasts, and harbors, and the cities that in the event of war would become the sport of destruction, and it has been said here by over-sanguine gentlemen, who did not think on whose bottom the Democratic tub was standing, and what was said here was long ago better said than here by the dead sage of Gramercy Park, but all in vain, for the ability of his party to appreciate a wisdom sounding in patriotism and progress is deader than the venerated dust of their forgotten idol.

Something might be said of the need of plants for the manufacture, and places for the assemblage of modern ordnance, to the end that when, under the operation of the policy of free trade, we are compelled to abandon the ancient and honored doctrine of non-intervention in the affairs of Europe, and to accept as one of the blessings of good government her intervention in the affairs of this continent, we might respond in kind, when England sends her fleet to levy for debt on the United States, with fire and iron, as she did on Egypt.

But I refrain, for I remember that in the course of debate on the question of the continuance of a patent in the Forty-ninth Congress it was held by the honored and progressive gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] that invention was a curse and progress a pitfall; that but for the untimely miracles of printing and gunpowder the land of Arkansas would still have been like the happy valley of the Abyssinian prince, and that the inhabitants thereof, instead of "listening with credulity to the whispers of fancy, following with eagerness the phantoms of hope," instead of "expecting that age would perform the promises of youth, and to-morrow would cure the deficiencies of to-day," would still be plowing the timber-strewn beaver clearing with a crooked stick, and shooting the succulent alligator with a club.

Since I learned these things, sir, and many more like them, from the gentleman in question, I abandoned the hope of appropriations for the benefit of that which is scientific in arms, and following the inevitable course of Democratic empire back across the conquered fields of science toward the dark ages, I agree that it will be bettter and cheaper, particularly cheaper, for you to put out the electric light, the undying spark of American genius, banish the electric spirit that speaks to us across continents and under oceans like the still small voice of Omniscience, break the great wheels that roll the billions of American commerce across a tideless continent and unite the eastern and western seas by the twin miracles of fire and iron, break up for us the great presses that print for us each day an intellectual picture of the world and "give its lettered pomp to tooth of time," and, folding our tents like the Arabs, quietly steal away, pausing, perhaps, in our backward march to ask why the monument at Bunker Hill and why the graves at Lexington.

Since I learned these things, sir, so eloquently inculcated by the advocate of that lofty proposition, that all that is is wrong, I have come to believe that there was no way for us to prepare for the unhappy contingency of future war than to abandon the repeating rifle, abolish the Krupp gun, and arm our future champions in combat with a tough club adorned with alligator's teeth, and when defending the coast let them carry in addition a bag of sand, for then sand will be cheap—very cheap.

In respect to these improvements, demanded in the name of good government, the ways of our Democratic friends are like the ways of Providence, and there the likeness ceases—they are mysterious and past finding out.

Mr. Chairman, I am for the reduction of the income of the Government. It is in my judgment obviously unjust and illogical to continue to strip the people of the country of seventy-odd millions of money per year, only to see it added to the other worse than useless millions already locked up in the Treasury.

And particularly is it necessary that this be done at once, when we see and admit that neither will the Executive recommend nor the majority in Congress pass laws that will apply what is in the Treasury, or is to be, to the manifest needs of the people.

Under this state of things not to advocate reduction, and accomplish it if we can, is, in my judgment, for us to become partakers in the evil of a policy denounced alike by the friends and foes of the Administration.

I wish to see the incomes reduced to the expenses. Not necessarily to the expenses narrowed down to the narrowest possible limit of the needs of the Government, but reduced as far as is consistent with liberal provisions for the conduct of its affairs, including provisions for the payment of the maturing public debts and the making of needed public improvements.

And I am for this being done by the Republican party, or if it can not be done by them, they being in the minority here, I am still in favor of an intelligent, determined, and fearless attempt to do it.

I am tired of that policy that asks us of the West to stand upon nothing but the neutral defense of a negative, of a denial of the efficacy of proposed remedial legislation. In the Forty-eighth Congress we stood upon our objection that the case made by the Morrison bill did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Evidently the court of public opinion sustained us, as may be claimed by the significant loss of seats in this House then held by Democrats. But notwithstanding the qualified success of the negative policy of the Republican party in that contest, for one, I did not then approve it, and do not now wish to see it applied in the trial of this case, neither here nor to the people. We are entitled to a judgment on the merits in this controversy, and not to a judgment by default.

I am not indifferent to the difficulties of the situation, nor unmindful that it becomes me to be subordinate, and I hope that when I ask for affirmative action by the Republican party it will not be taken as treason to, or lack of faith in, the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means, upon whom must fall the initial labor of preparing, digesting, and presenting a measure to be opposed to the measure presented by the majority of that committee and now pending before the House.

In the old time we drew power and honor from the fact of what we did, and not from the fact of what we objected to others doing. Suppose it be conceded in advance that we can not pass a bill for the reform of the duty and tax laws, does that excuse us from the trial, and a trial in which measure shall be opposed to measure? Do we not hold a better place in the coming controversy if we can say that we were defeated in an effort to modify those laws, than we would if we could only say that we defeated an effort, however crude, sectional, and dangerous, of our political adversaries to modify them?

The people can comprehend an effort to do something; can they as well comprehend an effort to prevent that something from being done? The people realize that they are between two dangers, one from the accumulation of unneeded taxes, the other from an ill-advised effort to reduce those taxes, so ill-advised that it amounts to a selfish, sectional, and cowardly blow at the American policy of protection.

It is our duty to protect them from both evils if we can, and I am for the effort. Let us do justice to the South and compel the South to do justice to the North and West, thus sustaining the confidence of the great Northern and Western constituencies in our willingness to defend all sections and all interests; and whether victorious or defeated we will reap our reward in a return to power of the only party with a policy big enough to comprehend the good of all.

And in this connection, Mr. Chairman, the appeal to history satisfies me that the only practical hope the country has for substantial relief is in the Republican party. That party has had control of the House of Representatives where, under the Constitution, all bills affecting taxes must originate, from 1866 down to March 4, 1875, and thereafter from March 4, 1881, to March 4, 1883, eleven years. The Democrats have had control from 1875 to 1881, and from 1883 to the present time, also eleven years.

During the eleven years of Republican control the revenues were reduced $362,000,000, as follows:

1. Acts of July 13, 1866, and March 2, 1867	$103,380,000
2. Acts of March 1868, and February, 1868	54,800,000
3. Acts of July, 1870	81,320,000
4. Acts of December, 1871	14,430,000
5. Acts of May, 1872, tea and coffee (free-list)	15,900,000
6. Acts of June, 1872	31,000,000
7. Acts of March 3, 1883 (estimated)	61,200,000
Grand total under Republican rule	362,000,000

During the eleven years of control the Democratic party has reduced the revenues $6,370,000. This was at the rate of something over $500,000 a year.

This reduction was made by taking the internal-revenue taxes off of whisky, tobacco, and snuff. It may be imagined that this reduction, particularly that on snuff, was a great relief to American labor, particularly that portion of the American laborers who gain their living by sneezing.

This comparison of the achievments of the two parties will cast some light on the question of which party has favored and maintained war taxes.

The advocates of the Mills bill are claiming now, and have always claimed, that all the crimes against industry are concentrated in what they call the "war taxes." If so, what a pitiful lack of conscience and courage, and what fertility of incapacity, has that party displayed during its eleven years of control.

The West, or at least that section with which I am familiar, asks for free coal, free salt, free lumber, and free sugar, and for the removal or reduction of the duties on other articles of necessary daily consumption where not in conflict with like articles of American manufacture or production, and for the modification of duties on necessaries wherever it can be done without injury to American labor.

In addition to this we would like to see taxes taken from alcohol when used in the arts and sciences, and from tobacco until such a reduction is made as will reduce the incomes to the legitimate needs of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, the Mills bill is offered as a means of relief against the further collection of unnecessary duties and taxes. If current history can be trusted, there are certain things connected with this measure which dishonor it at the start.

It is said that this bill was conceived in secret; that the Democratic majority were not aided in its formulation by their Republican colleagues; that they did not sit in the place appointed by law for their sessions, but in a place unknown to their colleagues and the public; that they thereby defeated the effort of the industries of the country to be heard, and denied the right of petition. If this be true, then the Congress is asked to honor with its confidence and give consideration to a measure born in defiance of the rule that the only adequate protection to private interest, as well as public honor, is to be found in the open and public consideration by the committee of the House of the matters intrusted to them by Congress.

The merit of this measure is that it puts salt and lumber on the free-list, and its disgrace is that it does not put coal and sugar there also; and it falls, so far as I am concerned, before this one overwhelming objection. It strikes the tax off these staples of the North and West—salt, lumber, and wool—and it does not strike the same tax off of the sugar, coal, iron, or rice of the South. It does not go as far as it ought to go as to coal and sugar, and the reason why it does not appears to be clearly and entirely political and sectional.

It comes to us of the West declaring that we, in respect to our interests, are not entitled to the same consideration that they of the South are. It strikes duties from imports that may disadvantageously affect Michigan and Wisconsin lumber and salt and Western wool, but it continues them upon Virginia coal, Louisiana sugar, and Georgia and Alabama iron.

Coal is an absolute necessity of life, and sugar is as indispensable to the comfort of the home of the poor as to that of the rich. They are not less demanded than lumber and salt. Put them all on an equality. We ask in this nothing sectional; the West has coal, so have the East, the North, and the South. Put them all upon an equality. We ask in this no sectional advantage, and we will submit to none.

As this bill stands under the old schedule you collect $59,000,000 of duty to protect $17,000,000 of sugar produced in Louisiana, and you take all protection from 265,000,000 pounds of American wool for the benefit of the 114,000,000 pounds of foreign wool imported into this country during the last fiscal year. You put the raw wool of the farmer on the free-list, and you leave the duty on the grade of woolen goods which he must buy. Thus, according to your theory of the operation of the laws of trade, on the one hand you rob him of the advantage of the tariff on his product, and, on the other, to borrow your own language, you allow the manufacturer to "rob" him again by adding the duty on his goods, which duty you refuse to remove, to the price which the farmer must pay for them as necessaries.

You strike duties from salt, and you refuse to take them from coal. You make lumber free, and you protect iron. Are not these things all equally necessary to the comfort of men? And if so, why are they not treated as such as a matter of principle? To do otherwise is a trick, and your bill is nothing but an intrigue—a bribe paid to a section you fear. Your bill confesses that you have broken the great principle of equality, fundamental to good Government, in the interest of a party, to conciliate a section. With your hands full of power you dare not do justice; you are frightened at the omnipotence of a principle.

Mr. Chairman, while on the sectional aspect of the proposed legislation, allow me to present two tables taken from the Census report, which present the facts as they are as to the relative interest in and possible benefits derived from the system of protection as between the North and South.

The protection on articles of import competing in the American market against like products of the West and North, is as follows:

Farm imports, dutiable.

The balance of protection in favor of Southern interests as against Northern and Western, as shown by this table, is $73,006,678—only a trifle, but such a trifle as this will open the eyes of the West if it can not waken the conscience of the majority of this House.

It will be observed from this table that the principal advantage to Northern agriculturists comes from the duty laid on imported wool, which is $16,424,479, and that this is now proposed to be taken from the Western farmer and presented to the foreign growers of wool. It will be observed also that the principal item of protection to the Southern planter is that on sugar and cane products, to wit, $74,519,607, and this is to be maintained with slight modification. And this is done by a party that says that it is not the enemy of American manufacturers, laborers, and producers; that it has come to power like the Holy One of old, to prepare the way of redemption of these same laborers and producers from the bondage of war taxes. Sugar is protected to the extent of $56,000,000 a year, or $1 per head of the entire population of the United States, paid into the Treasury as duty on the imported sugar consumed by the country.

The purpose for which this vast levy is made is the protection of the Louisiana and other Southern planters who produce $17,000,000 worth of the sugar consumed by the people. That is, the general consumers pay enough in duty on the supply of sugar, over and above the home product, to buy that home product more than three times over.

And notwithstanding this enormous tax of $1 per head on the population of the United States, the industry of sugar-growing in the South, it is said, has steadily decreased. And still a party flying the banners of reform, pledged to tariff reduction to the level of the revenue needs of the Government, such tariff when reduced to be so adjusted as to protect American industry and cheapen imported necessaries, proceeds to reform the tariff by letting alone an outrage which robs the tax-ridden people (Democratic stereotype) of at least fifty millions of money for nothing.

I would not refuse protection to the sugar interests of the South, but would levy only such a duty on imported sugar as would pay a reasonable bounty to the growers of American sugar. The effect of raising sixty millions of revenue from sugar, an imported necessary of life, will be seen in the removal or reduction of duties on other imports, which duties are necessary to protect American producers; and, sir, here is an example of it.

The following table shows the effect of Democratic tariff reform on certain Western farm products:

Products.	Canadian rate.	United States rate.	Mills rate.
Potatoes	10 cts. per bushel	15 cts. per bushel	Free.
Beans	15 cts. per bushel	10 per cent.	Free.
Peas	10 cts. per bushel	10 and 20 per cent.	Free.
Tomatoes	30 cts. per bushel	10 per cent.	Free.
All other vegetables, including sweet potatoes.	20 per cent.	10 per cent.	Free.
Plums	1 cent per pound	1 cent per pound	Free.
Currants	1 cent per pound	1 cent per pound	Free.
Peppermint and other essential oils.	20 per cent.	25 per cent.	Free.
Blacking	25 per cent.	25 per cent.	20 per cent.
Bricks	20 per cent.	20 per cent.	Free.
Brooms	25 per cent.	25 per cent.	20 per cent.
Brushes	25 per cent.	25 per cent.	20 per cent.
Flax (raw)	$20 per ton	$20 per ton	Free.
Flax (hackled)	$40 per ton	$40 per ton	Free.
Tow	$10 per ton	$10 per ton	Free.
Meats, game, and poultry			Free.

At present the tariff on agricultural products is:

Products.	Duty.	Nebraska raises.
		Bushels.
Barley	10 cents per bushel.	2,612,000
Corn	do	127,852,000
Corn-meal	do
Oats	do	20,674,000
Rye	do	1,774,500
Wheat	20 cents per bushel.	13,895,000
Flour	20 per cent.
Flax-seed	20 cents per bushel	387,490
Potatoes	15 cents per bushel.	4,100,000
Linseed-oil	25 cents per gallon.
Beer (grain)	20 to 35 per cent
Bologna sausage (beef)	3 cents per pound.
Beef and pork	1 cent per pound.
Butter	4 cents per pound.	15,620,000
Cheese	do
Hams	2 cents per pound.
Hay	$2 per ton.
Honey	20 cents per gallon.	191,260

And the ultimate effect of the "free-list" on American agriculture can be better estimated when it is understood that, notwithstanding protection, there was imported into this country during the year ending June 30, 1887, $197,308,240 of foreign agricultural products, of which only 46,678,443 paid no duty.

Having so adjusted the "reform" of the tariff as to put the great staples of the North and West on the free-list and leave those of the South on the protected list, having reformed us down and them up, what becomes of the promise to protect American labor so far as the same could be done by a tariff for revenue? In the light of these sectional discriminations where is America anyway? Will not some one hand the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means a map of the United States? Is the North and the West to be wiped from the map so as to make the way clear for this conspiracy in favor of sectional reform?

Before I leave this subject, Mr. Chairman, there is still another reason why the commodities I have named, to wit, lumber, salt, coal, and sugar, should go on the free-list, and that is that they have in a large measure fallen into the hands of trusts and combinations against trade; and these monster conspiracies are abusing privileges granted to the commodities, but not granted to operators in such commodities. The ability of these trusts to coerce or crush individual operators and drive all competition from the field is aided, if not made possible, alone by the Cleveland "corner" and "trust" on the money of the nation. The scarcity of money caused by the Treasury "lock-up" makes the vast sums held by the "combines" almost omnipotent. Between the Government "combine" and the "trusts" fair dealing trembles for its life, and the time has come for heroic remedies. And so I say to this extent let in the world and let its coal, lumber, salt, and sugar combat with these iniquities that have fastened themselves to our vital resources, and will, if not checked or killed, yet lay us under tribute for our own earth, air, and water, laying their impious hands upon the very gifts of God.

In the course of this debate some of the gentlemen speaking for the bill have seen fit to assail the present prosperity of the West and to libel its future prospects, hoping to gain its support for this measure by arming its prejudice against its reason and its interest.

The West will be able to discover that its immediate ills are not chargeable to a system under which for twenty-five years of Republican rule it enjoyed a phenomenal growth, and under which system, with certain modifications, it still expects to repeat the results of the past.

It will understand the motive which has withheld the money of the country from circulation in order to create in the surplus an argument to crush the system of American protection. They will use the errors of the enemies of this system, not to destroy themselves, but to punish those who committed the error, counting upon their inability to discover the motive and assign the cause.

I submit herewith a showing that will convince our solicitous friends that Nebraska is not likely to make an assignment at once for the benefit of either the Administration or the Mills bill, and also that there is no immediate danger of our being sold out from inability to pay either the interest or principal of our debts.

NEBRASKA UNDER PROTECTION.

Population:
1880	452,000
1885	740,000
1888, probably	1,300,000

An increase in between 1880 and 1885 of 62 per cent., and in eight years of 187 per cent.

Farms:
1880	63,387
1885	99,857

An increase of 56 per cent. in five years.

Manufactories:
1880	1,403
1885	2,861

An increase of 100 per cent.

Employed in all occupations	154,000
Employed in agriculture	90,507

Or about 60 per cent.; but the 40 per cent. is a large minority, and also deserves attention.

1889—In trade and transportation	15,100

Or about 10 per cent.

In manufacturing, mechanical, and mining	18,200

Or, say, 12 per cent.

In other industries	28,700

Or about 17 per cent.

These figures do not show a tax-ridden, cursed section of country, nor a population beggared by the American policy of protection; quite the contrary.

Take the wool industry of Nebraska:

1880, number of sheep	199,453
1885, number of sheep	444,013

An increase of 120 per cent.

1880, wool sold, pounds	1,282,656
1885, wool sold, do	2,060,483

An increase of 60 per cent.

1880, value of farms	$105,932,000
1885, value of farms	285,946,000

An increase of 175 per cent.

1880, value of products	$31,708,000
1885, value of products	52,035,000

An increase of 65 per cent.

The great basis for the conclusions drawn, and sought to be drawn, against the protective system in this country by those advocating the passage of the Mills bill is that the duties levied upon imports are so high as to amount to a practical embargo upon such imports, and that this embargo is dual in its operation, not only excluding (foreign) imports from this country, but in its reactionary effects excluding domestic products, whether manufactured or unmanufactured, from profitable export, thus producing as a secondary result a demoralizing condition of the home market, a glut which threatens to crush both capital and labor in a common ruin.

Whether the conditions described by the advocates of the bill in question exist at all or not, it is not now my purpose, further than I already have, to consider. If the objection here urged to the tariff is true, then it constitutes a reason for its reduction, but not for its destruction. Let it be reduced, but let the reduction be non-sectional, and so far as consistent with the admitted necessity of reduction let it protect American labor and the home market of American producers.

The mistake is in assuming that these laws have produced these conditions. The reverse is rather the truth. Certain conditions have produced these laws, or rather certain conditions in which American labor and property found itself have produced them. They sprang from the knowledge which American toil and property has that it owns this country, and owns also the power to govern it by law, and to make the laws by which it shall be governed, and to so make the laws as to hold the natural advantages of its own country for its own use.

These laws have a deeper meaning to me than mere dollars and cents. On the surface they seem to deal with questions of daily economy and finance; on a profounder view they deal with the great questions of whether a government founded on the abstract right of the absolute equality of men, rooted in a new soil, can maintain itself at any cost in a combat with the forms, laws, and conditions of old governments, based upon the denial of the fundamental truths that we hold sacred. Our adversaries in trade, as in war, represent a social and trade condition based upon the self-imposed authority of the few and the benighted submission of the many. Their product is the output of millions who bow their necks to the yoke of toil, patient as the brute, held in order by the transmitted degradation of ancestors whose vassal lives, rooted tree-like to the soil, passed body and soul with the feudal fee. Our laws, representing conditions of man and matter, never like those of England, proclaim it to be the policy of American labor and capital that those conditions shall remain eternally different.

If a dollar is the only object of government, then the American Revolution was a failure. Submission to England would have been a commercial success. We should have saved the tea in Boston Harbor—and sold it. You can not organize a board of trade to-day on the business principles of the Declaration of Independence. If the only measure for the aspirations of man is a yard-stick or a gold-piece, then free government might as well go out of business. If what is wanted in the world is cheap men, then the proclamation of emancipation was an outrage, and the blood shed to free the slaves was infamous.

If we must meet Europe on her own ground, we must find men to do it with—our own men will not. They can be carried up, but not down; they have power and can not be cheated out of its use or its rights. You say, let us trade. With whom—with Europe? To what end—that Europe may become like us, or we like it? You say, give us a market, and, looking abroad, you blind your eyes to a continent. What would you trade? Civilizations, systems, destinies? No; no. The Republic born of revolutions exists to demonstrate that in one extreme the heights of a free man's destiny can not be measured by a monarch's scepter, nor in another by the daily price and condition of a practical bondman, enslaved by traditions and class conditions which American labor, armed in its own defense, put under its feet a hundred years ago.

These laws and conditions in which this country finds itself, and of which the gentlemen complain, are not conditions imposed by the mere ipse dixit of the legislator. They are conditions fixed in the very nature of things, and one of the things in which they are fixed is the heart and soul of a free man who has a country and purposes to keep it; and our laws and limitations upon imports are laws and limitations imposed in the effort of labor to protect itself, to retain the advantage which belongs to it as the discoverer and owner of a continent, and the owner of the right and power to govern the same by a vote which belongs to it. It is in its last analysis the application to the business of government of the first law of nature by the man who holds as his own divine right the power to make laws, Congresses, Presidents, and to shape policies for the conduct of that government; and whether right or wrong it is made by the man who is responsible in this exercise of original power to his own conscience and judgment alone.

These men may err, but in my judgment they do not.

The logic of the tendency of the argument in support of the bill under discussion asks a nation, where all are masters, to enter a business battle to the death with a nation or nations whose laws and policies are shaped by and almost of necessity made in the interest of classes—governing classes—headed by a crowned or sceptered potentate, supported by hereditary aristocracy, and based, not upon the consent, but the submission of the people.

The answer that the policy of the existing laws makes, it seems to me is the only answer that a policy based upon the votes of a free and self-governing people can make to the policies of a nation whose laws of trade spring from persons holding power by privilege, and not by right, and whose benefits are absorbed by the few and not by the many.

The protective policy speaks of the fact that no American has lived who has had to think of the difference in the condition of the people of a nation that govern themselves and one where they do not. Prince Bismarck, speaking in the German Parliament, exclaimed, "the German has not lived who has not had to arm himself against the Gaul." And so it is here. Freedom, based upon the homes of the people, the self-respecting independence of its masses, the rooted intelligence radiated from vast systems of free schools and colleges, has no choice but to guard her home against oppression and all that it produces, for if we must meet Europe upon her plane it must be at the peril of institutions and conditions existing here necessary to our existence which do not exist there, and can not. And the perpetual appeal which is raised from this side of the House is not in any right sense alone an appeal for American labor. It is an appeal for what rests upon, is defended by, and made possible by it, and that is the American system, the Government itself.

And so, whatever modifications either party or all parties may make—and there are many that should, and I trust will, be made—let it be remembered that so far as I can speak for one section of this country, as nearly disinterested as any section can be, let it be remembered, I repeat, that the West has wheat for sale, and corn, and cattle, and all the products of the earth. But her interest in American protection as a policy, as a bulwark of American liberty, sacred to all mankind, and especially to American labor, is not for sale.

And that party does not now live, nor shall it ever live, which, call it what you will, shall be able to draw the deed for its deliverance over to our one-time British masters, except upon terms dictated by American labor, for to this we all stand committed by obligations that are national and not personal, patriotic if not profitable, an obligation more sacred than an oath subscribed, as sacred as the blood that in the heroic days washed the stain off English pollution from off the virgin continent and drove the Hessians out, that come what will, be it weal or woe, be it the cowardice of the weak, the mistakes of the wise, the insolence of the strong, the treason of one section or the revolt of another, the fall or rise of fortune, the power of pools, the combinations of trusts that with one hand crushes contracts and with the other raises the red flag of anarchy, the mad appeal of the demagogue, the bloody cry of the commune, the desperate appeal of the strike, the wreck of fortune and the crash of commerce, come all the evils that government is heir to, only so they be American and they shall be conquered in the interest of the Republic, whose destiny it is to demonstrate in its own political personality not only the eternal worth of freedom to man, but the eternal possibility of that freedom preserved through government.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to the oral discussion of this measure with great interest, and after the publication of the speeches in the RECORD I have read many of them over with care in the quietude of my room. The result with me is an overwhelming conviction that this is a fair and liberal bill, and that it is my duty to support it. I believe it to be an honest effort on the part of the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means to relieve the people. The framers of this bill have, as I shall show, manifested a fairness and liberality towards the protected industries which those industries and the lines of business connected with them utterly refuse to extend to the great body of the people who use and consume their wares and products.

It is conceded by all that the revenues now derived from import duties, internal taxes, and miscellaneous sources are annually about $60,000,000 in excess of necessary expenditures. It is agreed, even under the method of Treasury book-keeping, that there are $100,000,000 now in the Treasury in excess of current demands, and that the daily receipts are swelling this amount rapidly and constantly. With an individual this would afford evidence of unusual prosperity, but to the nation it is a danger signal that can not be passed by unheeded. Now, what shall be done? The question is of the highest importance, and calls for practical business solution. If the money of the country continues to filter through the custom-houses and the internal-revenue offices into the great reservoir of the Treasury and remains there, enterprise must inevitably succumb.

If the sea should refuse to give back the floods which empty into it the plains would soon become parched, the rivers would cease to flow, and all life would perish. Nature in her wise economy forbids this. Now our Treasury surplus, present and prospective, is not the result of sound and prudent financiering. It is the effect of unwise and improvident legislation. How the authors of our present embarrassed situation can have the effrontery to claim that they alone are worthy of being intrusted with the revision of our revenue laws is more than I can understand. The difficulties at present surrounding us are the result of their folly. The situation is certainly not the result of wise forecast. Was it wise and prudent to provide by law for the annual collection from the people of $60,000,000 more than is necessary to meet every anticipated demand, and then provide no method of speedily and profitably returning this money to the channels of trade?

Our present revenue laws were enacted with full knowledge of the certain increase of population and expansion of business. The extent of our foreign trade, of immigration, the sums total of exports and imports, all these factors were taken into account, and must have been substantially foreseen. Instead of prudently reserving the right to annually redeem at par an amount of interest-bearing bonds equal to any surplus money that might from time to time accumulate, instead of a wise reservation like this, you in effect enacted that there should be a surplus and then clothed the holder of public securities with power to extort blood-money in the shape of unconscionable premiums. After this stupendous blunder—to use no harsher term—after you have poisoned the body-politic, by what authority and upon what grounds do you claim the exclusive privilege of treating the patient? [Applause.] The conditions which embarrass us at the present session of Congress are not new. Your attention has for years been called to the congested condition of the Treasury, and to the depletion going on elsewhere.

The honorable gentlemen who oppose this bill are traveling a rough and thorny road. Their eyes are open to the fact that the people are overtaxed, that they are deprived of their circulating medium, more and more of which is daily being locked up in the Treasury. They are aware that this surplus must rapidly increase under existing laws. They are aware that unless the causes which produce these results are removed or promptly modified the business health of the country must continue to steadily decline. The majority of the Committee on Ways and Means have united in presenting to the House and to the country a scheme for tax reduction.

Gentlemen of the Republican side of the House, have you met it with a bill of your own? No; the gentlemen composing the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means in the views which they submitted, say they will seek to amend and modify the bill in the Committee of the Whole House, but they do not state the character of the amendments and modifications which they will offer. Failing in this they declare they will offer a substitute for the bill, but they append no draft of such substitute. That, too, is kept in the dark and excluded from this discussion. No opportunity has been given, gentlemen, to compare the proposed substitute with the pending bill, nor has it been given to the country. Indeed, it is clear that you have not agreed upon a substitute, and you can not agree upon one among yourselves. A majority of you agree upon one thing, and one only—that you are opposed to this bill. So far as any substantive proposition is concerned you are as wide apart as the poles.

In the Republican national platform for 1884 you inserted the following plank:

> The Republican party pledges itself to correct the inequalities of the tariff, and to reduce the surplus.

Now, this is the whole party speaking with authority. It is both a declaration and an admission which should estop any member of that party from denying that our present tariff laws are unjust in their operation and need correcting. Here is another declaration made by the Republican party of my own State. In the Iowa platform the party declares:

> We believe the tariff should be revised and reduced.

It will be observed that this declaration relates to the tariff as a whole, and declares that it ought to be reduced. We on this side of the House agree with them, and because we have undertaken to make the reduction, and prevent surplus accumulations in the Treasury, we are denounced as free-traders, and accused of trying to unsettle the business prosperity of the country.

But how has the Republican party kept the pledge which it made in the platform of 1884? They violated it outright in the Forty-eighth Congress by voting solidly to strike out the enacting clause of the bill then before the House—a bill to correct the inequalities of the tariff and prevent surplus accumulation.

In the Forty-ninth Congress, standing in the presence of all their pledges, State and national, to reduce the tariff, and with full knowledge that the surplus was accumulating, and that under present laws it would continue to accumulate, by a solid Republican vote in this Hall you refused even to consider the question. And to-day, instead of presenting to the country a candid and plain proposition of relief, your attitude is one of obstruction. No longer strong enough to prevent consideration, you are now really on the retreat, and are putting in the time burning bridges, tearing up culverts, and felling trees across the road along which we must advance in our work of relief. [Applause.]

A Republican Senator from my own State, Hon. JAMES F. WILSON, in his speech delivered on the floor of the Senate April 5, 1888 (RECORD, page 2871, first session Fiftieth Congress), says:

> Mr. President, we are still confronted with our annual surplus revenue of about $60,000,000. Is there no way by which we can get rid of it without disturbing our true industrial condition? It seems to me there is a way which is both short and clear. We have one public tax the gross yield per annum of which more than equals the reduction of revenue we are called on to make. The tax on intoxicating liquors is the one to which I refer. This is where I would make the reduction.

This gentleman has the right to speak for his party in the State of Iowa, as he has just been re-elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States. In view of the fact that he would now make the reduction on internal-revenue taxes solely, and on the one article alone of intoxicating liquors, I would like to know what has become of the pledges made by his party in national convention and in his own State to "revise and reduce" the tariff? He utterly ignores them, spits upon them, and tramples them under his feet. We in Iowa accept the issue thus tendered. We say the reduction shall be made on the necessaries of life; on the lumber that shelters our people, and out of which our houses and barns and granaries must be constructed. It shall be made on the clothing our people wear, the food they eat, the salt that seasons their frugal meals, the implements they use in their daily toil, upon the blankets that keep us and our little ones warm when the mercury is below zero, and upon steel rails, the cost of which enters so materially into the cost of transporting our produce to market, and we will go before our people and ask them to decide between us. [Applause.]

But the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] has made a new departure. He has not always been in favor of making the reduction on whisky. In the year 1866, in the Thirty-ninth Congress, he voted to fix the duty on railroad iron at 50 cents per hundred pounds, and so did his colleague, Senator ALLISON. (See Globe, volume 59, page 2723, first session Thirty-ninth Congress.) It is the long ton of 2,240 pounds that is meant here, which would make the duty $11.20 per ton—only 20 cents per ton, less than 1 cent per 100 pounds, above the rate fixed by the Mills bill. Now, if fixing the duty on steel and iron rails in this bill at $11 per ton makes its author and those who support it free-traders, then Mr. WILSON in 1866 had a very narrow escape. All he lacked at that early day of being an abominable free-trader was 20 cents to the long ton. Saved as by fire!

But let us look at his record some fourteen years later. This will give ample time for both his judgment and his experience to ripen. In the year 1880 we find him before the Ways and Means Committee of this House, and, strange to say, still urging a reduction on steel rails. The honorable gentleman made an elaborate argument in favor of reduction, and at the conclusion of his remarks was cross-examined by the committee. I read from page 44 of a pamphlet containing the notes of a hearing had before the Ways and Means Committee on the 3d, 4th, and 5th days of February, 1880:

> Mr. KELLEY. What rate of duty would you indicate on steel rails?
> Mr. WILSON. I have left that somewhat to the consideration of the committee, but I should judge that the steel-rail interest of the country would be abundantly promoted at a duty of $14 a ton.
> Mr. KELLEY. And what is the sum that you would name?
> Mr. WILSON. I think it could stand a less duty than that.
> Mr. TUCKER. What do you think of $10 a ton?
> Mr. WILSON. I think it could stand a duty of $10 a ton.

Here you have it! Why, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. MILLS] puts it in the present bill at $11 per ton. That makes him a better protectionist than the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], and establishes the fact that Mr. WILSON exceeds the honorable gentleman from Texas as a free-trader to the extent of $1 per long ton. [Applause.]

I call attention to the fact that the honorable Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] did not appear before the Ways and Means Committee in 1880 to urge a reduction of the tax on intoxicating liquors, although the tax was raging at that time. His point of attack at that date was the steel-rail monopoly, and this is where he would then have made the reduction.

And at the conclusion of Mr. WILSON's remarks before the committee Mr. Morrison said:

> You have made but one mistake, and that is in claiming to be a protectionist. I claim you on the other side.

[Laughter.]

But let us see how my Republican colleagues in the present House view the situation. The honorable gentleman from the Fifth district [Mr. KERR], in a speech upon the pending bill, delivered from his seat on this floor April 28, 1888, speaking of the position taken by Senator WILSON, declares that he has no hesitation in giving in his adhesion to the doctrine that the reduction should be made from the tax on intoxicating liquors. He says he unhesitatingly made this declaration early in the session of the present Congress. The honorable Senator is thus re-enforced by another Republican leader of our State. (See page 3641, first session Fiftieth Congress.)

My colleague, Colonel HENDERSON, would make the reduction solely on sugar. (See RECORD, page 3679, first session Fiftieth Congress.) Is this reduction on a single article the revision of the tariff which was promised in the Republican platforms above quoted? If the position taken by the gentleman in other parts of his speech be correct, namely, that American industry will perish unless protected from foreign competition, what will be the effect upon our American sugar plantations when the fostering care of protection is entirely withdrawn? Upon the gentleman's theory I convict him of intending to destroy the American sugar industry.

My colleague and friend of protection, Governor GEAR, from the First district, also has some evil design upon the sugar industry of America, for he, too, declares that he would make the reduction on sugar. That is his interpretation of Republican pledges, State and national. He, too, strikes at a single industry. Now, here we have two honorable Representatives from Iowa declaring that the reduction shall be made on sugar, and two, Mr. KERR and Senator WILSON, that it shall be made on whisky. Both can not be accommodated. The pending bill makes a reduction of 22 per cent. on sugar, but none on whisky. Would it not be advisable for these gentlemen to compromise for the sake of harmony? Take part of the tax from whisky and part from sugar and then mix them? [Laughter and applause.] That great necessary of life, raw whisky, could then be sweetened to suit the taste of the consumer. [Laughter.]

But when my colleague [Mr. GEAR], in his speech the other day, spread his pair of blankets before the House—blankets manufactured by my old personal friend, Isaiah Meek, at his establishment at Bonaparte, in the county adjoining to where I live—I felt alarmed, and greatly so when I heard him make the following statement:

> Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of this House to the fact that the passage of the pending tariff bill will not only seriously injure the wool-grower of my State, but it will also close up the mill where that blanket was made, and put out of employment the labor engaged in its manufacture.

When I heard this statement I flew around lively, for I am acquainted with Isaiah Meek, and if this bill was to have the effect of closing his woolen factory I desired to know about it. So straightway I turned to page 28 of the bill to see what it said about the tariff on blankets; and lo! and behold, I found the rate of duty in the present bill on blankets is 40 per cent. ad valorem. [Laughter.]

Is not that enough? This bill, if it becomes a law, will give Isaiah Meek cheaper raw material; it will give him wool at less cost than he is now paying for it; the wool-grower will be more than compensated in the reduced cost of the manufactured goods, the people can buy cheaper blankets, and Mr. Meek will still be protected by a 40 per cent. duty on the imported blanket. How then will this bill close up Isaiah Meek's establishment? I have written Mr. Meek and expect a reply soon; and I now predict that Isaiah Meek is in favor of the Mills bill. [Applause.] When I hear from him I shall make use of what he says under the five-minutes debate.

But my friend and colleague from the First district of Iowa [Mr. GEAR] has not always entertained the idea that a tax on sugar was the sole thing that is threatening the prosperity of this country; for in his inaugural address as governor of the State of Iowa, delivered before the Legislature of that State January 16, 1880, he said:

> To a State whose products are in the main agricultural, as are those of Iowa, anything which enhances the cost of railways, thereby even incidentally in the least degree increasing the expense of the transportation of her products to the seaboard, which is her great market, is a question of great interest to all. In view of their greater strength and durability, which lessened the cost of replacement, all the great trunk railway lines of the country are adopting Bessemer steel rails. The manufacturers of this class of rails in the United States are controlled by a combination of not exceeding, I think, ten firms in number.
> This combination is protected by a high and specific tariff, which prevents the importation of foreign rails to any extent, thereby increasing the cost of the railways of the country. Without discussing the tariff question in all its bearings it may well be considered whether it is wise legislation, by a tariff exceptional in its character, to put immense profits into the pockets of a monopoly composed of but few persons at the expense, indirectly, not only of Iowa farmers, but of the whole West. It would therefore be well to instruct our Senators and Representatives in Congress to examine into this subject with a view to removing by Congressional legislation any discriminations which may be found to exist in the tariff on steel rails against the interests of Iowa producers.

I call attention to the fact that the present bill makes a reduction of $6 per ton in the duty on steel rails. Reckoning 100 tons to the mile, and remembering the fact that we have in Iowa 5,000 miles of railway, this would be a saving of $3,000,000 in the cost of replacing the rails now used upon the railways of my State; and the 8 per cent. which these corporations require as the return for capital invested would make an annual saving of $240,000 to the people of the State of Iowa for all time to come.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. WEAVER. No, sir; I am limited as to time, and I can not yield.

The number of miles of railway constructed last year was over 12,000. This bill, had it been the law, as it should have been, would have reduced the cost of construction $600 to the mile, a reduction of over $7,200,000 to the people of the United States, and a saving of 8 per cent upon that would be $576,000 annually. [Applause.]

Mr. BRUMM. I would like to call the attention of my friend to one matter.

Mr. WEAVER. Well, I yield for a moment.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman makes his statement upon the hypothesis that the protective duty enhances the price of the rail while free trade will lower it, does he not?

Mr. WEAVER. Certainly; and if it does not——

Mr. BRUMM. I only wish to say——

Mr. WEAVER. No, I can not yield further. If the protective duty does not enhance the price of the rail, what do you want it for? [Laughter and applause.] In your cogitations in your room please brood over that question, and at some future time give the House an elaborate answer.

Mr. BRUMM. I will answer now in a minute if you will yield to me.

Mr. WEAVER. But I promised to show that the protected industries were unwilling to treat their customers with the same liberality with which they themselves are treated by our revenue laws.

The law of competition is a natural and humane provision, running through all human industries. It was given to man to curb his avarice, to make him kind, and to keep alive the brotherhood of the race. The maxim "live and let live" came from the golden rule. It is a wise provision of the Great Lawgiver growing out of the very existence of the human family upon the earth and of their business relations with one another. It is dangerous to interfere with its operation.

But our American manufacturers say they can not compete with manufacturers of older countries who employ cheap labor. "Protect us against the cheap labor of the Old World," they say, "and we will not interfere with home competition." "We can compete with our neighbors who are upon an equal footing with ourselves and pay their employés the same wage that we do." Now, these are the equities of the contract. The Government takes them at their word and tells the foreigner to stand off. We speak to him with authority, and tell him that he shall not place his foreign wares on the market in free competition with our home manufactures unless he is willing first to pay a heavy tax for such privilege.

We not only say this to the foreigner, but we make the same stern declaration to our own citizens, and say to them also, "You shall not buy abroad; you shall buy of the home manufacturer, unless you are willing to pay a penalty in the shape of a tax for making your purchases abroad." And then we say to both the foreigner and the citizen, "Look well to it that you obey the law. We will place patrols along every mile of our territorial boundary; we will build, arm, and equip revenue-cutters to guard every mile of our seacoast, and do so at your expense, to see that you obey the laws." This is right, you say. I agree with you. But are not the manufacturers thus protected under some moral obligation to deal fairly with the Government and the people who have dealt so kindly with them? How have they met this obligation?

Having secured protection from foreign competition, they straightway entered into the free-trade markets of the world to buy their labor. I prove this by reading from the testimony of Gilbert B. Whitman, agent of the Amory Manufacturing Company of Manchester, N. H., an establishment engaged extensively in the manufacture of cotton cloth. These works, at the time the testimony was given, in 1883, had only been running three years. This was started as a protected industry. Let me read from the examination as contained in the report entitled Labor and Capital:

Q. What is the character of your employés?

A. About one-third of our help are Canadians; the remainder are of mixed nationalities, the Irish element preponderating. Then come the English, the Scotch, and the German.

Q. What proportion of them are Americans?

A. Out of eight hundred operatives, probably we have eighty Americans.—Labor and Capital, volume 3, page 28.

That is the kind of return these manufacturing establishments give to the people for the protection the Government extends to them against foreign "pauper labor." They enter the free-trade market of the world, purchase foreign labor and bring it here, to exclude American labor. Is that good faith?

On this same point we have the testimony of Mr. Charles L. Harding, on page 296 of the same volume. Speaking of the woolen manufacture at Dedham, Mass., he says:

A large portion of the help we have in our mills now is foreign.

These are specimen manufacturing establishments. How is it in Pennsylvania, the great protected State of this Union? The laws of that Commonwealth give to mill-owners and factory managers and corporations the right to go to the governor of that State and demand that he shall commission as many corporation police as the owners of those establishments may deem necessary. They are commissioned in the name of the State, with power to arrest and detain; and it is made the duty of all sheriffs and prison-keepers to receive the persons arrested by them, and to confine them in prison. These corporation police are under the control, management, and authority of the corporation, and are required by law to wear the corporation badge. Thus the State is made the policeman of the protected industries, with the corporation as commander-in-chief. This is the kind of protection that labor gets in Pennsylvania.

I called the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] to Brightly's Purdon's Digest, page 1338, of the Laws of Pennsylvania, and asked him whether that was not the law of his State. He said that he did not know whether it was the law of Pennsylvania or not. I was greatly astonished at the gentleman's answer. When the committee of this House which was authorized to investigate the labor strikes visited the coal region of Pennsylvania they found one hundred of these corporation policemen wearing the badge of their employers and drawing $2 per day for keeping their starving brethren in subjection. Thus the united power of the corporations and the Commonwealth were hurled against the people. Is this the happy condition to which we are all tending under protection? [Applause.]

This amounts to an alliance, offensive and defensive, between the powerful barons and the State—with the baron, however, as commander-in-chief.

Mr. BRUMM. Are not these same policemen under the employment of Mr. SCOTT?

Mr. WEAVER. I can not say whether they are or not. Mr. SCOTT can answer for himself.

Mr. BRUMM. Well, I will say to the gentleman that I know they are.

Mr. WEAVER. I do not see how that makes my point less forcible.

Mr. BRUMM. It only shows that human nature is very much alike, whether a man is a free-trader or a protectionist.

Mr. WEAVER. But, sir, you are standing up here opposing the reduction of the duty on steel rails and on all Pennsylvania manufactures, when you must know that it is the capitalist alone who gets the benefit of protection, and that your laborers are growing poorer from year to year. [Applause.]

Now, while these corporations are protected before foreign competition, how are they treating the American laborer? Why, they have simply ignored the equities of their contract, and have gone with the free-trade market of the world and bought their labor where they could buy it the cheapest.

But, sir, they are not satisfied with this. Secure from foreign competition, they are now unwilling to endure competition among themselves, and so the "trust" is resorted to, which is the very refinement of monopoly and the destruction of competition. Sir John Culpepper, in a speech in the Long Parliament, said of the brood of monopolies then infesting England:

They are a nest of wasps—a swarm of vermin which have overcrept the land. Like the frogs of Egypt, they have gotten possession of our dwellings and we have scarce a room free from them. They sup in our cup, they dip in our dish, they sit by our fire. We find them in the dye-pot, wash-bowl, and powdering-tub. They share with the butter in his box. They will not bate us a pin. We may not buy our clothes without their brokage. These are the leeches that have sucked the commonwealth so hard that it is almost hectical.

I will name a few of the protected industries and connected lines of business which are controlled by trusts: Linseed-oil, watches and watch-cases, rope and cordage, salt, nails, screws, envelopes, iron beams for houses, bridges, etc.; terra-cotta goods, wall-paper and paperhangings, candy, bagging, the manufacture of steel, barbed wire, plated ware, upholsterer's goods, galvanized sheet-iron, castor-oil, gutta-percha goods, tacks, wrenches and hinges, boiler-flues, glass, lumber, writing-paper, wrapping-paper, wooden-ware, oil-cloth, carpets, silver plate.

This exhibit is taken from standard authorities. I refer to an article by Henry D. Lloyd in the North American Review for June, 1884, and from a recent work on "Trusts," by William W. Cook, of the New York bar.

I could extend this list almost indefinitely. There is scarcely a protected industry in America to-day—or unprotected, for that matter—that has not resorted to combination and to the trust; and for what purpose? For the purpose of destroying home competition. [Applause.] The Government says to the foreigner: "Stand off! You shall not come in competition with our home manufacturers," and as soon as this is accomplished then the home manufacturers combine and destroy all competition; and yet they have the hardihood to come into this house, they have the audacity, when these facts are known to the American people, to stand up here and cry out that we are about to destroy their industries! [Applause.] Whose industries are they destroying? [Applause.] "Don't take the duty off the fleece," say they; but the protected "trusts" seem to be free to "fleece" the public.

Sir, they have not kept faith with the American people, and this bill deals in a spirit of liberality wholly unknown to these protected industries, a liberality which they are unwilling to practice themselves. [Applause.]

It is a fraud and a pretense to claim that labor is getting the benefit of protection. Our tariff laws pour a golden stream into the pockets of the manufacturers, but it never returns to bless and enrich the children of toil.

Mr. Chairman, the strikes which have occurred within the past two years, and particularly those occurring during the past year, establish the melancholy fact beyond question, that capital is master of the situation in this country. Every important strike has failed. The great anthracite coal strike, the railroad strikes, and even the strike of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the strongest single labor organization within the United States; a strike occurring among a class of workmen where long experience and familiarity with their important and hazardous business was supposed to be necessary—even with this organization the strike is a failure.

It is a lamentable fact that they have been practically driven to the wall. Labor must look to some other remedy, and must look quickly. What labor needs now is protection, not so much from the competition of foreign manufacturers as from the cruel exactions of corporations, syndicates, and trusts. And I mean by labor to include every branch of American industry from the day laborer and wage-worker of the East to that great body of farmers in the West; from the wheat-raiser of the North to the cotton-planter of the South. Here is my analysis of the situation in this country: When the capitalists and the laborers were both without organization capital had greatly the advantage. This has been true in all ages of the world. Now that capitalists and workingmen are both organized, the situation is practically unchanged. Capital still has the advantage. It possesses endurance and ability to stand a siege. Capitalists possess one thing which labor does not—ready money. Labor is in possession of one thing which capital has not—the ballot. My advice to the industrial people of America is to avail themselves of this advantage, and to do it quickly. If labor would remain the servant of capital, pay no heed to what I say. If you wish capital to take its legitimate place as the servant of mankind, if you would avoid serfdom for yourselves and your posterity, you must immediately throw about the people such safeguards as will insure that result. You must erect anew the barriers which our fathers erected, but which have been trodden down.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, the great fundamental principle of our Government is equality—equality of citizens, equality of States—and any tax or law that violates this principle is not in accord with the spirit and genius of our institutions. No government like this, based on such a grand principle, ought to aid private business by tariffs not laid for legitimate taxation; nor has it the right to grant special privileges to some and build up monopolies at the expense of others. This sacred principle was so just, so potent, and so dear to the American heart that it tore, vi et armis, from the great charter of our rights all that was in conflict with it.

If, then, Mr. Chairman, the injustice and inequality of slavery could not exist when guarantied and protected by the Constitution because wrong in principle, can protection, which is wrong both in principle and practice, and which means a worse form of slavery to both the black and white of those States where it did exist, live in conflict with it?

The tariff, considered either from the standpoint of protection or for revenue only, is a subject of great difficulty to those who lay it and of much greater concern to those who pay it. The committee and the country have been treated to a very able and exhaustive debate. I am glad we have had it, and it is to be hoped much good will come from it. While I am not one of those who believe that all knowledge of this important question is derived, like Falstaff's knowledge of the real prince, from instinct, but think it should be studied carefully, I do not intend on this occasion to lecture on political economy, nor to harass the committee with long tables. I hope by the use of a few cold facts to point out some of the evils existing in our revenue and currency laws, and to fix the responsibility for such, if possible.

The war is over and the questions arising out of it have been settled. The time has come when every man should speak and vote his honest convictions upon economic questions without reference to the issues of the past. A great responsibility rests upon this House, and particularly this side of it. Let us meet the question with courage and faith in the people. Let us summon all our intelligence, integrity, fairness, forbearance, and patriotism, and in a spirit of mutual concessions agree upon some bill that will reduce the surplus and at the same time lessen the burdens of the tax-ridden people of our country. The Democrat who fails to do his duty in this contest between those who pay and those who receive bounties dishonors the traditions of his party and the sacred trust committed to him.

The bill under consideration is by no means perfect. It is not what I would like to have, but I am prepared to support it as the best that can be had at present. We stand face to face with an increasing surplus of hundreds of millions of dollars. We hear the cry of "hard times" from all classes of people and all kinds of business. While call-loans are cheap and banker's balances are large, people who want money can not get it. The cry comes up for more money, a larger circulating medium. Profits are growing less, values are shrinking. Business men as well as farmers and mechanics find it difficult to make buckle and tongue meet. Mills are running on short time. Traffic is dull, and strikes are on. Pools are made; trusts and combinations of every character are formed to control production and prices. The wealth of the country is passing from the pockets of the many to the coffers of the few. The young men are leaving the country for cities and towns. Such is the condition of the grandest, freest, and best Government, composed of the most intelligent and patriotic people the world ever saw, at a time when it has an outstanding circulation of over $1,600,000,000—more than $25 per capita, and a public credit unequaled by any country at any time.

This is our condition after we have become the greatest manufacturing, mining, and agricultural nation in the world. What is the cause? To my mind there is but one answer, and that is bad financiering and our system of unequal and unnecessary taxation. Our Government has by its own acts taken an overdose of tariff, which threatens financial congestion to the body politic. Some speedy remedy must be applied that will restore to actual circulation the millions now partly held in the Treasury and partly deposited in the national banks and used without interest, and at the same time prevent a repetition of such a condition of business. That such a state of affairs is possible under our form of government is almost incredible, and yet, Mr. Chairman, we know that it does exist, and there is no one bold enough to deny it. If so, let him speak.

The present Administration is in no way responsible for this. It has done all that could be done under the law to prevent it, and has, perhaps, in one or two instances exceeded the power conferred, but it was an honest effort to keep in circulation the money of the people. It called and paid off all of the 3 per cent. bonds that were subject to payment at the option of the Government more than a year ago. Prior to that, in obedience to the known wishes of the President and platform pledges, the Democratic party in this House, under tthe lead of the able, honest, and courageous Morrison, made an effor to reduce the revenues to the actual and necessary expenses of the Government, expecting to absorb the surplus in the payment of such bonds as were subject to call. That was the proper thing to do, and was what the President and nearly all Democrats wanted done, but the Republican party has almost to a man, with a few protectionists on this side, opposed and defeated such measures. But, since the bonds have all been paid there is no way to prevent an increase of the surplus, now too large, without legislative action, except to purchase the unmatured bonds, as the Secretary is now doing.

To prevent any further surplus accumulations in the Treasury bonds are being purchased at a premium of over 26 per cent. For the privilege of paying a coin bond issued for depreciated currency, after paying interest for nearly twenty years, we are required to pay for every dollar thereof $1.26, and the Republican party, whose legislation makes this necessary by a stubborn opposition to the pending bill, declares in effect that this is what it wants. The bondholders are not content with payment according to the contract while we have the money, but insist that we must let the surplus remain idle or pay the premium. Having deliberately adopted a financial policy by which the currency was contracted and the volume in a large measure subjected to the control of the banks, and a large part of the debt funded at high interest for a long time without the option of payment, and having fastened upon the people, under the plea of protection to labor, a system of taxation which requires them to pay indirectly to the manufacturers $3 for every dollar that reaches the Treasury through the custom-houses, the Republican party says to the country that it will consent to no change that will in the least interfere with the profits and tribute of the manufacturing corporations and trusts now sapping the very life of our institutions.

While the favored industries get a tribute of over $500,000,000 annually it will be difficult to get a change until we have a clear majority of Democrats in both ends of the Capitol who will reflect the wishes of the people and respect the Constitution and the common and just principle of equal taxation, according to the wants of the Government. Such legislation, Mr. Chairman, is a crime against humanity and posterity, for which there is nothing that can be said in palliation. For less crimes revolutions have been resorted to and crowned heads brought to the block. For want of a leader bold enough and an organization strong enough to successfully antagonize the corporations and monopolists, who have so long controlled the legislation of the country, the people have been compelled to submit to the wrong; but the President, with the courage of Jackson and the clearness of Jefferson, by his late message, has espoused the cause of the people in the struggle, and has staked the success of his party on the issue tendered by him and accepted by the opposition. Those who are not for him are against him. There is no middle ground in this great fight for reform.

The people, who are nearly always right, are rallying around him. Thousands of voters are changing from opposition to support since his tariff reform message. His party is united as never before, and the result of the next election will determine whether that plain, simple Government, organized by equal citizens, who fled from the oppressions and burdens of the Old World in the hope that they could maintain the new institutions at little cost and without injustice, leaving the bulk of the earnings in the pockets of the people, shall be preserved or not. I was glad a short time since to hear the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] express his alarm at the reduction in the value of farm products, and his desire to investigate the cause and correct the wrong, "whether the reduction comes from the tariff law, or whether it comes from the state of the currency." Thae was a patriotic, statesman-like utterance, and I believe that it is the spirit with which we should conduct this discussion. Let us look for the cause and stand ready to apply the remedy in the interest of the whole people.

The currency and the taxes are so often the same thing, and are in so many ways connected, especially when the latter is laid so as to create a surplus, that they may very appropriately be discussed in the same connection, since one object of the pending bill is to reduce that surplus. Without stopping to discuss our present financial policy, I will say that a reduction of taxes and revenue is the first important step in any reform in the currency, and the sooner it is done and the more complete the better for those who wish changes in the currency law. It must be admitted by all who will reflect for a moment, that the actual circulating medium can not be increased, except by the free coinage of silver, until we have reduced the receipts of the Government to less than we spend. As long as our system brings in more than we pay out there is no way to force a circulation of Government currency.

The Government may purchase silver bullion and coin silver or issue Treasury notes or certificates, but it will give but little relief, as it or some other dollars of equal amounts must be kept in the Treasury or used in the purchase of the outstanding bonds. So we see, Mr. Chairman, that the surest way to begin a currency reform is to reduce the tariff and the revenues. Turn into the channels of business what is in the Treasury, and take care hereafter not to exact any more from the people than the Government needs. Let free silver follow the passage of the tariff bill and you will see a return of prosperity. I trust we may have the co-operation of the distinguished gentleman in both of these measures.

Mr. Chairman, but for the vicious legislation of the Republican party since the war our Government would be about out of debt. By contraction of the currency, funding and refunding of the debt, a large part of it has been pushed onto another generation for payment. Without stopping to enumerate at length the financial legislation for which the Republican party is responsible, I charge it with the passage of every bad law that has tended to make times hard and money scarce, and with resisting every act for the relief of the people proposed by the Democrats. In proof of this charge I now call attention to the votes of the two great parties on these financial questions. For the record up to June, 1878, I will read an extract from a speech made by Hon. JOHN E. KENNA, of West Virginia, now a United States Senator from that State:

TAXATION OF THE BONDS.

On the 28th day of June, 1862, the question of concurring in Senate amendments to an act creating bonds, etc., was before the House. Mr. HOLMAN, a Democrat, offered the following provision:

"Provided, That nothing in this act shall impair the right of the States to tax the bonds, notes, and other obligations issued under this act."

Sixty-three Democrats voted for this righteous amendment and not one voted against it. Of the Republicans, only 8 voted "ay" and 77 voted "no." Thus the Republican party defeated in the House the proposition to tax the bonds.

THE NATIONAL-BANK SYSTEM.

In February, 1863, the bill was pending for the charter of the national banks. The vote was taken in the Senate on the 12th and in the House on the 20th of that month. The bill involved the inauguration of a system which is as cordially hated by the masses of our people as ever was a measure hostile to their interests. On its passage in the Senate the Democrats voted "ay" 2 and "no" 12, which was six to one against the system. In the House the Democrats voted "ay" 3 and "no" 42, making fourteen to one against it. But who passed this bill and created the national banks? In the Senate the Republicans voted "no" 9, "ay" 21, constituting a majority of more than two to one in its favor. In the House the Republicans voted "no" 22 and "ay" 75, making over three to one in its favor. Thus the Republican party foisted upon the country the national-bank system.

THE SUPPLEMENTAL BANK BILL.

On April 18, 1864, what is known as the supplemental national-bank bill was before Congress. It was a repetition of the evils of the charter act, and was intended to foster and perpetuate the national-bank system. The Democrats voted in the House, 65 solid "no." The Republicans voted "ay" 80 and "no" only 1. In the Senate the Democrats voted, 7 solid "no." The Republicans voted "no" 2 and "ay" 30. Thus the Republican party passed this objectionable act. On the same day, when Mr. Arnold offered in the House a resolution to provide for taxing State banks, Mr. RANDALL, a Democrat, offered to amend by providing for the

TAXATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Notwithstanding that SAMUEL J. RANDALL, who is now Speaker of this House, stands and stood then among the first parliamentarians on the continent, on this resolution to tax national banks, a Republican Speaker, in the interests of the money power, arbitrarily ruled him "out of order." Every member familiar with the history of this body knows how potent is the voice of the Speaker for weal or for woe. On this occasion it was invoked for the defeat of a righteous measure, and thus the Republican party, through its Republican Speaker, denied even a hearing of the cause.

In March, 1869, when the "act to strengthen the public credit," which ought to have been entitled came up for consideration, debate was cut off. Although it declared the currency indebtedness of the country to be payable in coin, and added $300,000,000 to the public debt, it was passed under the "previous question"—the "gag law"—and debate was denied. It was a gigantic fraud. On its passage in the House only 1 Democrat voted "ay," while 34 voted "no." Only 12 Republicans voted "no" and 96 voted "ay." In the Senate the Republicans voted, "no" 7, "ay" 42. The Democrats voted solid "no." While this measure was pending in the Senate, Mr. Thurman, a Democrat, moved to add that—

"Nothing herein contained shall apply to what is commonly called 5-20 bonds."

These bonds were payable in greenbacks, and this act was to make them payable in coin. It was to avoid the consummation of that outrage upon the people that Mr. Thurman offered his amendment. The Democrats voted solid for it. The Republicans voted "ay," only 6, and "no" 31. Thus without amendment, in all its original injustice, the Republican party passed this odious act. On March 29, 1869, Mr. Morgan, a Democrat, offered a resolution to exempt salt, tea, coffee, sugar, matches, and tobacco, and

TO TAX THE BONDS.

This resolution was defeated. The Democrats voted "ay" solid 39; the Republicans voted solid "no," 104. Thus the Republican party in the House, by unanimous vote, again defeated an effort to tax the bonds.

In 1870 the act was pending which provided for funding the greenback bonds into coin bonds, and which

ROBBED THE PEOPLE OF $500,000,000.

The Democrats of the House voted solid "no," 54. The Republicans voted "no" only 2, and "ay" 139! In the Senate the Democrats voted solid "no." The Republicans carried it, and thus the Republican party is responsible for the wrong which resulted from this iniquitous measure; and when the Houses divided and a conference committee was appointed to consider the differences upon this bill, Mr. Brooks arose in his seat and told the Republican Speaker, Mr. Blaine, that the conferees were and that the minority was not represented. Having "set up" the committee, the Republican Speaker contemptuously replied "it is not essential that it should be." In July, 1870, when SHERMAN'S proposition was pending

"ALL ON ONE SIDE"

TO INCREASE THE NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION

$54,000,000, as usual in all these aggressive measures the previous question was demanded and debate refused. While the Democrats voted "ay" only 4, and "no" 44, the Republican party passed this bill. On June 14, when that same bill was pending, Mr. RANDALL, a Democrat, offered a substitute which proposed to take up the national-bank notes, and, in their stead. On this measure the Democrats voted "no" only 6, and "ay" 41. The Republicans voted "ay" only 10, and "no" 105. Thus this proposed issue of greenbacks was defeated in the House by the Republican party.

ISSUE $300,000,000 IN GREENBACKS

At the same time Mr. Morgan, a Democrat, offered a substitute which provided for and the substitution of $400,000,000 in green acks, with full legal-tender qualities, for the national-bank notes. The Democrats voted "no" 11, "ay" 34, or over 3 to 1 for the substitute. The Republicans voted "ay" only 3, and "no" 116. Thus the Republican party in the House defeated also this proposed financial reform.

On the 31st of January, 1870, Mr. McNeely, a Democrat, offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the national debt should be paid in strict compliance with the contract, whether it is made payable in gold or greenbacks; that the 5.20 bonds are payable in greenbacks or their equivalent, and we condemn the policy of the administration which is squandering millions of money by buying such bonds at a high rate of premium when the Government had the clear right to redeem them at par."

To this honest, fair interpretation of a contract in behalf of a people who were already overcast with the shadow of impending financial panic only 3 Democrats could be found to vote in opposition, while 34 voted in its favor. Of the Republicans only 1 voted for it and 119 members of the Republican party laid it in its grave!

On the 17th day of January, 1870, Mr. McNeeley made

ANOTHER EFFORT IN BEHALF OF GREENBACKS.

He offered the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and they are hereby, instructed to report at an early day a bill providing for withdrawal from circulation the national-bank currency and for issuing instead of such currency Treasury notes usually known as greenbacks."

On this resolution looking to financial reform the Democrats voted "no" only 2 and "ay" 53. The Republicans voted "ay" 1 and "no" 112. Thus the Republican party in the House slaughtered this further attempt at honest currency.

In 1872, after the policy of the Treasury had been well defined, when the Secretary was day after day by treating the 5.20 bonds as coin bonds and negotiating them in defiance of the contract of their creation, which made them payable in currency, the following resolution was presented:

ALLOWING THE BONDHOLDERS TO ROB THE PEOPLE,

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this House the Secretary of the Treasury in negotiating the loan authorized by the act of July 14, 1870, has neither increased the bonded debt nor incurred an expenditure contrary to law."

At the time this resolution was offered the policy of the Treasury Department was daily augmenting our national debt. It was daily fastening upon us that system which has since so cursed the country. This resolution gave emphatic approval to this whole ruinous policy, and invited and approved in advance the mischievous course which has since been pursued. It passed the House by a strict party vote. The Democrats voted solid 86 "no." The Republicans voted "ay" 110, and thus the Republican party gave formal and official sanction to a line of policy which has scattered business calamity broadcast over the land.

In 1873 the

was passed. The country has been made aware of the manner in which this nefarious measure was smuggled and bulldozed through without even being read. Its contents were not known, the yeas and nays were not called on its passage, and hence the vote of members is not entered on the Journal. The RECORD does show, however, that Mr. Hooper, a Republican, moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill. He had it in charge. He knew its contents. He knew it struck silver down and destroyed the double standard of our fathers. The RECORD therefore shows that a Republican had charge of the bill, and by a motion to suspend the rules, cut off debate and forced it to a vote. But the RECORD shows more. It shows that this giant swindle had been submitted to the Republican Secretary of the Treasury, the Republican director and controller of finances, and was by him approved. The RECORD on this point is as follows:

"Mr. MERRIAM. Has this bill been submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury; and, if so, does it meet his approval?"

"Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. It has been submitted to him, and he not only approves it, but strongly urges its passage."

Thus, Mr. Speaker, this monstrosity, this unmitigated villainy which struck down silver when it was higher in the market than gold, simply to make "money scarce" and increase the burdens of the country, was manipulated and carried through by a Republican member of the House, under the full sanction and support of the Republican Secretary of the Treasury. Passed as the bill was, under suspension of the rules, without debate, and not even read, there is no evidence on earth that any living man knew it demonetized silver except the Secretary and member I have named.

We come now to that

the resumption act of 1875. Like other similar acts it was passed without debate. Discussion was cut off. The vote in the Senate stood Republican—"ay" 32, "no" only 1. The Democrats voted solid "no." In the House the Republicans voted only 24 "no," and "ay" 136, making more than five to one in favor of this great crime against the prosperity and happiness of the country. The Democrats voted solid 74 to defeat it. In the Senate even Carl Schurz complained that he had "found the bill on his table to-day for the first time, and had not had time to read it or inform himself intelligently of its contents." In answer to this appeal for opportunity to understand this important measure John Sherman, the present Republican Secretary of the Treasury, rose in his place in the Senate and boldly declared that he would "press the bill to its passage from that hour forward." Evidences that he kept that promise faithfully and too well are found in the blasted homes and fortunes and hungry women and children from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean.

These, Mr. Speaker, are the leading financial issues upon which the two great parties have divided. They mark the line between the money sharks on the one side and the people on the other. The Republican party had the President and both branches of Congress during all that time. At the very threshold of the system Mr. Stevens declared to his Republican associates on the floor of the House:

"We are introducing new practices all around. We are making one currency for the people and another for other purposes."

And, sir, that policy was pursued from 1862 to 1875. The Republican party pursued it. With a determined purpose, with unrelenting vigor, with a singleness of object that no human appeal could divert and no human misery deter, the Republican party went madly on in this desperate financial career and never did it call a halt until

CONFRONTED BY A DEMOCRATIC MAJORITY

in the House of Representatives of the Forty-fourth Congress! It is a part of the financial history of the country, demonstrated by the record, that all the wicked legislation which has racked this country to the very verge of revolution—the whole of it—every act and deed, was consummated when the Republican party had control of every department of the Government. It is also true that not one single act of which the people complain was ever passed after the Democrats acquired control of the House. It is equally true that not one single act of relief was ever enacted until the popular uprising of 1874 gave to the Democrats control of the House of Representatives. And, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter to be remembered to the everlasting credit of the Democratic party that it encountered and vanquished at the first onslaught that gigantic money power to which the Republican party has been for years as the plaything to a child! The first Democratic House in August, 1876, raised the banner of financial reform by the passage of a bill

TO REPEAL THE RESUMPTION ACT.

The Republican vote on the passage of that bill stood "ay" only 9 and "no" 56, or over six to one against the repeal. The Democrats voted "no" 29 and "ay" 97; more than three to one in its favor. The bill passed the House by Democratic votes, and thus the first battle against the Shylocks was left to be turned against the people by the Republican Senate which failed to pass the bill. There the matter stood when the great political contest of 1876 came on. The result of that election returned a Democratic majority to the House of Representatives, while the Senate is still Republican. Those who have observed the proceedings since we assembled here will bear witness to the earnestness of the warfare that has been waged for financial relief. As early as November 5, 1877, we passed the bill

TO REMONETIZE SILVER.

The Republicans, driven at last by a public sentiment which had twice routed them at the polls, yielded to this measure a fair support. They voted—"no" 24, and "ay" 67; not quite three to one. The Democrats voted—"no" 10, and "ay" 97, or nearly ten to one in its favor. But when this measure to restore the dollar of our fathers was sent by a Democratic House to a Republican Senate it was there amended and emasculated until its value was well-nigh destroyed, and finally vetoed by a Republican President. On the 23d of the same month the passed the House. On this repeal the Republicans voted—"ay" 28 and "no" 92, more than three to one against it. The Democrats voted—"no" 29 and "ay" 104, more than three to one in its favor. This act was sent to the Republican Senate, and there a Rip Van Winkle sleep of seven long months has held it fast.

On the 29th day of April the bill was passed.

FORBIDDING FURTHER RETIREMENT OF GREENBACKS.

The Democrats voted on this measure—"no" 7, and "ay" 104; the Republicans voted—"ay" 73, and "no" 28. Many of them voted with the avowed reason that it would not interfere with the resumption act, and it is equally understood in well-informed circles that the Republicans who favored the bill in the Senate did so upon the same ground. Add to what I have enumerated the bills which have been favorably reported at this session by a Democratic committee, the bill to authorize the issuing of certificates for silver bullion, and the bill to and you have a fair epitomized history of the financial legislation of the last sixteen years. In giving the status of the political parties, I have given the result of my own individual researches; I have investigated the subject; I have examined the record, and I speak what I know.

* * * * * * *

Mr. Chairman, in addition to what Mr. KENNA has said I desire to refer to the record of other votes later than the period covered by him, and I will state that I have carefully gone over these votes and believe the analysis I have made is correct. In disposing of the Independents, Nationals, or Greenbackers I have counted them as Democrats or Republicans just as they may have voted on the questions under consideration at the time.

CRAPO EXTENSION BILL.

When this bill was under consideration, Mr. Buckner, a Democrat, moved to fix the time for the payment of the bonds at ten instead or twenty as recommended by the Republican committee, and on a yea-and-nay vote it was lost. The yeas were 91, nays 116. Of the yeas 79 were Democrats and 12 Republicans. Nays, 98 Republicans and 18 Democrats.

Mr. BLAND, a Democrat, and now the able chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, moved a substitute for the committee bill which provided for issuing Treasury notes for bank notes. This would have given the country a better currency without the aid or intervention of the banks, but would have deprived the bank corporations of their power over the currency, and so the substitute was not agreed to, by a vote of 71 yeas to 138 nays. Of the yeas there were 68 Democrats and 3 Republicans; nays, 119 Republicans and 19 Democrats. Afterwards, on the 10th day of July, 1882, the bill passed the House by a vote of 110 yeas and 79 nays. Of the yeas there were 99 Republicans and 11 Democrats; nays, 76 Democrats and 3 Republicans.

LEGAL-TENDER QUALITY OF SILVER DOLLAR.

Mr. Fort, on the 9th of December, 1878, moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill declaring the standard silver dollar a legal-tender and preventing any discrimination against it, and failing to get two-thirds it failed by the following vote: Yeas 151, nays 89. Of the yeas there were 106 Democrats and 45 Republicans; nays, 73 Republicans and 16 Democrats.

GREENBACKS RECEIVABLE FOR DUTIES.

Mr. Wood, a Democrat, January 15, 1879, moved to pass a bill making United States notes receivable for duties on imports, and it passed—yeas 153, nays 43. Of the yeas there were 108 Democrats and 46 Republicans; nays, Republicans 31, Democrats 12.

INTERCHANGEABILITY OF GOLD AND SILVER COINS.

On February 3, 1879, Mr. WHITTHORNE, the distinguished and faithful Democrat, who is now chairman of the Committee on Indian Depredations, moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill to provide for the interchange of gold and silver and to prevent discrimination against either, and it was disagreed to; yeas 101, nays 136. Of the yeas there were 89 Democrats and 12 Republicans; nays 100 Republicans and 36 Democrats.

GREENBACKS AND REFUNDING.

On April 5, 1880, my good Democratic friend General WEAVER, who sits just to my left, moved to suspend the rules and pass the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is the sense of this House that all currency, whether metallic or paper, necessary for use and convenience of the people, should be issued and its volume controlled by the Government, and not by or through the bank corporations of the country; and when so issued should be a full legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private.

Resolved, That in the judgment of this House that portion of the interest-bearing debt of the United States which shall become redeemable in the year 1881, or prior thereto, being in amount about $782,000,000, should not be refunded beyond the power of the Government to call in said obligations and pay them at any time, but should be paid as rapidly as possible, and according to contract. To enable the Government to meet these obligations the mints of the United States should be operated to their full capacity in the coinage of standard silver dollars and such other coinage as the business interest of the country may require.

This motion was lost by a vote of 85 yeas to 117 nays. Of the yeas there were 84 Democrats and 1 Republican; nays 90 Republicans and 27 Democrats.

FREE COINAGE OF SILVER AND SUSPENSION.

April 8, 1886, when the bill for the free coinage of silver was under consideration the following amendment was offered:

That unless meantime, through concurrent action of the nations of Europe with the United States, silver be remonetized prior to July 1, 1889, that then and thereafter so much of the act of February 28, 1878, entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character," as authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver bullion and cause the same to be coined, shall be suspended until further action by Congress.

The amendment was lost by a vote of 84 yeas to 201 nays; of those voting yea there were 52 Republicans and 32 Democrats; nays, 136 Democrats and 65 Republicans.

The bill for free coinage was then rejected by a vote of 126 yeas, nays 163. Of those voting yea there were 101 Democrats and 25 Republicans; nays, 95 Republicans and 68 Democrats. But, Mr. Chairman, this is only a part of one chapter of the legalized crimes of the Republican party against the people. On the financial issues we see that the Democratic party has stood by the people in opposition to all those measures of the Republican party that have brought so much suffering to the poor and so much wealth to the rich.

We see how the record has been made step by step, and see how by degrees the wealth has gone from the masses who create it to the few cunning manipulators of Wall street and tariff barons of New England. The Democratic party has, as is shown by this record, been instrumental in restoring the silver dollar, stopping the further retirement of the greenbacks that the Republicans had said by solemn statute should go; providing for gold and silver certificates; the one and two dollar greenback bills, and during this Congress in passing through the House a bill for fractional currency. There is much in this record to make Democrats feel proud of their party; but there is still more in the record it has made in the fight for a reduction of tariff taxes and bounties.

And as a second count in the indictment in and for the body of the American people, I charge that the Republican party is not only responsible to the country for the tariff laws as they now exist with all their inequalities and injustice, but that it has on all occasions resisted all reductions that were proposed in the interest of the great body of the consumers, and has supported only such as would relieve the corporations and capitalists; and in order that I may make good this charge, I ask you to go with me to the records that stand as mute but eternal witness against their acts. We can only examine the most important votes on these questions of tariff and internal revenue.

MILLS RESOLUTION.

December 1, 1877, a motion was made by Mr. MILLS, a Democrat, and who is now the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to revise the tariff so as to make it purely and solely a tariff for revenue and not for protecting one class of citizens by plundering another.

The motion was lost. The yeas were 67, nays 76. Of the yeas there were 60 Democrats and 7 Republicans, and of the nays there were 64 Republicans and 13 Democrats. A vote against this was in effect saying that they would plunder one class of citizens for the benefit of another, or that the protective tariff could not be so arranged as to prevent such plundering.

THE WOOD TARIFF BILL.

This was a bill to reduce taxes proposed by a Democratic committee. On the 5th day of June, 1878, a motion to strike out the enacting clause was agreed to by a vote of 134 yeas, 120 nays. Of the yeas there were 115 Republicans and 19 Democrats; nays, 113 Democrats and 7 Republicans.

FREE QUININE.

On the 30th day of June, 1879, Mr. Covert, a Democrat, moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill placing quinine on the free-list, and it was agreed to by a vote of yeas 125, nays 33. Of the yeas there were 103 Democrats and 22 Republicans, and of the nays there were 31 Republicans and 2 Democrats. This bill became a law, Mr. Chairman, but not without the usual protest from the manufacturers, who always keep their weather eye on "the home market," and who are always very much concerned about the consumer if they manufacture what he is compelled to have and can not get anywhere else. Here is the protest they made, and our Republican friends believed it:

Why should objection be made to a duty of 20 per cent.? Why should the chemical industry be singled out to be ruined?

Will the consumer be benefited? We assert most emphatically he will not. Prices will fluctuate; average rates will be as high or higher than they have been during the existence of the protective tariff. But even should the wholesale price be as low as now at times, a consumer using it in small quantities will get no benefit from it. In whose interest, then, is the duty to be reduced?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], who spoke this morning, I believe voted against this bill to save the manufacturing protesters from ruin. If he was so far off in his guess about what would happen to the industries then, what he says now should count for but little, and yet he pretends to know all about it.

In spite of the protests of the manufacturers that it would ruin them, break up their business, and place the people of this country at the mercy of the foreign manufactures, the Democrats passed the bill and took the risk. This was a trial and test of this much-talked of "home-market" idea that we now hear so much about, and it was interesting to see the crash come. If the predictions of our Republican friends had come true then they could have come to us with some standing as prophets, but time has shown that it was all speculation with them. We have more men engaged in this ruined industry now than we had then, and the price of quinine has been reduced from $3.50 per ounce to 50 cents. Nobody is hurt, and if you wish to know who is benefited by this small piece of legislation, ask the millions of people who use this great medicine. In some parts of the country it is almost a necessity.

FREE SALT.

On the 12th January, 1880, Mr. HATCH, a true friend to the farmers, and the present able and faithful chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill for free salt, which was not agreed to; yeas 115, nays 116. Of the yeas there were 104 Democrats and 11 Republicans; nays, 103 Republicans and 13 Democrats.

FREE PAPER AND SALT.

And again on the 14th May, 1880, pending the consideration of a resolution for final adjournment, Mr. MILLS moved to recommit with instructions to report a bill for free printing-paper and free salt before they report the resolution to adjourn, which was disagreed to; yeas 90, nays 116. Of the yeas, 84 were Democrats and 6 Republicans; nays, 94 were Republicans, and 22 were Democrats.

THE TARIFF COMMISSION.

Pending the consideration of this bill on the 6th day of May, 1882, Mr. MILLS, who was then as he is now ready to seize every opportunity to relieve the people, moved to recommit, with the following instructions:

First. That no more money shall be collected than is necessary for the wants of the Government, economically administered.

Second. That no duty be imposed on any article above the lowest rate that will yield the largest amount of revenue.

Third. That below such rate discrimination may be made, descending in the scale of duties, or for imperative reasons the articles may be placed on the list of those free from all duty.

Fourth. That the maximum revenue duty should be imposed on all luxuries.

Fifth. That all specific duties should be abolished and "ad valorem" duties substituted in their place, care being taken to guard against fraudulent invoices and undervaluation, and to assess the duty upon the actual market value.

Sixth. That the duty should be so imposed as to operate as equally as possible throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section.

The motion was disagreed to—yeas 75, nays 152. The yeas were all Democrats; the nays were 130 Republicans and 22 Democrats. Not a single Republican could be found who was willing to say by his vote that taxes should be so imposed as to operate equally throughout the Union, discriminating neither for nor against any class or section. They stood then as they stand now, for class legislation and against equality and justice to all sections. The bill providing for the commission, which was only another means of getting a continuance for the "protected industries," was then passed by the House by a vote of 151 yeas to 83 nays. Of the yeas there were 123 Republicans and 28 Democrats; nays, 75 Democrats and 8 Republicans.

The bill passed the Senate May 9, 1882—yeas 35, nays 19. Of the yeas there were 29 Republicans and 6 Democrats; nays, 17 Democrats and 2 Republicans.

FREE TRACE-CHAINS.

A motion made by Mr. TURNER, a Democrat, and now a member of the Ways and Means Committee, from which the bill now under consideration came, in the House June 6, 1882, to suspend the rules and pass a bill for free trace-chains was lost—yeas 73, nays 109. Of the yeas 70 were Democrats and 3 Republicans; nays, 104 Republicans and 5 Democrats.

KNIT GOODS.

July 3, 1882, on the motion of Mr. KELLEY, a Republican, the rules were suspended and a bill increasing the tariff on woolen knit goods was passed by a vote of 134 yeas to 49 nays. One hundred and twelve Republicans and 22 Democrats voted yea and 47 Democrats and 2 Republicans voted nay. This was done against the earnest protest of Mr. CARLISLE, the present able Speaker.

SHIP MATERIALS.

On July 23, 1887, when the House had under consideration a bill allowing a rebate on materials imported and used in building ships on foreign account, Mr. Tucker, a distinguished and worthy Democrat, moved to so amend as to allow our own citizens to build or purchase ships in our own ship-yards on equal terms with foreigners. The yeas were 95 and the nays 12. Of the yeas there were 75 Democrats and 20 Republicans. The Republicans refused to vote and made the point of no quorum. On a motion to recommit with instructions to so amend the bill the yeas were 84 and nays 96. Of the yeas there were 78 Democrats and 6 Republicans; nays 95 Republicans and 1 Democrat. And yet we are told that this is the American policy. God save us from such Americanism!

THE TARIFF ACT OF 1883.

On the 27th of June, 1882, the bill passed by a vote of 127 yeas, 79 nays. Of the yeas there were 23 Democrats and 104 Republicans; nays, 71 Democrats and 8 Republicans. In the following session, on the 26th day of February, 1883, after amendments in the Senate under a new rule, Mr. KELLEY moved to suspend the rules and take up the bill and Senate amendments, declare a disagreement, and ask a conference thereon; which was agreed to—yeas 147, nays 111. Of the yeas 135 were Republicans, 12 were Democrats; nays, 102 Democrats and 9 Republicans.

The Speaker appointed Messrs. KELLEY, MCKINLEY, Haskell, CARLISLE, and Speer conferees, the Senate conferees being Messrs. MORRILL, SHERMAN, ALDRICH, McDill, and Mahone. On the 3d of March, 1883, the conference report was concurred in by the Senate, and subsequently was agreed to by the House—yeas 152, nays 122. Of the yeas 132 were Republicans and 20 Democrats; nays, 107 Democrats and 17 Republicans.

TARIFF ON WOOL.

April 7, 1884, Mr. Converse moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill restoring the duty on wool as it was prior to the act of March 3, 1883, but it was not agreed to—yeas 119, nays 126. Of the yeas 84 were Republicans and 35 Democrats; nays, 124 were Democrats and 12 Republicans.

MORRISON TARIFF OF 1884.

April 15, 1884, the House being in the committee on revenue bills, and the tariff bill having been reached, Judge KELLEY objected to its consideration. The House, by a vote of 140 yeas to 138 nays, directed the committee to consider it. Of those voting yea, there were 136 Democrats and 4 Republicans. The enacting clause was stricken out by a vote of 159 yeas to 155 nays. Of the yeas, there were 119 Republicans and 40 Democrats; nays, 152 Democrats and 3 Republicans.

THE MORRISON BILL, 1886.

On the 17th of June, 1886, the motion of Mr. Morrison that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to consider the general tariff bill, was rejected by a vote of 140 yeas to 157 nays. Of the yeas, 136 were Democrats and 4 Republicans; nays, 122 were Republicans and 35 Democrats.

Only four of the Republicans of the House would even vote to consider the demands of the people for a reduction of taxes.

INTERNAL REVENUE—HOUSE.

On the 6th day of June, 1878, Mr. Covert, a Democrat, moved an independent section to the internal-revenue bill then under consideration, to reduce the tax on tobacco from 30 and 40 cents per pound to 20, and certain other reductions as to cigars.

Mr. Tucker, another Democrat, moved to amend by making the tax 16 cents per pound, and the amendment was agreed to by a vote of 126 yeas to 80 nays. Of the yeas there were 108 Democrats and 18 Republicans; nays, 73 Republicans, 7 Democrats. The section as thus amended was adopted—yeas 137, nays 103. The yeas were 120 Democrats and 17 Republicans; the nays were 92 Republicans and 11 Democrats.

On the 28th day of June, 1882, the House passed an internal-revenue bill, reported by a Republican committee, to repeal the stamp tax on bank checks, drafts, orders, and vouchers; the tax on capital and deposits of national banks, matches, perfumery, and patent medicines, which yielded an annual revenue of $16,892,880, nearly all of which was paid by the banks, by a vote of 127 yeas to 79 nays. Of the yeas there were 105 Republicans, 22 Democrats; nays, 69 Democrats and 10 Republicans.

In the Senate, on the 19th day of July, 1882, Senator BECK offered an amendment to the bill then pending, to reduce the tax on manufactured tobacco at 12 cents per pound, and it was adopted by a vote of 29 yeas to 26 nays. The yeas were 27 Democrats and 2 Republicans, and the nays were all Republicans.

Senator BECK moved to strike out "perfumery, medicinal preparations, and other articles," and it was lost by a vote of 26 yeas (Democrats) to 29 nays (Republicans).

Senator VANCE moved to amend by retaining the tax on playing cards, and it was lost by 28 yeas (Democrats) to 29 nays (Republicans).

Senator VEST moved to amend so as to allow farmers to sell their tobacco products, but not to peddle, and it was lost by a vote of 23 yeas, Democrats, to 28 nays, Republicans. On the motion of Senator BECK, the following proviso to the bill was adopted by a vote of 24 yeas, Democrats, to 22 nays, Republicans, and 1 Democrat:

Provided, That farmers and producers of tobacco may sell at the place of production tobacco of their own growth and raising, at retail, directly to the consumer, to an amount not exceeding $100 annually.

INCOME TAX.

The Republicans were swift to repeal this tax soon after the close of the war, although there was a national debt of $2,000,000,000 to be paid. This was done about the same time that the cotton-tax on the Southern cotton-planter was increased from 2 to 3 cents a pound. After the Democrats had elected a majority to the House, in May, 1879, Mr. DIBBLE, a Democrat, and now the able and efficient chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill to restore this tax.

It required two-thirds to suspend the rules, and so the bill failed by the following vote: Yeas 111, nays 94. Of the yeas there were 105 Democrats and 6 Republicans, and of the nays 84 Republicans and 10 Democrats. And thus the wealth-holders escape the burdens that fairly belong to them. And thus the Republican party refused to correct a wrong that it had done the consumers of the country. There was a long list of items in the internal-tax laws, principally upon capital, but they have all been repealed except one important item, whisky, and it has been reduced from $2 a gallon to 90 cents, and a part of the tobacco tax.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to some extracts from the last report of the late able and distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Manning, which, taken altogether, is to my mind one of the clearest and strongest arguments for a tariff reform that it has been my pleasure to read. It deserves a place as a state paper by the side of the celebrated report of Secretary Walker, as far as it treats of the tariff.

The Clerk read:

THINGS HERE CONSUMED; WITH INLAND AND SEAPORT COLLECTORS OF TAXES.

It is indirect taxes only which the Federal Government now levies, and to which, being thus practically restricted by those provisions of the Constitution, it must look for its revenues, and its remissions when revenue outruns expense. It is out of indirect taxes that arise contentions about protection and free trade, as they arose before the war when our debt was little and our expense so small that many thought Congress might have abolished custom-houses, and no harm.

"Free trade" accurately decribes the internal commerce of our States. It applies to the commerce, one with another, of no other great and sovereign States. It does not apply to our trade with foreign nations. No man now living will ever see "free trade" adopted by these United States in their commerce with foreign nations; for taxes on imports, from the foundation of this Government, have ever been one chief source of Federal revenue, and such they will continue to be.

They are taxes upon consumption, like our internal-revenue taxes; and the true ground of choice among articles suitable for taxation is not the circumstance that they are produced at home or imported from abroad, for neither the producer nor the importer finally pays the tax. The consumer pays it. The place of origin is no criterion. The place of collection is no criterion. The place of consumption is where duties as well as excise are paid at last; seaport taxes and inland taxes are alike in cost of collection (3.3 and 3.6 per cent.) and alike in this, that although the importer and distiller advances the tax, he reimburses himself in the price to the consumer, who alone is taxed.

The true ground of choice is that among all articles thus consumed within our own borders some are better suited for an equitable taxation than others. They are universally consumed, like sugar, or easily identified, like coffee, or their consumption may be safely impeded, like distilled spirits or fermented liquors or tobacco, or they are luxuries, like wines, silks, and diamonds. But of these articles suitable for taxation, foreign production afford as many as home production, or more.

Taxes on imports are levied by all nations. Last year England raised a revenue of $95,978,583 from taxes on imports; France, $68,616,325; Germany, $47,557,160. But no foreign nation taxes raw materials. Such taxes injure home industries, in which those materials are worked up and increased in value by home labor. Such taxes on raw materials, instead of excluding foreign competition from the home market, put our own employers of labor at a great disadvantage in the home market and a greater disadvantage in every foreign market compared with the foreigner employing labor upon untaxed raw materials.

"Protection" is also a misnomer. It implies superiority elsewhere. The superiority over any great industry of ours does not exist upon the globe. It implies infants here and adults elsewhere. Such is not our reputation. It implies that amid competition universal, where the fittest survive, we shall perish. But it is everywhere else believed that whenever we shall release ourselves from bad laws and enter that competition unmanacled, rivals will be distanced, and our primacy established in the markets and commerce of the world.

OUR SUICIDAL TAXES ON RAW MATERIALS.

The total value of our domestic exports for the last fiscal year was almost exactly $666,000,000, of which 86 per cent. were the products of our fields, forests, fisheries, and mines, and 16 per cent. only were the sum total of manufactured products in which American labor was inwrought.

In the last quarter of a century progress in telegraphs, transportation, labor-saving inventions, and the mechanic arts has reduced the profits of capital and the rate of interest by more than one-half; has increased the wages of labor throughout the world; has augmented by at least a third the surplus which our manufacturers can produce beyond domestic needs for sale abroad. Prolonging without necessity our war-tariff taxes on raw materials, we have been undersold and excluded from foreign markets by nations not taxing raw materials.

Despite their low-priced inferior labor, and the high percentage of labor-cost therefore included in their product, our taxed raw materials and their free raw materials have protected the so-called "pauper labor" of Europe against American competition. Our increasing capacity to produce an industrial surplusage has been accompanied by war taxation exactly suited to prevent the sale of that surplusage in foreign markets. Out of our actual abundance this war taxation has forged the instrument of our industrial and commercial mutilation.

Defeating our manufacturers in their endeavor to compete abroad with the manufacturers of untaxed raw materials, it has set them on a ferocious competition at cut-throat prices in our own home market, to which they are shut up, and for which their producing powers are increasingly superabundant. Long periods of glut and so-called overproduction have alternated with brief periods of renewed activity and transient prosperity like the present. These prolonged war-tariff taxes, incompetent and brutal as a scheme of revenue, fatal to the extension of our foreign markets, and disorderly to our domestic trade, have in the last resort acted and reacted with most ruinous injury upon our wage-earners.

As the more numerous part of our population, our wage-earners are of course the first, the last, and the most to be affected by injurious laws. Every Government by true statesmen will watchfully regard their condition and interests. If these are satisfactory, nothing else can be of very momentous importance; but our so-called protective statesmanship has disfavored them altogether. Encumbering with clumsy help a few thousand employers, it has trodden down the millions of wage-earners. It has for twenty-one years denied them.

MORE INCOME FOR WAGE-EARNERS BY DROPPING WORST TAXES.

The taxes to be first remitted are those which prevent or hinder the sale of our surplus products in foreign markets. Their removal will set capital in motion by the promise of better returns, enlarge the steady employment and increase the annual income of many thousand wages-earners, whose prosperity will diffuse prosperity. These taxes are the duties on raw materials, and the most widely injurious of them is the tax upon raw wool.

But the income of all the wage-earners in the United States can be at once enlarged effectively, certainly permanently, by reducing the cost to them of the great necessities of life. Our war-tariff taxes increase needlessly the cost of clothing, shelter, food, to every family. Every wage-earner's expense, every tax-payer's expense, for the clothing of himself and his family is nearly doubled, at least in the Northern, Middle, and Western States, by taxation which can now be remitted, yet leave the Treasury a sufficient revenue.

The duty on raw wool procured for the Treasury last year only $5,126,108. The cost of woolen clothing for our 59,000,000 people was thereby and otherwise enhanced many times more than 90 cents a head, the only cost of our $51,778,948 revenue from sugar. Moreover, any tax on raw wool imported will always make domestic wool-raising a bad business, for in our dry climate some varieties of wool required by the manufacturer are not produced. The tax prevents our manufacturers from competing in foreign markets with all manufacturers who can buy untaxed wool.

The tax prevents our manufacture and export of competing woolens that require the use or admixture of non-American wools, and so restricts the home demand and the growth of the home demand for domestic wool, thus making the export of our domestic woolens impossible, yet involving the enhanced price of foreign and domestic woolens. This petty tax of $5,126,108 on raw wool assists in nearly doubling the actual cost of their clothing to the American people, with no real and no incidental benefit to anybody except the foreign manufacturer.

UNTAX THE CLOTHING OF SIXTY MILLION PEOPLE.

I respectfully recommend to Congress that they confer upon the wage-earners of the United States the boon of untaxed clothing, and in order thereto, the immediate passage of an act simply and solely placing raw wool upon the free-list.

Mr. MCRAE. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us examine this question from the farmer's standpoint and see if the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] is correct in the theory that he has advanced when he says it is a benefit to them. Until within the last century little improvement was made in agriculture. When the United States declared their independence they stood at the foot of the list of nations in point of agricultural products; but now they lead the world in this as well as almost everything else, and yet less than 20 per cent. of the total area of the land has been improved.

For many centuries prior to the establishment of our Government there was little or no advancement; no thought had been given to either the preservation or improvement of the soil, and but little improvements had been made in farming implements. There were no planters, reapers, or thrashers in use then. For the latter our ancestors used what Burns called the "the thrasher's waery flingin' tree." No care had been given to the breeding and improvement of stock. It is said that the average size of sheep, hogs, and cattle has more than doubled within the last century, and yet our greatest triumph in this industry in the United States is in the numerical increase, as shown by the estimate of the Commissioner of Agriculture for last year which I now call attention to:

Number and value of farm animals January 1, 1888, as estimated by the Department of Agriculture.

Stock.	Number.	Value.
Horses	13,172,936	$946,096,154
Mules	2,191,727	174,853,563
Milch cows	14,856,414	366,252,173
Oxen and other cattle	34,378,363	611,750,520
Sheep	43,544,755	89,279,926
Swine	44,346,525	220,811,082

Quantities of certain agricultural products of the United States, as estimated by the Department of Agriculture, for the year 1887, and for certain products for 1886.

J. R. DODGE, Statistician.

Now, let us compare the quantity of our grain products with other nations if we wish a clear understanding of them. Here is the showing:

Under grain—	Acres.	Worth.
The United States have	118,000,000	$2,698,000,000
Russia has	158,000,000	1,585,000,000
Germany has	43,000,000	990,000,000
France has	40,000,000	840,000,000

Russia, with 40,000,000 acres more of land in grain, produces but little more than one-half as much in volume as we do. The United States produce about one-third of the cereals of the entire world. This in a large measure is due to the use of improved machinery and farm implements, the absence of any law of primogeniture or entail, and to the fact that the farms are worked largely by the owners, who, while enjoying their freedom, rely upon their own energies and do not look to the Government for aid or bounty. Of the four million farms in the United States in 1880, nearly three million of them were cultivated by their owners, and while the acreage and the number of farms are rapidly increasing, it is gratifying to notice that the average size of the farms has decreased from 203 acres in 1850 to 134 acres in 1880. Our country is secure as long as the lands are divided in small holdings and cultivated by those who own them. At this rate there is little danger of a monopoly of the lands in this country.

I call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] to this fact in answer to the statement he made a few moments ago, to the effect that the wealth in the South is in the hands of the few. His statement is not correct as to any part of the South. In my own State, Arkansas, purely agricultural, the average size of the farms was in 1860, 245 acres; in 1870 the average was reduced to 154; while in 1880 it was only 128 acres, less than what the United States gives for a homestead.

The above exhibit of live stock and farm products is a remarkable showing when taken as a whole, but more remarkable when considered with reference to cotton, the growth of ten Southern States. In 1784, or about that time, when a duty was proposed in the United States Congress on the imports of foreign cotton, it was declared by one of the representatives from South Carolina that the cultivation of cotton was in contemplation by the planters of his State and Georgia, and he thought if good seed could be procured it might succeed. The cotton dealers and manufacturers of Liverpool thought it impossible to grow cotton in this country, and yet in the face of these opinions, within less than one century, these ten States have learned to grow enough for sixty millions of our people, and have four millions and a half bales for export, which is largely shipped to England.

When we remember that this vast increase in the yield of the fleecy staple comes from the States so recently laid waste by the war of the rebellion it ought to be sufficient to make all of us proud alike of the traditions of the old South and the pluck and industry of the new. Many of us have but little idea of the desolation that followed peace in this beloved country. The impoverished condition of the South after the war was a few years ago so truthfully and eloquently described by Kentucky's eloquent Representative [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] that I shall borrow his language in undertaking to give you some idea of it:

> The poverty of the Southern States at the close of the war was appalling; the desolation beyond description. Every form of accumulated capital had been swept away, every corporate institution hopelessly bankrupt, every State deeply in debt, and the amount of private indebtedness beyond all hope of payment.
> A beggared people indeed were they. Fences all gone, work-stock nearly so, fields in briars, many houses burnt, no money, no credit, no provisions, no implements of industry, not even seed for harvest. The negro free; the white adult a paroled soldier or an aged man, frequently a disabled and wounded man; and in many families only widows, orphan maidens, and fatherless children; without political privileges, and with the prospect of a chaotic and harsh period of unstable and doubtful rule; the States without recognized governments, and the relations of the races, of the citizens, and of the States to the Federal Government in grave dispute and doubt. It was indeed a sad and desolate picture.
> But all was not lost; far from it. God, the future, and manhood remained, and these contain all the possibilities of success.
> There was no alternative left to that people but a stern and resolute struggle for bread, and then for the recovery of political liberty. The war had legislated—it had in a new sense made one the United States; in the destiny of the nation was involved the destiny of every section and all citizens; one country, one flag, one destiny was the fiat of this tribunal, and the future of the South was indissolubly interwoven with that of the Union.
>
> In that Union, under that Government, however modified by the events of those years, must these Southern States work out their restoration. Within the limitations imposed by that Government, and by their actual condition, must they make their recovery. Without repining, with no unmanly cringing, no pretense of repentance or remorse—ay, proud of their dead comrades and conscious of their own rectitude and heroism, they turned their faces to the future, put their trust anew in God, and went to work.
> It was a pathetic but glorious spectacle, that conquered and beggared people, amid the ruins of their States and the destruction of their hopes, surrounded by the graves of their beloved slain, and in the depths of poverty, intensely at work for daily bread, and resolutely set on doing the best possible under the circumstances encompassing them. The privations, the suffering, the toil of those slow, sad, harsh years when "the bottom rail was on top," and the whole world seemed to have turned from them, need not now be recalled. Let them pass into history.

And notwithstanding this condition, which was at the time known to all, taxation from that day to this has continued to fasten its fangs closer and tighter on this people. If I will be allowed to quote the language of one of our poets I would say of the tariff as applied to the South that—

> It seats itself upon the sepulchre,
> And of the triumphs of its ghastly foe
> Makes its own nourishment.

Coming back, Mr. Chairman, to the facts and figures, we will find much food for reflection if they are considered in the light of the further fact that there is no prospect that the Old World will either be able to extend her territory or improve to any considerable extent the fertility of her soil. Her population is increasing more rapidly than it has for centuries past. She imports about one-third of her food products at present, and this will continue to increase as the population does. She looks to this country for supplies. Through our wise homestead law our Government is increasing our ability to grow and furnish the products by the improvement of about 10,000,000 acres of land per annum. With our vast undeveloped territory and our excellent land system, under a free form of government, the farmers of America will be able to meet any draft that is likely to be drawn upon them for meat and bread at any time within the next century if they are dealt fairly with in the matter of taxation.

But, Mr. Chairman, in the face of the enormous increase in the quantity of the productions of our farms, it appears from the census reports that the rate of increase in value from 1870 to 1880 was less than 10 per cent., while the important manufacturing States for the same time increased their wealth nearly 200 per cent. The planters in 1880 owned one-half the wealth of the country. They owned in 1880 only one-fourth, and yet the total wealth has nearly doubled in this time. This is not the result of misfortune, accident, drought, or want of economy or industry on the part of the people, because I have shown that they have produced the quantity of products.

The half not invested in farms was increased more than twenty billions in value, while the half owned by farmers only increased four billions. Those not engaged in farming made $5, where those who were made 1, as shown by their investment. As 75 per cent. of all exports from the United States are agricultural products, we can safely assume that the profits of the farmers were made off of those to whom they sold the exports, people of foreign countries, and represented so much money brought into the country. Not so with the manufacturer. Under the present policy of the Government he manufactured for home consumption. The consumers of America bought American goods because they could get no others as a rule.

The manufacturer has become rich, while the consumer, if a farmer, has barely saved what he started with. Does any one find any difficulty in telling whose money made the manufacturer rich? It does not satisfy the farmer to tell him that the money was kept in our own country when he sees that his reasonable profits have by some sort of legerdemain been lost to him and pocketed by others. The policy of protection has the effect of centralizing the wealth of the country in the hands of the favored few, while it impoverishes the great body of the producers, and makes them dissatisfied. It encourages waste and extravagance on the part of those who are made rich, and has a bad effect upon the people generally.

I am not one of those who would make Congress and the Legislature responsible for all the evils that befall man; neither do I think legislation the remedy for many of the troubles of the present times. I believe that there is such a thing as too much legislation. I sometimes think that we have too many laws and are too much governed. But when, as in this case, if I am correct, the trouble is caused by an existing law, the only remedy is either to modify it or repeal it. That freedom of trade necessary to enable the farmer to get full value for his products is at present too much restricted. We must "turn from this constant introspection to the nations of the earth; down with the walls, out to the sea" if we expect to grow and become a rich and prosperous people.

Mr. Turner, of Kentucky, in the Forty-seventh Congress, gave a very graphic portrayal of the unreasonable details of the tariff as illustrated in the every-day experience of the farmer. I quote the following from his speech:

Here is a statement showing a few of the burdens of the farmer: Under this tariff he rises in the morning, puts on his common flannel shirt taxed 95 per cent.; his coat taxed 57 per cent.; shoes taxed 35 per cent.; and hat taxed 92 per cent.; takes the water from a bucket taxed 35 per cent., and washes his face and hands in a tin bowl taxed 35 per cent.; dries them on a cheap cotton towel taxed 45 per cent.

He sits down to his humble meal and eats from a plate taxed 50 per cent., with knife and fork taxed 35 per cent.; drinks his coffee with sugar taxed 68 per cent., seasons his food with salt taxed 69 per cent., pepper taxed 61 per cent. He looks around on his wife and children, all taxed in the same way; takes a chew of tobacco taxed 199 per cent., or lights a cigar taxed 118 per cent. And, sir, even the sunlight from heaven that pours into his humble dwelling must come through window-glass taxed 59 per cent.; and yet he thinks he lives in the freest government under heaven.

Then he starts to work, puts a bridle taxed 35 per cent. on his horse, and takes his horse that has been shod—the nails used in shoeing being taxed 59 per cent., driven by a hammer taxed 20 per cent.—and hitches him to a plow taxed 45 per cent., with chains taxed 58 per cent.; and after the day's labor is closed and his family are all gathered around he reads a chapter from his Bible taxed 25 per cent., and kneels to God on an humble carpet taxed 51 per cent.; and then he rests his weary limbs on a sheet taxed 45 per cent., and covers himself with a blanket that has paid 104 per cent.

Nor do these grasping manufacturers stop here, but even the broom with which his good wife sweeps the floor is taxed 35 per cent., and the cooking vessels used in preparing her husband's frugal meal are taxed 42 per cent., and the soda used to lighten his bread taxed 59 per cent. She sits down to her sewing with a needle taxed 25 per cent. and a spool of thread taxed 74 per cent., to make a calico dress taxed 58 per cent.; or if she wishes to knit warm socks, to protect her husband and children from the bitter cold, she uses yarn taxed 120 per cent.; and thus daily and hourly must the hard earnings of the laborer go to satisfy the manufacturer and add to his ill-gotten wealth.

In this country a protective tariff means the fostering, by indirect bounties, of mines and manufacturers, and no one else. The consumers who must suffer for this are agriculturists, mechanics, business men, and professional people, who constitute about nine-tenths of our population. The farmers and farm laborers are the principal sufferers. And yet, when their representatives on this floor speak for them, they are told, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] in effect, that farmers have no rights here and no business enterprise, because they have no manufacturing industries. They tell us that we must diversify and stop producing so much.

If the farmers reduce their crops, then to that extent exportation is decreased. Is that what we desire as a nation? Certainly not. The remedy is not in the direction of less work and smaller crops, but in legislation that will give them the right to sell what they raise where they can get the best price, and to purchase what they want and need for the least money, subject to the right of the Government to lay a just and equal tax for the expenses of Government.

We have heard a great deal in this debate about a home market for the farmer. My friend from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] on yesterday very effectually punctured this humbug that the protectionists attempt to palm off on the farmer, but as further illustrating the absurdity of it I make the following quotation from Col. Donn Piatt:

OVERPRODUCTION MEANS UNDERCONSUMPTION.

If for overproduction we read underconsumption we shall be nearer the fact. However, for half a century we have been waiting for two things; one is the time when the infant industries will come of age and be able to stand alone; the other for that home market. We are no nearer either than when we began.

THE SWALLOW OF A HOME MARKET.

Way back in 1848 the writer of this was driven to a little calculation, since widely used, but which is ludicrously unanswerable. A home market means, ofcourse, a consumption of what the farmer and planter have to sell. Very good. Now take from the census the class really protected. From this exclude farmers, merchants, mechanics, laborers, other than of mines and manufactures, and professional people—for they are not protected, nor are they dependent directly or indirectly on mines or manufactures.

Come down strictly to the people in whose behalf the Government interferes. Now select five leading States from the North and South and put to paper their surplus. It will be found that for the protected class to consume that surplus each man, woman, and child will have to eat each day twenty barrels of flour, masticate three hundred bushels of corn, get down twenty hogs, ten beef cattle, chew a hogshead of tobacco, and wear forty suits of woolen and cotton goods. The swallowing capacity of a protectionist is vast, but I hardly think it would accomplish this.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this shows, although in a ludicrous manner, the absurdity of the claim that is made by our friends on the other side of this Chamber, that we now have or can ever have a home market sufficient for the sale of our farm products. It will never be unless we take about one-third of our young farmers and organize a large standing army, who will have nothing to do except to consume our surplus products. Such a proposition would hardly get a single vote in this House. The tariff does give the farmer a market in which to buy his manufactured goods at prices made artificially high by reason of it, and in giving even this it restricts him to it. That is all there is in it. The farmer wants no such market, and wants to be protected against such protection.

On another occasion Colonel Piatt in a more serious manner showed that while the tariff did not and could not help but really injured the farmer, it left him to compete with the lowest paid and worst form of labor. Here is what he said:

BUYING UNDER PROTECTION AND SELLING UNDER FREE TRADE.

You see we sell under free trade, and are left to the mercy of the worst form of pauper labor.

What is our condition when we come to purchase? Why, we are met with protection. All that we buy, from a horseshoe to a mower, all that we wear, all that we build for shelter, all that we use over and above our products, from the cradle we are rocked in to the coffin we rot in—the clothes we wear, the shingle that shuts off the storm, the glass we look through, the blanket we sleep under, to the tombstone that records our supposed virtues, are augmented in price to double their value, so that we sell under free trade and buy under protection.

Now, do you wonder that we work at a disadvantage? If protection is such a good thing, we want it; if free trade is such an evil, we don't want it; and yet we have the one and not the other; we get what we don't want and are denied what we do want, and it is the most barefaced, impudent swindle ever perpetrated on an intelligent people. There is precisely where insult is heaped on injury. We are considered so ignorant and stupid that we may be plundered with impunity. [A voice. They'll slip up on that.] I hope so. [A voice. How about wool, colonel?] Let me tell you. They pretend to protect us on wool. Well, we have lost more on our protected shears than we ever made on our protected wool. If the Government will give us free lumber, free salt, cease its protection to the barbed-wire monopoly, and see that I am charged a reasonable rate for transportation on these public highways, called railroads, I will undertake to undersell at a profit any wool grown in any other part of the earth than that of these United States. [Applause.]

What happens to us in Europe? At Liverpool our wheat comes in competition with the wheat of the Baltic, where the laborer works at $18 a year and a goat-skin coat; with the wheat of Egypt, that is to-day the house of bondage, having slavery in its worst form; with the wheat of India, where labor is in as bad a condition; and worse yet, of Australia, where the shipper takes manufactured articles back home in payment—an exchange denied us by law.

And, Mr. Chairman, what he said about wheat may be said as to cotton and live-stock, and these are the principal items of exports from our farms. In fact, they constitute the great bulk of our exports. Our exports of manufactured cotton goods, with high tariff, and our own cotton was less in 1880 than in 1860.

WAGES.

Another fraudulent pretense by which the votes of some laboring men have been secured to the Republican party is the claim that a high tariff makes high wages, when in fact there is absolutely no connection between the tariff and the price of labor. Wages are subject to the law of supply and demand; but, if they were not, and protection did increase them, it would only benefit the few who are engaged in mining and manufacturing, and not the farm hands and mechanics of the South and West.

I think the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] have demonstrated very clearly that it does not and can not in any way affect wages. I quote the following from Mr. MILLS on this point:

It is said a high tariff makes high wages for labor. It is said if we reduce the tariff wages must be reduced. How is it high tariff makes high wages for labor? How can it be explained? Why, they say, as a matter of course, if you increase the value of the domestic product, the manufacturer is able to pay higher wages. Unquestionably he is, but does he do it? No. Mr. Jay Gould, with his immense income from his railroad property, is able to pay his bootblack $500 a day, but does he do it? Oh, no; he pays the market price of the street. He gets his boots blacked and pays his nickel like a little man. [Laughter.]

Mr. Vanderbilt, from the income arising from the interest on the immense amount of bonds of the Federal Government he has got, can afford to pay his hostler $10,000 a year. He is able to do it; his bonds enable him to do it, but does he do it? Oh, no; he goes out into the market and employs his labor at the market value, and pays the same price that the humblest citizen in New York does.

High tariff does not regulate wages. Wages are regulated by demand and supply and the capacity of the laborer to do the work for which he is employed. If high tariff regulated wages, how is it the wages in the different States of the Union are different while the tariff is all the same from Maine to California? In every part of the territory of the United States the tariff is the same. How is it the wages are not the same? How is it that wages in the different localities in the different States are different? What is the cause? What is it which disturbs the tariff and prevents it from fixing a high rate of wages all over the country for labor?

My able, eloquent, and genial friend from New York [Mr. COX], in a speech in 1884, proved by official figures from the census of 1880 that the average wages paid by the manufacturing industries were only $1.16 a day for three hundred days in the year, while the average profits of the manufacturer were 36 per cent. of the capital. He also proved, what is still true, that by reason of the tariff the purchasing power of wages was reduced 40 per cent.

Our Republican friends must presume a great deal on the credulity of the farmers of this country when they ask them to accept as true the declarations made here that protection cheapens the price of manufactured goods and at the same time furnishes a ready market for and increases the price of farm products. The farmer at once asks what manner of man can the manufacturer be that he wants to maintain a system that reduces the price of what he manufactures for sale and increases the cost of products he must buy. At the same time they tell the laborers that it enables them to get higher wages. So, in short they ask us to believe that protection gives the farmer a ready market and high prices for what he grows, the consumer of manufactured goods a cheap market for all he wants, and the laborer the highest wages for his work. It would appear from this that protection is a very good thing for everybody except the manufacturer, and yet he is the only one who wants protection. "Oh! what fools we mortals are."

Mr. Chairman, I want some protectionist who asserts that protection increases wages to tell me now and here why it is that the railroads of the country, with no protection, can and do pay on an average higher wages than the protected industries? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] produced receipts to show that laborers in the Edgar Thomson steel works in that State received less than others by the side of these works with no protection. Of course the tariff on iron and steel is the same all over the United States and yet the census shows that the wages in this industry to skilled labor ranged from $1.25 to $4 per day, and that the greatest advancement was made in the sections where the highest wages were paid.

I want some one who is clamoring for protection to our labor against the so-called "pauper labor" of Europe to explain to the country why it is that our imports are principally from Great Britain, where the wages are much higher than any of the other European countries? We import nearly $200,000,000 worth of goods from England and less than one-tenth of that much from Austria, where labor is much cheaper. We need have no fear of the cheap labor. It is the independent, well-paid labor that we must compete with.

If protection is necessary to manufacturing industries, how can England without it export more of manufactured goods than all the balance of the Old World with it? Until these questions are answered I shall not admit that the passage of the pending bill will do anything more than to destroy the monopolies and trusts that have come as the natural outgrowth of protection and a restricted trade. To break these is what I want, above everything else. This bill will injure no industry that naturally and properly belongs with us, and we want no fosterlings.

Frequent reference has been made in this debate to what has been called the free-trade act of 1846, and it has been made to serve both sides. Democrats have ascribed the greatest prosperity to it; Republicans have reversed the inference and charged depression to this and all other periods under low tariff. It will be remembered that England repealed the corn laws that same year. Now let us see how our commerce increased.

Our exports of pork, flour, and corn, to say nothing of cotton, were increased about $30,000,000 worth, and immediately the prices here were almost doubled. The English statistics show that in 1846 there were consumed there per capita only about forty pounds of flour, and that in 1884, the last year that I have been able to get statistics for, this had increased to nearly 200 pounds. In the same time the consumption of other food products that we send her has increased about in the same proportion. This shows what trade between nations does. Why should we be afraid to trade with any nation? In point of physical strength and material greatness we lead them all.

But least of all should we turn from Old England, from whose people we draw our blood and whose language we speak. Linked to her by a submarine cable, we should cultivate the most intimate commercial relations. She wants our products and is bound to have some of them, but will take much more if we will take pay in trade. There is no farmer who does not understand how much easier it is to sell his little produce to his merchant if he will "take it in trade" than to sell for cash. The principle applies to nations as well as individuals.

Mr. Chairman, it was altogether unnecessary for the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] to trouble himself to show by comparison and boast of the difference in the wealth of his own grand State and the poor but proud Southern States. He might have accepted that as admitted by this side of the House. The important and paramount question with us is how it happens to be so. He says the protective tariff made Pennsylvania rich. We say that protection has kept the South poor. Because it makes one class in one section rich and another class in another section poor is why we oppose it. We know that our people are as industrious and as economical as the people of Pennsylvania, our soil is as fertile.

While we do not ask any aid or bounty, we do ask justice and fair treatment in the matter of taxation. Give us this, and as far as Arkansas is concerned she will challenge Pennsylvania to a nobler rivalry in the contest for future glory. Pass this bill and commence the race on equal terms. Give Arkansas those "unfettered hands" of which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] spoke so eloquently, and she will indeed "march to grander industrial triumphs." Since the gentleman has made this unjust comparison, I will make a comparison of the condition of the farmers, and the manufacturers of Pennsylvania, and see what protection does for her own people. Each person engaged in farming there has on an average a capital of $3,637, and the labor of each person so employed with the said sums invested realizes annually $431.

Each person engaged in manufacturing in that State has a capital of $1,250 invested and realizes $719. The Pennsylvania farmer works all the year with an investment of $3,637 for $431. The manufacturer, with a capital of only $1,250, realizes $719. With about one-third of the money he makes twice the profits. As our State is strictly agricultural our people get about the same results. There is nothing in the system except loss to the farmer, locate him where you may.

Now, in conclusion, I wish to say this question is in the politics of this country to stay until a reduction is made. There is no possible way to suppress it. The cry of English free trade, Confederate constitution, Cobden Club, will avail nothing. We have reached a point in our history when the fomenting of sectional strife will not win party victories. About two-thirds of the voters now in the Southern States, as well as elsewhere, had nothing to do with the late war and take but little notice of references to it.

As a representative in part of that element and a native of the South, I will say in this connection to those of our Republican friends who have so frequently applied the epithet "rebels" to our people, that it has no terror for them. They are proud of the South and its history, but are prouder still of our common country, and are interested in making it all that our fathers intended it should be. That people who, like yourselves, were born of rebellion and draw their blood and date their birth from the rebel sires of '76, are not ashamed to be called rebels. It is the nature of Americans to rebel against wrong, and I would remind our protection friends that our first great rebellion was against unjust taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I approach the discussion of the question before the House with reluctance and diffidence. The debate has already been so protracted as to weary the House and, perhaps, also the country. There is no possible phase of the subject which has not been presented much better than it is possible for me to present it. Yet, as a member of this body, representing a large and interested constituency, it is meet that I give expression to the reasons which move me to oppose the pending measure.

The people must pay the expense of operating the Government and all the national obligations. For these purposes they are necessarily subjected to taxation. To this no good citizen objects. Good citizens, however, disagree as to methods of imposing that tax.

The policy of the Government from the beginning has been to raise the needed revenues by indirect rather than by direct taxation. Both are admittedly authorized by the Constitution. We have always, and often almost exclusively, employed the indirect system; that is, to raise our revenue chiefly by levying duties upon foreign merchandise. The importer of such merchandise is required to pay such duties at the custom-house. Such duties so collected go into the Treasury to meet the current expenses of the Government and pay our national obligations. Whatever of this burden is borne by the citizen is voluntarily borne. He is at liberty to buy or not to buy any part of such foreign goods. If he does he will bear the burden in whole or in part of the duty paid upon the article he purchases. Such may be the home competition, however, that the burden in whole or in part falls upon the foreign producer and not upon the consumer. To that extent, whatever it may be, the foreign producer is made to share our public burden in return for access to our markets.

Duties may be levied, first, for revenue merely; second, for revenue with incidental protection; third, for revenue and protection.

For revenue merely is to levy them on such foreign products as are not produced in this country at all.

The theory of the advocates of this plan is that a duty levied on such foreign products as are produced here operates to raise the price of the home product by the amount of the duty on the foreign product, and that such increase upon the home product goes into the pockets of the manufacturer; but when levied upon such foreign goods as are not produced here at all, though the cost of the article is increased by the amount of the tax, still the whole of such increased cost paid by the consumer goes into the Treasury.

If levied for revenue with incidental protection a uniform ad valorem duty may be imposed upon all imports sufficient to raise the needed amount of revenue, say 20 per cent., and if this shall operate to aid the development of any home industry, such result is merely incidental, and no part of the purpose for which such duty was levied.

If levied with a view to protection, the duty is imposed upon foreign products sufficient to yield the needed amount of revenue, but is laid upon such foreign goods as are produced at home and with the purpose of placing our own producers upon a plane of equal competition with foreign producers in our own markets.

The advocates of the measure before the House, while declaring that it does not seriously impair the protective system, almost without exception denounce protection as the sum of all villainies, and maintain with great zeal and energy that the highest possible good can only be secured to the people by unrestricted commerce with our sister nations.

We are to conclude, therefore, that the bill approximates that policy as nearly as its authors and advocates found it to be practicable.

If the measure here and there preserves the protective principle, we may reasonably infer that it is a necessary concession to secure the votes of gentlemen who can not safely ignore the industrial interests in their districts. Such are dangerous nurses to be intrusted with infant industries even of their own districts. They are the enemies of protection, but their political life depends upon the concessions referred to.

The zeal, vigor, enthusiasm, ability, sophistry, and eloquence with which all of them assail protection, and the warmth with which they advocate unrestricted trade with all the nations of the earth, make it clear that their ultimate object is free trade.

Free trade repeals all customs laws, closes all custom-houses, and opens our ports to the same freedom of commercial intercourse as now exists among the several States. This means direct taxation to raise the revenues now derived from custom duties. This revenue must then come from taxes levied similar to the method of State taxation for State, municipal, school, and other purposes. About one-fourth would be borne by personal property, and the other three-fourths by real property. The farms and farmers would carry the load. Added to the local taxation the Federal burden would be crushing. The people would not submit to it. The farmers could not endure the oppression.

But the pending measure, subject to such necessary concessions as I have already referred to, is presumably framed with reference to revenue exclusively.

Just who the author of it is does not seem to be of much moment. For the present it is anonymous. It is the pet, though not born of the White House. It is not just the creature the President was yearning for in his message. It is too much of a cross with hated breeds for that; yet it is sent forth as the fetich of the power that reigns at the other end of the avenue. It is to be "honored and obeyed" until one of the full blood shall take its place. "Let it be enthroned" is the "fiat" from the reigning dynasty.

You gentlemen on the other side who do not heed, beware! My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] refuses allegiance, and is pursued with the envenomed fury of offended royalty. "Down with the traitor" comes from the imperial master; "Down with the traitor" echo the organs; and, in the name of civil-service reform, a thousand paid emissaries hunt through the hills and valleys of the old Keystone State, panting for his scalp in their eagerness to hang it upon their master's belt to prove their devotion. [Applause.]

And there is my other friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN]. Oh, rebellious SOWDEN, the Allentown building has gone the way of the disloyal. Look well, my friend; look well to your fortress. Hear you not the organ! Listen:

> The Democratic party has now reached a point where it can not afford to tolerate infidelity to the Democratic creed. And least of all things can it afford to have the Democratic Administration feeding at the public crib men who work in the vineyard of the enemy.
> President Cleveland's tariff message is his platform for the Presidential campaign. He is responsible for the fact that loyalty to him and his party is inconsistent with a refusal of loyal support to the pending bill.

And again the organ:

> Monte Cristo Cleveland after the Sowden-Allentown veto. "one."
> The others are quite handy, Mr. President—all within easy striking distance—McADOO, FORAN, and all their jolly fellowship. Strike again, Mr. President, and strike hard. McADOO will make a beautiful No. 2.

The whole royal pack are to be turned loose upon the gallant young statesman from New Jersey. Behold his imperial highness as he points the gentlemen from New Jersey to the alternatives: "There is my service; there is the guillotine. Take your choice." [Applause.] May the good Lord shield my young friend.

Was there ever such another petty tyranny? Were ever the powers of the Executive before prostituted to such base purposes? Was ever official patronage so perverted? But pardon the digression.

The revenues for the next fiscal year can be approximately but not accurately estimated. When our people are prosperous they consume more of foreign products; this increases importations and augments the revenues. When there is a general depression among our people they buy less of foreign products; this decreases importations and diminishes the revenues. Hence the revenues will be greater or less according to the degree of prosperity among the people.

It is, however, estimated that the revenues during the next year will exceed the expenditures about $80,000,000. Let it be borne in mind, however, that this estimate contemplates no increase of expenditure for the construction of a navy, no increase of expenditure for coast defense. It is well known that a foreign foe could now put our great seacoast cities under tribute in twelve hours and compel them to hand over to the enemy more money than any foreign war is likely to cost. That estimate does not contemplate any increase in the expenditures for the relief of the country's defenders.

Justice should be done to the men who periled all on the country's battle-fields, and thereby made it possible for the stars and stripes to float over the Capitol. But for them the same flag would long since have been buried in the ruins of the Republic. Even under the present inadequate pension laws the roll is getting larger year by year. For the current year we have been called upon to supply a deficiency of three and one-half millions of dollars.

Robbed of bounties you pledged them by law—robbed by gross misinterpretation of law—they ask for reparation. They ask the equalization of the bounties, a measure absolutely just.

I have, Congress after Congress, introduced such a measure, but it has never found its way back from the committee room.

I have as often introduced a bill to remove the limitation from the arrears act, and although the committee has at least in two recent Congresses and again this session reported the bill back, recommending its passage, the fiat as often went forth that it must die on the Calendar.

Twenty thousand brave men, many of whom fought on nearly every battle-field of the war, have been overtaken by physical and financial misfortunes, some of whom have been obliged to drag their suffering bodies over the hill to the poor-house; others lie suffering in the arms of private charity.

We passed last Congress a bill for their relief. A veto struck it down and hideously illustrated a nation's ingratitude.

Another one is now on the Calendar, offering, not justice, no, but a mean, ungrateful, and niggardly relief. Will you pass it? We shall see.

Beyond all this the time ought to be near at hand when we should provide a general service-pension law.

And still another thing:

Is it proposed to keep the American people forever under the yoke of the bondholder?

In 1891, only three years hence, $230,000,000 of bonds bearing 4½ per cent. interest will be payable. Do you propose to extend them for another series of years, and continue to filch labor to pay coupons?

Only a few years thereafter $730,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds will mature. Is it to be the policy of the Government to put them in process of extinguishment, or shall we extend them indefinitely that the slavery of labor to the bondholder may be interminable.

The national banks, it is true, may perpetuate their circulation by such indefinite extension of the 4½ per cent. bonds payable three years hence, but national-bank circulation is by no means a public necessity. We can easily replace it by the substitution of greenbacks or coin certificates.

What will be the surplus if these great objects are properly provided for? How much can you reduce the revenues if you contemplate just provision for them? Are they not all worthy of patriotic consideration?

Sir, I am utterly opposed to any such sweeping reduction of the revenues as ignores all these important measures. I am unwilling to so wreck the finances of the Government as to make it impossible to discharge that highest of all national obligations—those, legal and equitable, due to the survivors of the war for the Union; and yet that is exactly the effect of the President's policy.

Who is here protesting that our Federal taxation is oppressive? Is labor here on bended knees asking for this legislation? No; it is protesting against it. Do the manufacturers want it? No; under the influence of its menace they see their business languishing. Do the farmers want it? No; they see in it inevitable destruction to a market that has taken up more than nine-tenths of their surplus products. Who does want it? England. Who else? The importers and jobbers. Who else? Wall street, the bondholders, and the national banks. Who else? Those who would degrade American labor, pauperize it and drive its children from the school-house to the mine and the workshop, and make this, like England, a government of classes. Who else? Politicians in search of a slogan to meet a party exigency. [Applause.]

But the President tells us that the accumulated surplus in the Treasury at the end of this fiscal year will reach the sum of $140,000,000; of which sum about $30,000,000 is the surplus of the last fiscal year.

To suffer that to continue is fatal to all the business interests of the country. Such increasing surplus must sooner or later paralyze all sources of employment, drive labor from the workshops to the streets, shrink values, transfer the property of the poor into the hands of the rich, and wreck the nation in a universal panic.

Yet this is the feast which the President has been deliberately preparing for the American people. He deliberately refused to pay out the surplus in the purchase of our bonded obligations, though Congress had provided by law (the act of 1881) ample authority for that purpose. He chose rather to lock it up and withhold it from the channels of business and thereby push the country to the verge of bankruptcy, that the people might be forced to accept escape from impending ruin by his policy of destruction of the protective system, under which we have in a quarter of a century passed every nation on earth in industrial growth and in national and individual prosperity.

Such a daring assault upon the public welfare the President seemed to realize must be made to appear unavoidable. Absence of lawful authority alone could justify him. Hence he tells us that he doubted the sufficiency of the law, because it was in a general appropriation act. The pretext was frivolous.

In all the discussion of the subject in both Houses no lawyer was found to express such a doubt. All knew there was no room for doubt. If his position was tenable there is no limitation to the arrears-of-pension law; there is no law authorizing the organization of the consular and diplomatic service; there is no law authorizing the organization of the Treasury Department; there is no law authorizing the mails to be carried by the railways; there is no law authorizing unexpended appropriations to be covered into the Treasury; there is no law authorizing 2-cent postage; there is no law authorizing 1-ounce letters to be carried for 2 cents; there is no law authorizing the Interior Department to contract for Indian supplies; there is no law fixing the strength of the Army at 25,000; there is no law fixing the strength of the Navy at 8,250; there is no law to prohibit payment to land-grant railroads of more than 50 per cent. of their earnings from the Government; there is no law for the classification of mail matter and payment of postmasters; there is no law for the existence of the Geological Survey; there is no law for a commission to supervise the selection of juries in the United States courts; there is no law to limit authority to expedite the mail service to prevent a repetition of Star route swindles; and, finally, there is no law authorizing the salary of the President at $50,000 per annum. [Applause.] All these provisions of law are to be found in general appropriation acts.

It will be difficult to recall a more groundless or illogical pretext for so audacious a violation of public duty. But the emergency is upon us. It will not stay the conflagration to discuss whether or not it was the act of an incendiary. It is the duty of patriotism to avert impending dangers. There must be something done to stop this hoarding in the Treasury of the very life-blood of business. There is to be left but one practicable method of relief, and that is by a reduction of revenue. How shall that be done? Shall we take it chiefly off internal taxes, or shall it be taken chiefly off foreign importations in such a way as to seriously impair our manufactures, reduce American wages, and prejudice agriculture?

Such is the alternative. For myself, I find no difficulty in determining where my duty lies. With such an alternative, let the reduction come chiefly from internal taxation. This will afford direct relief alike to agriculture and to manufactures, but chiefly to agriculture. Consumers will realize the full benefit of such a reduction. But it is said the tariff needs revision. So it does; doubtless a careful and proper revision of the tariff would do good. It is likely on some articles it should be lowered and on others raised to bring them upon a plane of equal competition with the foreign products in our own markets.

But a revision by the avowed enemies of protection, a revision that surrenders our markets to the products of the ill-paid labor of Europe, a revision that wipes out as with a sponge the only ample and stable markets for our agriculture, a revision that drives the products of our own labor from our own markets, a revision that closes the workshops of our own country, a revision that degrades our own labor to the pauperized condition of European labor, a revision that would drive all our people to the soil for a living to glut England with our agricultural products at starvation prices, to enable her to feed her labor cheap that she may pay it even less than now—such a revision should be thwarted if possible. [Applause.]

We have the capital, the inventive genius, the improved machinery, the skilled artisans, and the enterprise to successfully compete with any nation on earth if you will but give us protection equal to the difference of the cost of labor in our own country and the cost of European labor. Upon that basis I stand for a revision of the tariff, and if gentlemen on the other side who are in control here would agree to such a revision they would find this side of the House eagerly assisting them. But that is the very thing they do not want. The laboring man and the farmer are blandly assured by these revenue reformers that the protective system is grinding them into dust, and that the "revenue exclusively" panacea will remove all the ills they now suffer and lift them up to a higher plane of prosperity and happiness.

Do not flatter yourselves that farmers are fools or the wagemen ignorant.

Here is a list of prices paid here and in England, for which I am indebted to Mr. BUTTERWORTH, who had it compiled from reliable sources:

	England.	United States.
Book-binders	$6.00	$15.00 to $18.00
Brush-makers	6.00	15.00 to 20.00
Boiler-makers	7.75	16.50
Brick-makers	3.54	11.86
Brick-layers	8.00	21.00
Blacksmiths	6.00	13.30
Butchers	6.00	12.00
Bakers	6.25	12.75
Blast-furnace keepers	10.00	18.00
Blast-furnace fillers	7.50	14.00
Bolt-makers	6.50	16.50
Bolt-cutters	3.00	10.00
Coal-miners	5.88	13.00
Cotton-mill hands	4.60	6.72
Carpenters	7.50	15.00
Coopers	6.00	13.25
Carriage-makers	6.75	13.00 to 25.00
Cutlery	$6.00	$12.00 to 25.00

Go to any laborer employed in these industries and he will tell you that the industry in which he is engaged, unless protected, must cease to exist in this country unless his wages shall be reduced to those paid in the same industry across the sea. You may hurl your fine-spun theories of political science at him until your head aches and you will fail to convince him to the contrary. He is practical. It is not difficult for him to solve the question of whether his condition as a book-binder will be better at $18 per week, paying $3.88 for food, than it would be at $6 per week, paying $3.40 per week for food.

It does not require a very high degree of intelligence to comprehend that books bound at a labor cost of $6 per week can drive from the market books bound at a labor cost of $18 per week. It does not require a very large amount of business wisdom to understand that if A is employing ten thousand men in a given industry at $2 per day, and B is employing ten thousand men at $1.25 per day, A will be driven from the market by B and forced to close his establishment, or reduce the wages of his men to $1.25 per day. These men understand very clearly that $1.25 per day reduces them to the level of the employés in the English factory.

The farmer understands how important it is to him to sell food to A's ten thousand men for cash. He further understands that if A closes his establishment his ten thousand employés must go elsewhere for work, and not being able to get it must go to the soil for a living. He understands how in that case he has lost his customers not only, but they have now become his competitors in the production of agriculture. This reasoning of course applies to every manufacturing industry in the country.

Withdraw protection and substitute a tariff for revenue merely, and one of two things is inevitable: either our manufacturers must reduce the wages of their employés to such as are paid by rival establishments in Europe or go out of business.

If the wages are so reduced the American laborer is leveled to the condition of the European laborer. If he is degraded to that level he can no longer educate his children, and soon he will be found wholly unfit for self-government.

Some idea of the industrial condition of Europe will be conveyed by an examination of a late report of Consular Agent Smith touching the state of labor in the German Empire. After speaking of the unsatisfactory condition of agriculture and many other industries, he says:

In the manufacture of cloth in the district of Potsdam-Frankfort on the Oder there are said to be about 26,000 hands employed, of whom about 14,000 are women, at a weekly wage of 10 to 12 marks ($2.50 to $3), or 260,000 to 300,000 marks ($65,000 to $75,000) for the whole number, or about 15,000,000 marks ($3,750,000) a year, which is four-and-a-half times as much as is paid by the mines to their hands.

Speaking of the wages in the Dresden district, he says:

The inspector for the Dresden district gives the following as the average wages paid in his district, otherwise is not much said about wages, namely:

		Cents.
Hand workmen	per hour	3½ to 5
Factory operative	do	5 to 7½
Female workers	do	2½ to 3½
Young persons, fourteen to sixteen years old	do	1½ to 2
To a child twelve to fourteen years old	do	½ to 1

At piecework 20 to 25 per cent. more is made.

Speaking of the mines, furnaces, etc., he says:

In the bringing up of iron ore women are used day and night, and principally in tending the windlasses and rolling wheelbarrows. The iron ore is brought to the surface by means of windlasses, to work each of which there are four to six girls, according to the depth of carriage. Where the depth is 20 meters (about 65 feet) four girls in eight-hour turns wind up 80 buckets of iron ore, each of which holds from 1 to 1½ centners of ore (110-165 English pounds). The wages are very low, but the work is preferred by the girls to domestic service, because they are at it but eight hours at a time and can then do as they please. The inspector thinks it is not to be expected that machinery should displace these women, because they are cheaper than machines would be.

In the furnaces and in the iron and steel rolling-mills the regular work of iron forgers is performed only by men. The work done by the women is that of bringing coke, ore, and limestone to the furnaces, pouring water on the glowing coals, and removing the ashes and slag from the puddle-work.

Speaking of the immoral condition that prevails in the factories, he says:

Both men and women use the same wash and dressing rooms and privies in many establishments, but the providing of separate places for the two sexes is increasing, especially in the new buildings. In the old and small establishments much remains to be done, it is said, to remove the dangers to morality to which women are exposed.

The working together of both sexes in rooms where there is a high temperature is said to have a bad effect upon the morals of women. The textile factories come in for a good share of blame in this respect. The Dusseldorf inspector says that the spinning-mills of every branch are bad where there is a mixed employment of the two sexes in the same work-room, and especially those where the time of labor is long, the ventilation poor, the temperature high, and the washing and dressing rooms the same for both sexes; and also similar situated weaving-mills, factories making artificial wool, factories making wearing-apparel, etc. Other inspectors also point to the textile factories.

* * * * * * * *

Many sugar-factories are objectionable from moral considerations, in whose hot rooms the women have to wear little clothing and partly bare the body.

Objection is made to chicory and rubber-goods factories on the same ground as to the sugar-factories, that the women work half naked in hot rooms alongside men.

In some factories, where the men and women sleep at night, complaint is made that the halls or rooms are not properly separated from one another.

The inspector for the Potsdam-Frankfort on the Oder district calls attention to the manner in which women are employed in railroad construction. He says they can be seen, with their legs bare and their dresses tucked high up, pushing wheelbarrows in mud and wet sand. Every spring large numbers of farm hands come from the eastern provinces of Prussia to Brandenburg to take part in the harvesting. In summer, after the harvests are over, they have nothing to do, and as they do not like to make the long journey home—for in the autumn they find an abundance of work when the potato and beet-root crops are gathered in—they undertake any labor until the fall crops are ready, and building work is well paid.

Female work in the brick-kilns is objected to, because it is hard, and because the women have to work with their lower limbs bare.

Such is the degradation of this labor. It is so ill-paid as to be brutalized.

We all know that such of those same people as have come among us readily assimilate with ours, and under the elevating and refining influences of our vastly better paid labor rapidly develop into splendid manhood and womanhood. Their children are here sent to the public schools, educated, and frequently well equipped for any condition of American life.

But it is with their brutal and lamentable condition in Germany, as shown by Consul Smith, an officer of this Administration, that American labor must compete if the products of their toil are to be admitted without restrictions to our markets.

The present Commissioner of Labor made an exhaustive investigation in 1883 into the wages paid in Massachusetts and Great Britain in twenty-four industries. Here they are:

1. Agricultural implements.
2. Artisans' tools.
3. Boots and shoes.
4. Brick.
5. Building trades.
6. Carpetings.
7. Carriages and wagons.
8. Clothing.
9. Cotton goods.
10. Flax and jute goods.
11. Food preparations.
12. Furniture.
13. Glass.
14. Hats: Fur, wool, and silk.
15. Hosiery.
16. Liquors: Malt and distilled.
17. Machines and machinery.
18. Metals and metallic goods.
19. Printing and publishing.
20. Printing, dyeing, bleaching, and finishing cotton textiles.
21. Stone.
22. Wooden goods.
23. Woolen goods.
24. Worsted goods.

I quote from his report:

GRAND RESULT.

1. If Massachusetts is credited with the average wages paid and Great Britain is credited with the high wages paid, the Massachusetts wages are higher in twenty-three out of the twenty-four industries considered, the percentage in favor of Massachusetts, in all the industries, being 48.28.

2. If both Massachusetts and Great Britain are credited with the average wages paid, the wages in Massachusetts are higher in each of the twenty-four industries considered, the percentage in favor of Massachusetts, in all industries, being 75.94.

3. On an industry basis, the average percentage in favor of Massachusetts, in twenty-three industries, is 65.05.

4. Taking the wages paid per hour as the basis, the average in Massachusetts is higher in each of the twenty-four industries, the percentage in favor of Massachusetts, in all the industries, being 70.88.

5. On the basis of establishment pay-rolls, the percentage in favor of Massachusetts is 97.39.

The percentage that will truly and fairly indicate the higher rate of wages paid in Massachusetts in the industries considered, as compared with the wages paid in the same industries in Great Britain, must be found somewhere between the extremes here given, namely: 48.28 per cent. and 97.39 per cent. The results shown in sections 4 and 5 are not based upon as complete data as those shown in sections 1, 2, and 3, and neither percentage can be fairly used in determining the grand result.

The mean of 48.28 per cent. and 75.94 per cent., as we have previously shown, is 62.11 per cent., and this approximates so closely to the general average, 65.05, as shown in section 3, that we state as the grand result of the comparative weekly wages investigation in Massachusetts and Great Britain for the year 1883, that the general average weekly wage of the employés in twenty-four industries in Massachusetts is 62+ per cent. higher than the general average weekly wages of the employés in the same industries in Great Britain.

Our consul, Mr. Lathrop, made a report, 1884–'85, on labor in English factories. I quote:

The average wages of the men in the Trowbridge woolen factories are estimated at $5.44 per week. The average wages paid to 418 women in one leading factory are given as $2.63 per week, and in another at $3.02 per week. These wages, adds the consul, would not support life unaided; but, generally, these women are the wives or daughters of the male operatives; neither could the male wages alone sustain the average English families, and so the children in their turn contribute to the general fund by also working in the factories. Boys and girls, when employed, earn from $2.25 to $2.40 per week. Thus, to enable a Trowbridge family to live, every member—husband, wife, and children—works in the mills.

Consul Shaw says, speaking of labor in Manchester, England:

American work-people, as a whole, would not live under the conditions in force here among operatives, nor could they be induced to adopt the English system. Here whole families live in the mills and are satisfied to do so. Here the children are compelled to help pay the family expense.

Great numbers of houses visited by me contained each only one living room, and this served as kitchen, dining-room, sitting-room, and in some instances also bed-room. Into some of these small houses large families are crowded, and the manner of life is almost necessarily demoralizing and unfortunate.

Of course our wage-people would never submit to such conditions. They would naturally prefer to engage in agriculture. There they would hope at least to be able to subsist their families and educate their children. What does that mean? It means they no longer buy from the farmer. The farmer has lost this market. This is his home market. This is the market for over 90 per cent. of all he raises to sell. I say it is even worse than that. They not only do not buy any longer of the farmer, but those consumers have themselves now become producers of food products. They are now rivals, competitors, in agriculture. Who shall say that this will not make a glut of agriculture? Will it not change the relation of the supply to the demand? Will not the demand be less and the product greater? Will not the price go down accordingly? Why not? Less consumers and more producers. Well, now, you have destroyed the farmer's home market, a market always sufficient and always stable, where do you supply him other markets?

Let me quote here from the excellent speech of my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]:

Nine million farmers are feeding a nation of 60,000,000 of people. How does this advantage the farmers? The estimated value of the products of our farms, exclusive of cotton and tobacco, is $3,000,000,000 annually, and yet 94 per cent. of this enormous product is taken in our own market and consumed by our own people. The farmers are compelled to export only 6 per cent. of their products. In this connection it is worthy of note that while the value of our manufactures reaches the almost fabulous sum of $7,000,000,000 annually, yet more than 90 per cent. of this is consumed within our borders. It is estimated that the value of our industrial products of farm and factory will aggregate annually $11,000,000,000, and yet nearly $10,000,000,000 of this is disposed of in our own market and consumed by our own people. And yet, with a home market of such absorbing capacity, built up and sustained by a diversification of our industries, the advocates of free trade are constantly holding up the phantom of the markets of the world as the one thing chiefly to be desired.

Of what value to the American farmer are the markets of the world in comparison with his home market? How much of the farmer's surplus products does the world's market require to-day? Before dropping the substance for the shadow it would be well to inquire the extent of the foreign demand for the products of our farm. If a policy is adopted which destroys the home market and forces the American farmers into the markets of the world, when his vessels are laden with the products of his farm, to what ports on the habitable globe will he direct his course? Not to South America, nor Asia, nor Africa, nor Australasia, nor the islands of the sea, for in all these there is practically no demand for our agricultural products, and there is no prospect that there ever will be, for these countries are abundantly supplied with agricultural laborers and surplus lands.

Europe is the only country which does not feed its own people, and even there Russia, Germany, Turkey, Roumania, Servia, and Hungary produce their own food supply, and, excluding Germany, furnish a surplus for the European markets. Outside of Great Britain, therefore, there is practically no demand for our agricultural products, and with the rich fields of India open to her it is not difficult to discern that the time is not far distant when even this demand will cease.

The chairman of the committee, in his recent speech, declared that—

"We are the great agricultural people of the world, and have been feeding the people of Europe, and must receive European goods in exchange or fail to export our surplus, and thus surfeit the home market and reduce prices."

This hallucination of feeding the people of Europe is easily dispelled. As bread is the main staff of European life, let us see where it is obtained. The population of Europe is about 250,000,000, and the consumption of wheat about 3½ bushels per head, of which scarcely more than half a bushel is required from North and South America, Asia, and Australasia. In three-fourths of the entire area of Europe the consumption does not amount to 2 bushels per head, and nearly every grain of that is produced at home. On about half the area of Europe there is a surplus to spare to the other half. The largest consumer of wheat in the world, France, was also the largest producer less than fifteen years ago, and has now about as large an area and product as ever, and needs of foreign wheat only about 10 per cent. of her supply.

The 80,000,000 people of Russia live mostly on rye, as do the people of Germany and Central Europe, and produce it all themselves. Many of the people of the North of Europe consume a large proportion of maize. Some in the North of Europe subsist largely on oat-meal. The consumption of all cereals in Europe usually averages at least 16 bushels per head, of which 3 pecks per capita come from other continents. Feeding the people of Europe! Four continents combining to supply a per capita deficiency of 3 pecks per capita in the fifth. A failure of one-half peck in this deficiency sends prices rapidly upward; an excess of one-half peck produces an instant and sudden fall in India and Dakota. An additional half bushel would sprout in the bin or be fed to farm animals without a foreign offer. This is so well known that it would be charity to attribute to ignorance the pretense of enlarging the exportation of wheat by low tariffs, or no tariffs, or by any other device short of the creation of a few million more foreign mouths.

If we do so little in feeding Europe with bread, still less do we supply the meat she consumes. Last year we exported 162,000,000 pounds of beef, fresh and salted 138,000,000, or four-fifths of it, went to Great Britain. Very little is ever wanted elsewhere, and Englishmen are now straining every nerve and spending British gold in enterprises to supply their country with frozen and canned beef from Australia and the Argentines. Of 505,000,000 pounds of bacon, pork, and hams exported, 380,000,000 pounds, or three-fourths of it, went to Great Britain and a part of the remainder to Canada. Scarcely a nation in the world, Great Britain excepted, depends upon foreign nations for its meat supply. It is a necessity of their existence that they should supply themselves. It is the same with cheese, the only other food product of which there is an appreciable deficiency in Europe.

Its market is confined chiefly to Great Britain, and exportation can not be enlarged at all without a reduction in price, and any sudden extension is a practical and physical impossibility. The rich there buy all they can eat now, and the poor all they can afford. The requirement is fixed and limited with the least possible element of elasticity, so that the foreign demand can only fluctuate with the annual variations of the home supply. This statement should dispose of the boastful and silly pretense so glibly and frequently made by free-traders, of feeding Europe, and ought to mark the exit of America in the rôle of the world's nurse and caterer to the universe. [Applause.]

Where then on the face of the globe can the American farmer market his surplus? At home or nowhere. This home market, therefore, should be to him the object of his deepest solicitude and protecting care, for upon it the future of agriculture in this country depends.

Well, what other compensation do you offer the farmer for the loss of his home market? Cheaper goods, you say. Why, a quarter of a century of protection has greatly cheapened everything he has to buy. It has given such energy to our own manufacturers that competition has forced inventions, augmented the skill of our artisans, improved our machinery, and stimulated enterprise, thereby reducing prices of manufactured products. It is this competition that has forced down the price of every foreign product. Destroy our home manufactories and what becomes of this competition? What check have you then upon the greed of the foreign producer who is given a monopoly of our markets? What then will there be to prevent the foreign manufacturer from fixing the price the American farmer shall pay?

The farmer is not only greatly interested in diversified industries supplying the greatest possible number employment outside of agriculture, but also in such labor being well paid. The more the wageman gets for his labor the more he buys from the farmer. A man who gets good wages can and will live well. A man who gets poor wages can buy but little; he must live poor. The man who is out of employment is a wretched customer for the farmer. The free-traders delight in telling wagemen how much cheaper they could live under free trade—that everything they buy would be so much cheaper. Well, in the first place, we have seen that is not so. In the second place, if it is so—if they are thrown out of employment by the destruction of our industries, or if their wages are scaled down to the level of European wages—what will they have to buy with?

Unfortunately there are in our country some conditions that work injustice to all the industries, agriculture as well as manufactures, and labor is the pack-horse that bears the burden. The several States, vieing with each other to secure the investment of capital, have opened wide the door to serious evils. With incorporation laws imposing no restrictions or safeguards against abuses we find our lines of commerce doing business on a basis of from 25 to more than 100 per cent. fictitious or "watered" capital. To this the products of every industry are every second of time paying the same tribute as if it were real. This is a species of intolerable robbery. It is a thief whose hand is constantly filching the pockets of labor. Of all the wrongs to labor this is the greatest and the most wicked. The highest attainment of statesmanship will be achieved by providing a remedy for this monstrous wrong. [Applause.]

Millions of acres of the public domain still remain covered by grants to corporations to which such corporations are not legally, equitably, or morally entitled. This should at once be restored to the public domain. Much good in this direction has already been done, for which the country is more indebted to my friend from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] than to any other member of this body.

Some of the combinations called trusts and pools are daily engaged in open, audacious, and shameless robbery of agriculture and every form of labor.

Elsewhere it has been stated by an eminent and well-informed statesman that the cattle pool of Chicago has in the last five years filched from the people of my State over $40,000,000. I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the statement. Everybody knows that the tariff on cattle and beef has nothing to do with this combination. It is, however, as true that the tariff makes this combination possible as any other. Would you take the tariff off cattle and meat because of the existence of this trust? Would you take the tariff off wheat and flour because we have a combination of millers? That would be absurd. The tariff has just as much to do with these combines as with any other trusts. They exist in England, and will exist here until suppressed by direct legislation.

The one thing that is true, however, is that these various and wicked combinations are bold bandits gorging themselves upon the fruits of hard toil.

If we shall turn our attention to these abuses we shall merit public approbation and give to labor the fullest benefits resulting from judicious protective legislation.

The bill makes its chief assaults upon the farmer, and curiously enough scarcely one of its advocates has failed to pose as the champion of agriculture.

It takes protection from his wools, his flax, and other products he has to sell, puts them on the free-list, and makes dutiable all he has to buy. It cheapens what the farmer has to sell, but not what he has to buy.

As in all history it is difficult to find tyranny, however brutal; slavery, however wicked; crimes, however revolting; oppression, however hideous, that did not exist and were not maintained in the name of liberty, so now agriculture is to be destroyed, manufactures repressed, labor pauperized in the name of the public welfare. [Applause.]

Manufacturers are told that the absence of protection will be more than compensated by cheap labor and cheap raw material. Labor is told there will be an increased demand for it, cheaper food, cheaper clothing, and cheaper shelter for it, and therefore marvelous advantages to it, even if subjected to free and unrestricted competition with the ill-paid and degraded labor of the Old World.

The farmers are told that they will get more for their breadstuffs, because the markets of the world will be opened to them.

How often have the advocates of this measure in this debate told the non-agricultural people that they had to bear the burden of the wool duty; that every woolen fabric they owned cost them the additional burden of the duty on wool and woolens, and before they had passed from the subject turned to the farmers and told them that the removal of duty from wool would create such a universal demand for it as to rapidly advance the price of it in the markets?

From the earliest days of the Republic during forty years the statesmen of this country maintained almost without division the theory of protection. They themselves had framed the Constitution. They themselves in colonial times had experienced the hardship of the industrial oppression of England, and they made provision at the earliest practicable moment to protect the industries of their own country against the industrial aggressions of Europe, and the very first act that was passed under the Constitution declared that one of its objects was the protection of manufactures.

The act of 1816 followed, enlarging the principle of protection. All the leading men of that day advocated it. The act of 1824 went further and enlarged the principle. The act of 1828 followed and enlarged it still further. And up to that time there was no President, there were no leading statesmen in America who antagonized the principle of protection. They stood where we stand to-day. Many of them went to the point of prohibition, especially regarding products essential to a state of war. I could quote pages from Washington, Adams, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, and nearly every statesman of that period, squarely advocating the protective system.

Therefore, here to-day, I place the Democracy of the first forty years of the Republic against the Democracy of the last forty years. [Applause.] But after the act of 1828, under the influence of which agriculture in the North flourished as never before, factories sprung into activity with marvelous rapidity, and labor enjoyed universal prosperity, Southern statesmen opened a vindictive war against it for the first time, and this they did in the name of agriculture. What they meant by agriculture was cotton and the slave labor that produced it.

To force American labor into agriculture would make the supply of food products so far exceed the demand as to supply the slaves of the South and the labor of England with the cheapest possible living.

That, they reasoned, would enable them to produce cotton cheaper and would enable the manufacturers in England to pay them more for it.

Thus they could produce cotton cheaper and sell it dearer.

So they demanded that the protection laws be repealed, and declared for nullification and secession unless this demand was complied with.

The North surrendered, and the act of 1833 followed. It closed the work-shops of the North, drove labor from the factory to the farm, pauperized Northern agriculture, and finally resulted in driving the party from power and in the enactment of the tariff law of 1842. This opened the Northern factories again, created a demand for labor that drew heavily from the ranks of the farmers to supply labor for the work-shops, created markets for the products of the soil, and gave to agriculture renewed prosperity. But the tariff-for-revenue party was untiring in the South, and violently aggressive. But the North said, unless you pledge us that you will maintain the tariff act of 1842 you shall not return to power. The pledge was given; the party was returned to power, and at once tore down the hated protection act of 1842 and passed the free-trade act of 1846.

The destructive tendencies of this act were for a time inoperative under the influence of a foreign war, and our war with Mexico, that diminished the ranks of labor, thereby increasing a demand and opening up new and extensive markets for food products.

The treasures of the California gold mines attracted labor from the farms to the mines, and thus opened another new market for agriculture. Millions from those mines begun pouring into the lap of business, and there was corresponding activity. But when those influences were withdrawn the act of 1846 begun its deadly work.

Still Southern statesmen adhered to the policy of free trade or secession; but stagnation, universal bankruptcy, an ever increasing national debt, an empty Treasury, and broken national credit compelled Mr. Buchanan to ask for a revision of the tariff laws in the interest of revenue and protection.

The act of 1861 followed, and Mr. Buchanan approved it. Secession followed, and a war ensued that cost in money and property destroyed probably not less than ten thousand millions of dollars. Yet under protection during the last quarter of a century we have become first in manufactures, first in agriculture, and first in wealth among all the nations of the earth, with our labor better paid, better fed, better clothed, better sheltered, and better educated than elsewhere on the habitable globe, and yet here we are confronted with the same bold, defiant, and aggressive old revenue-reform party. [Applause.]

God, help us! will the time never come when we shall reach a stable industrial policy? Must our industries and labor be forever exposed to the depressing influence of perpetual menace? Well may agriculture, well may manufactures, well may American labor unite with each other against this ever present, ever aggressive public enemy, and cry out, "Let us have peace!"

These free-traders or revenue reformers, as they fondly call themselves, appear to revel in the adversity of our people. Every calamity is an illustration of the wickedness of protection.

If a farmer imprudently contracts a debt and subsequently is unable to pay it, he is told that he is robbed by protection.

If the crops fail and farmers are depressed thereby, they are told but for this robber agriculture would be prosperous.

If there is something of general business depression, the people are told that old Protection did it.

If some scoundrel has plundered his employés and robbed them of their just share of their own earnings, they are told at once that it is the fault of protection.

If there is a labor strike of 20,000 men because some employer has unjustly discharged and refused to reinstate one of them, the air is vocal with curses upon protection. If some manufacturer has enriched himself by not dealing justly with labor, he is held up as a hideous example of the monopoly-breeding tariff. If a section of our country two hundred years old has been engaged in agriculture and manufactures for more than one hundred years, and has thereby become richer than the new agricultural States of the West, the fact is made to do service as proof that the rich section two hundred years old has been made rich by robbing the new Western States through the agency of the iniquitous tariff.

Why, sir, if we shall be permitted to enjoy continuously for another quarter of a century the benign influence of just protection, my own beautiful prairie State will rival Ohio and Illinois in manufactures, and we shall have the workshop and the farm side by side, and the most prosperous people in the world. Only twenty-seven years ago she was born unto the sisterhood of States. Then she was in population the thirty-third State; now she is the fifteenth. Then she had but ten towns of a population each exceeding 500; now she has over one hundred and fifty towns of over 500 each, nearly a hundred of them of over 1,000 each, and some exceeding 30,000. She has within her borders 1,500,000 souls. The value of her farm crops for the five years ending 1885 was $503,485,316. The value of her live-stock swells from $3,332,450 in 1861 to $117,881,699 in 1885. Then she did not have a mile of railway; now she has over 7,000 miles. She has over seven hundred school-houses, of the value of over $7,000,000. Since then she has expended over $30,000,000 for the support of her common schools. She has three thousand churches, of the value of $3,000,000, and not a whisky saloon within her borders. She has six hundred journals, with a circulation of 500,000. [Applause.]

For these facts I am indebted to an address delivered by the present excellent governor of the State, Hon. John A. Martin, from which I beg to further quote:

A PROPHECY FULFILLED.

On the 7th of May, 1856, a great American, learned, sagacious, and confident in his faith that right and justice would at last prevail, said, in a speech delivered in the city of New York:

"In the year of our Lord 1900 there will be 2,000,000 people in Kansas, with cities like Providence and Worcester—perhaps like Chicago and Cincinnati. She will have more miles of railroad than Maryland, Virginia, and both the Carolinas can now boast. Her land will be worth $20 an acre, and her total wealth will be five hundred millions of money. Six hundred thousand children will learn in her schools. What schools, newspapers, libraries, meeting-houses! Yes, what families of educated, happy, and religious men and women! There will be a song of freedom all around the slave States, and in them slavery itself will die.

Read in the light of the present, these eloquent words of Theodore Parker seem touched with prophetic fire. The ideal Kansas he saw, looking through the mists of the future, is the real Kansas of to-day. The marvelous growth, the splendid prosperity, the potent intellectual and moral energies, and the happy and contented life he predicted, are all around us. At the threshold of the year A. D. 1886, fifteen years before the limit of his prophecy, Kansas has cities like Providence and Worcester; has more than double the railway mileage Maryland, Virginia, and both the Carolinas could then boast; has land worth, not twenty, but fifty and a hundred dollars an acre; has wealth far exceeding $500,000,000; has schools, newspapers, libraries, and churches rivaling those of New England; and has 1,300,000 happy, prosperous, and intelligent people.

The prophecy has been fulfilled, but the end is not yet. The foundations of the State, like those of its capitol, have just been completed. The stately building, crowned with its splendid dome, is yet to be reared. Smiling and opulent fields, busy and prosperous cities and towns are still attracting the intelligent, the enterprising, and the ambitious of every State and country. The limits that bound the progress and development of Kansas can not now be gauged or guessed. We have lands, homes, work, and plenty for millions more; and for another quarter of a century, at least, our State will continue to grow. For we are yet at the threshold and in the dawn of it all. We are just beginning to realize what a great people can accomplish, whom "love of country moveth, example teacheth, company comforteth, emulation quickeneth, and glory exalteth."

[Applause.]

That is the way protection has impoverished the agricultural West. [Applause.] If the good Lord shall give us the rains, the sunshine, and the dew, essential to good crops for the next three years, and our markets are not destroyed by free trade, Kansas will be a barren field for a calamity party.

Had free trade prevailed our growth as a State would have been dwarfed from the beginning. Without a market for our products our surplus would have been used for fuel or rotted on the fields Without the conditions to invite population we would still be in our swadling-clothes.

Her growth is without a parallel in all history. Her magnificent climate, rich soil, splendid farms, myriads of cattle, vast network of railways, busy towns, comfortable homes, her public schools, colleges, churches, charitable institutions, liberal and progressive laws, her enterprising, intelligent, energetic men, beautiful women, and healthful children—all, all combine to illustrate the highest prosperity and the most exalted civilization. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, of all the institutions of learning experience is said to be the most expensive. So it is. But its teachings are of the highest order of wisdom. You may tell the child a thousand times that hot iron will burn, but it is sure nevertheless to make the test, and then we have a wiser child.

You may tell the lad that it is highly imprudent to toy with a mule's hind legs, but he is sure to try the experiment, and then we have a wiser lad.

The people were everywhere told three years ago that, its pledges to the contrary notwithstanding, if they placed the Government in the control of the Democratic party it would marshal all the instrumentalities of power against the industries of the country. They tried the experiment nevertheless, and now we have a wiser people. [Applause.]

The twenty-four years of Republican rule had formed an epoch more fruitful of national and individual prosperity, of agriculture, manufactures and commerce, of the arts and sciences, of education and Christianity, of ideal government and human liberty, than any century of other time since the creation of man.

The generations to come will marvel that in the presence of such a glorious record a people distinguished for their intelligence would wrest the powers of government from such a party and hand them over to another whose history was one of violated pledges and shocking misrule. [Applause.]

Sir, the Republican party stands for industrial independence as a high attribute of national power.

It believes that the destruction of our manufactures will leave our people helpless victims of British greed.

It believes the highest happiness of a people can best be attained by the greatest possible diversity of occupations.

Mr. Chairman, the Republican party would have our country independent of all other nations; the workingman own his own home; his table always bountifully supplied with healthful food; his family becomingly clothed; his children educated and equipped for self-government and for every sphere of useful action from the farm to the Presidency. It wishes all nations well; would have peace with the world; but it stands for America and Americans first, last, and forever. [Applause.]

At the conclusion of the foregoing remarks Mr. RYAN yielded the remainder of his time to Mr. DALZELL.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas has four minutes of his time remaining, which he yields to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to be used when that gentleman takes the floor in his own right.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, it was my ill fortune yesterday afternoon to be absent from the Hall when the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GROUT], whom I regret to find is not in his seat, made his speech. I came into the Hall as he was concluding. I knew that he was speaking upon the need of keeping up our present rate of tariff, and was therefore surprised to hear him engaged in general laudation of Vermont and her sons, from Ethan Allen down to the heroes of the civil war, and all the distinguished statesmen and jurists that have adorned her history. This was interesting matter, and I should have been in glad agreement with the gentleman had he not ascribed the success and character of the people of Vermont, not to their love of liberty and full enjoyment of free institutions, their means of education and the refinement of society, their invigorating climate, their unrestricted trade with all the States of the Union, and a common possession of the blessings we enjoy under the Constitution, but to the fact that her people are "believers in protection!"

The gentleman also attributed the relative superiority of Vermont to Kentucky to the fact that Kentuckians of this generation do not believe in the doctrine that a people can grow rich from their own taxes.

The gentleman seems to forget that whether Kentucky believes or not she has had the same ratio of taxation and should have the same advantages from it; or is the protection salvation something that depends for its fruition upon faith and not upon works?

The gentleman showed the superiority of the agriculture of Vermont, inasmuch as they raise 14 bushels of wheat to the acre, while in Kentucky they harvest less than 10 bushels; 35 bushels of corn to the acre in Vermont and only 27 bushels bless the toil of the Kentucky farmers; of oats they garner 34 bushels in Vermont and but 20 in Kentucky, and other comparisons favorable to Vermont.

My experience of New England agriculture proves the truth of the statements made by the gentleman from Vermont, but I hold that the results are due to the industry and thrift of the people, their small farms, and intensive methods of cultivation. If the gentleman compares the statistics of Vermont with those of other States that like Vermont are "believers in protection," he will find differences more striking in favor of the mountain Commonwealth.

I have made such comparisons in times past to the same or greater disadvantage of Ohio, Iowa, Illinois, and other States. Sir, there is more in men than in land. I can make the same boasts of Massachusetts, but our agriculture is limited in its scope, and is not improving and advancing as it did in former years; and while I will not go so far as to attribute the unfavorable changes that have taken place gradually since 1860 to the political economy of this generation, I will give some figures from which conclusions may be drawn.

The gentleman from Vermont stated that there had been a constant increase in the value of property in Vermont under the "protective tariff," and he referred to the time previous to 1861 as a free-trade era, as if we had not been under protective tariffs ever since the session of the First Congress. Sir, I will read what the increase in value of farms and products has been in Vermont since 1850 by decades. From 1850 to 1860 the increase of agricultural wealth in Vermont was 44 per cent. That was under what is now called "the free-trade tariff;" from 1860 to 1870, under high tariff, the increase of agricultural wealth was 10.9 per cent.; from 1870 to 1880, and that brings us to the last census which we have to guide us, the increase was less than 4 per cent.

Now, sir, if the State has, as a whole, grown richer, it must have been through her manufacturing, stimulated by the bounties of protection. Let us see. From 1850 to 1860, under the Walker tariff, the per cent. of increase in the manufacturing industries was 90 per cent.; from 1860 to 1870 it was 60 per cent.; from 1870 to 1880 it was but 52 per cent.

Do not the figures show a diminishing volume of prosperity through the whole term of the high tariff, both in agriculture and manufactures?

The sheep husbandry of this fine State, remarkable as its results have been in careful breeding, do not show a relative increase with past times. Will not that husbandry feel the stimulus that is sure to come if wool is placed upon the free-list? I will occupy the remainder of my time in discussing the part of the bill now before the House that relates to wool.

There is a constant and vigorous assertion made several times each day on the other side of this Hall, that if we take the tax off of foreign wools we will destroy our own wool industry. "Destroy" is the word constantly used.

It is asserted that there will not even be sheep enough left from the enforced slaughter to provide mutton for our markets.

Grave protectionists look at us with alarm and declare that unless we "protect" the five or six pounds of wool on the sheep, worth at present prices less than a dollar and half, we will not be able to purchase mutton for money! As sheep can not be raised for wool alone east of the Mississippi and are bred largely for food, the assertion seems paradoxical.

Then there is an equally grave exaggeration in regard to the importance of our wool husbandry. The other day the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] stated that the number of persons dependent on this industry was about 1,200,000.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Not entirely dependent.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. But still dependent. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], in his opening speech in this debate, claimed one million of dependent people would be ruined if we did not protect them by a tax that falls directly upon our woolen industry. The resolutions of the Pennsylvania Republican convention double Mr. KELLEY's statement and declare that two millions of people live upon the produce of flocks. No doubt they followed the minority report of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] to the last Congress in which he made a similar declaration. The association of Ohio wool-growers two years ago also claimed that the number of people engaged in this industry reaches two millions.

A little book prepared in this interest, which has been sent to every member of the House, not only makes the same general statements, but goes much farther in the declaration which I will read:

A majority of these flock-masters, as well as their employed help, are heads of families. Therefore if you add to their number their wives and children, you will have a population of at least 4,000,000 interested in the growing of wool, or about one-fifteenth of the entire population of the United States. There are no doubt fully 150,000 other farmers who keep sheep, but these could not fairly be classed as wool-growers.

This book further says that if the duty is removed from wool it will reduce the wages of 500,000 men employed in herding flocks, and finally sums up the great total of loss as follows:

Shrinkage in the value of lands	$280,000,000
Shrinkage in the value of labor	25,000,000
Shrinkage in the value of flocks	25,000,000
Shrinkage in the value of wool	25,000,000
	355,000,000

As the wool clip is not worth $80,000,000, and as the sheep of the whole country are not worth $100,000,000, the figures and statements are at once seen to be gross and absurd exaggerations. Reduce the number employed and their families and dependent relatives to the lowest number; say that 2,000,000 of people are supported by wool, live by flocks, and spend their time in their care, and how can they be supported?

The highest estimate of the number of sheep in the country in the last year was much less than 50,000,000, but calling it that it requires 25 sheep to support each person with wool worth about $40 for a year's work.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], who does me the honor to listen, made a speech in Boston recently before the Home Market Club, and when some one in the audience said, "We want free wool," he replied, "But what are you going to do with the thousands of men who make a living herding sheep?" I think we ought to find them a better business, for if they were supported for one year by their flocks they would have to use all the wool for clothing, and the mutton for food, so that there would not be a sheep left in the country at the end of a year. If there are any facts in the United States census on which we can rely, there have been the most reckless statements current on the floor of this House in the interest mainly of Ohio wool-growers.

My time is so limited that I can not treat this matter in detail, but I will try to make the point that the prosperity of wool-growing is not dependent upon a tax on imported wool.

The wool-grower is dependent for the sale of his wool upon the manufacturers of his own country alone. Wool is the only one of our farm products of considerable value for which there is no foreign demand.

If there is a surplus it must remain on hand. The manufacturers of other nations are not accustomed to our wools, and will not take them.

Like all other things men wish to sell, its price will be governed by the demand for it; that demand will arise from the prosperity of your customers, and that only. Therefore, if the business of the woolen manufacturers is good you will get a fair price for your wool, but if these men are not successful, if their business is hard and waning, your market grows narrow and wool falls, as we have seen it fall during the last ten years.

The wool-grower and the manufacturer can have no divided interest; they must flourish together or they must languish together, and at this time they are equally unhappy. A gentleman on the other side told me this morning that if I could establish the fact that the wool industry would improve with wool on the free-list he would vote for it.

I do not expect to convince him, though I see him listening. It is too near a Presidential election, and the party whip has a sharp lash. [Laughter.]

How, sir, did we get the blessing of a high tax on imported wool? It was the result of a combination between woolmen and manufacturers.

Prior to 1857 we had a nominal duty on wool, and the fortunate experience of the country in every department of industry and enterprise under the tariff of 1846 led to the further reduction of the tariff in 1857. And, as I had the pleasure to remind the House in the debate the other day, the whole delegation from Massachusetts here and at the other end of the Capitol voted for it. In that revision wool under 20 cents a pound was made free.

The effect upon wool was immediate. It went up, and in 1859 it was as high as it has ever been in our history, and the manufacturers of Massachusetts and Rhode Island made more money than they ever did in any year of their business.

They flourished together, because their interests are identical.

When the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] said, "Continue this tariff and even raise it and we will produce all the wool required in this country," I saw that he did not understand the relation of wool-growers to manufacturers.

No manufacturing people in our day can raise all its own wool. No soil or climate will produce all the various wools that enter into fabrics ranging from coarse carpets to cloths mixed with silk. The wools grown in America are not a complete raw material even for the cloths for men's ordinary wear. We are controlled by fashion. The manufacturer must make what is demanded. He has to make cloths such as people who pay high prices will buy. In order to get material for such clothing the wool-buyer must go to the world's market and select fleeces to mix and blend with American wool. He may require Australian, or African, or South American, or Spanish, or French wools for his purpose, and if he does he will pay from 50 to 75 per cent. duty on them, and that handicaps him in competition with the men who have free wool; he is thus at a disadvantage with the manufacturers of England, France, Belgium, and Germany, the great cloth-exporting countries.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The gentleman speaks only for himself and not for other members of Congress when he says they do not wear domestic goods. The cloth in which I am dressed was made in Maine; the suit was made in Maine. We are not up to the sublimated condition of some gentlemen from Massachusetts.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I hope the establishment that made the gentleman's cloth is prosperous, for there are but few in New England that are so. They are not prosperous because of the tax on their raw material that enables the manufacturers of Europe to send here between forty and fifty million dollars' worth of cloth a year, representing not less than 150,000,000 pounds of wool, which we neither grew, nor sheared, nor wove.

Nor does the gentleman know that his coat is wool at all. Few men in this House have any idea how far substitutes are used for wool. In my district, in the immediate neighborhood where I live, within a radius of 4 or 5 miles from my house, there is turned out a product of about $2,000,000 of woolen cloths—so called. You flatter yourself that they are woolen cloths, and so they are, except so far as cotton is mixed in them; but the wool was worn by previous generations of sheep and may have been worn by two generations of men. These cloths are made from rags, picked to shred and fiber in a shoddy-picker, and then handled like wool. This cloth bears the relation to other cloth that oleomargarine does to butter.

Do you ask what these rags are? They are of all grades, carefully assorted; they are tailor's clippings from fine clothes which make a good "short staple" wool; but in this thrifty age nothing is lost and the shoddy rags come back again. Said one of these manufacturers to me, "I have seen my old shoddy goods come back here time and time again to be picked up and made into new cloth." These shoddies are the woolen cloths boastfully mentioned on the other side of the House that make the cheap suits in which the protected laborer is dressed. Why, sir, the cloth which the gentleman from Maine is wearing may have made a procession down from the really protected magnates of the land and been worn by the commonest beggar shrinking from the sun.

Mr. MILLIKEN. No, sir; this cloth was made in Maine, not in Massachusetts.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. These shoddy clothes are sold cheaply enough perhaps. Men may get their money's worth, for they are sold at prices that would not buy their weight in actual wool.

The American laborer who bears with the farmer the real burden of taxes is not able to buy woolen cloth, but wears the wool that comes from the crop of old clothes. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. They wear more than the European laborers do.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Perhaps they do. Laborers wear what they can get. I do not believe the gentleman knew until now that our laborers do not wear woolen cloth.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Three-fouths of the cloth worn by the laborers of Europe is cotton and not woolen.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The subject we are discussing is the duty on wool. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am talking about a practical question.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I will so treat it. There are parts of Europe where men may be comfortable in cotton. If so, they do well to wear it. But in this country we have severe winters, with violent changes; the mercury falls to zero, and men who wear the heaviest woolen goods shiver.

Mr. FARQUHAR. After all, Mr. RUSSELL, the average of cloth worn by the laborers in this country is better in every way than is worn by the laborers of Europe.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. And it should be. Now, that the gentleman has got to Europe, let me say something in regard to foreign policy. We are the only civilized country on the earth to-day that imposes a high duty on wool, except poor old-fashioned Spain, and she is an exporter of wools and we are not. England, Belgium, France, and Germany took the duties off of wool years ago.

It is urged here that our people can not keep their flocks without a protection to wool; it is said our sheep will disappear; one will forget the taste of mutton. That is not the teaching of experience here or abroad.

The high-priced lands of England, open to the competition of all mankind, carry more sheep than in former days. The pastures of France have double the sheep they had when wool was protected.

No vote of mine would ever be given consciously against the interest of the American farmer, but I would take the duty off of wool, for I believe that in less than a year the price of wool would advance because the woolen manufacturer, freed from the tax on two-thirds of his raw material, would be better able to buy the other third. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Sir, I have before said that the tariff of 1867 was the result of a combination of manufacturers and wool-men to shear mankind. Like Cæsar Augustus, they decreed that all the world, their world, should be taxed. There should be a prodigious duty on wool and a compensating duty on cloth. It was an abominable agreement. The Treasury did not need the tax, and both of the contemplated beneficiaries were fairly prosperous. The war was over and no revenue change was ever made upon such slight grounds. It brought its own punishment. It was an Ohio idea; but did flocks increase in Ohio under its action, or in any State east of the Mississippi? The census figures show an immediate and heavy decrease in those States. Your tariff proved a hireling shepherd. Within a year wool began to decline and flocks to shrink, and in five years there was a falling off in the number of sheep in the older States of 20 per cent.

They increased heavily west of the Mississippi River from new and unforeseen causes—the opening of free range by the extension of railroads and the disappearance of the Indian and his game from the new Territories.

That was the only part of the country where sheep increased, and that was from advantages that proved to be temporary.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It is an incorrect statement that the flocks of Ohio decreased under the act of 1867.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman from Ohio deny it?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I certainly do.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Then I repeat it with a full responsibility for the statement that between 1867 and 1871 the flocks of Ohio decreased.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And I say that is not true.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. And that they decreased everywhere east of the Mississippi; and the gentleman can look up the facts and contradict and confute me before the House when he has the figures. I speak from recollection, and I will trust my memory in the matter until the figures are quoted. Tariffs can not help wool on high-priced land. A man who keeps sheep on land worth $100 an acre is a good husbandman; but he does not keep sheep for wool. He would keep them if the wool was worth no more than cow-hair or hen-feathers. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I say this from an intimate knowledge of the business, for I am perhaps a larger wool-grower than the average in Ohio. In small flocks the wool product is a by-product.

At the wool conference of last winter, in the very shadow of the Capitol, with this great tariff, the Ohio men said they could not raise wool at 30 cents a pound. They surely can not if that is all the return a sheep makes; but there is a difference between sheep handled by an Ohio farmer and an Ohio politician, and we see that when the Ohio and Kentucky and Tennessee lambs come into Boston market and sell for twice as much as the ewes are worth on the farm with the wool on their backs. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Sheep-keeping in the older States is a matter of "mixed farming," and it will never disappear with or without tariff. It began with the twilight dawn of human history on the plains of Asia, the primal, eldest pursuit of men. If you tax-layers had been in Judea in the days of King Herod you might have made it poorer, but still there would have been shepherds watching their flocks by night to hear and proclaim the glad tidings of great joy—peace and good-will to men. [Applause.] If you could devise protection from sheep-killing dogs you would do more good in your day and generation. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FARQUHAR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. You had an hour this morning. I listened to you. You made a good speech. I did not interrupt you.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I am always pleased to hear Mr. RUSSELL, and that I may be better instructed, I wish to ask him a question.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Very well, go on, but do not make a speech at the same time.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I notice the gentleman says he raises sheep not for wool; but is it not possible that he could not raise them for mutton? I take it that the gentleman raises fancy sheep.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I do not like even to make an illustration from my own affairs, but I must reply to the gentleman that my flock is not "fancy." A farmer keeps sheep in "mixed husbandry" for various reasons. His product is lambs, mutton, and wool; it stands in that order. But there is another reason less understood by those not engaged in farming, that is the improvement of land and restoration of pastures. Sheep make new land, and in that sense we have the old Spanish proverb, "The sheep's foot is shod with gold." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. How many sheep does the gentleman from Massachusetts keep?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I have not seen my flock this spring; and we are constantly changing.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Tell us whether you have twenty-five or thirty.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I said I had more than the Ohio average; we may have twice as many as that average, which is not over fifty.

Now, sir, a word about sheep-raising on cheap lands under protection. I paid much attention to the wool-growers' conference last winter, but I did not see any of you there, and I have here a memorandum of the statement made by Mr. Burbank, of Texas, a flockmaster of the ancient type, who ranges over 35,000 acres of land with 5,000 sheep. Think of it; 7 acres to a sheep—as large as a French farm. He rents the land at 6 cents an acre. He paid four herders $21 a month each, out of which they boarded themselves, and yet Ohio only allows one man to 25 sheep. He found it hard to sell his wool at San Antonio at 14 cents, for, though he allowed $1,300 for lambs, he could not get back his cost at the end of the year.

This was an intelligent, accurate man, well placed; his land could not be much cheaper and he had superior sheep with product of wool above the average. What he wants is a better market for his wool, and that can not be had under the present conditions.

This morning I received letters from the city of Lowell, so beautifully described by my colleague [Mr. ALLEN] in his recent speech, where when the day's work is done the rosy-cheeked factory girl trips from the brightly lighted factory hall, her pockets heavy with her day's wages and seeks her vine-embowered cottage. The news was that the Lowell Carpet Company had suspended operations. Of course the cry was raised that it was owing to the consideration of the tariff, the fear of the passage of the pending bill.

The treasurer of the corporation, in a letter to one of the Lowell papers, denies this. He shows that trade is moribund from various causes, and thinks it would be powerfully relieved by taking the duty off of carpet wools!

Mr. PERKINS and others rose to questions.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I will repeat, that it may be fully understood that it appears that carpets can not be made by this strong, skillfully-managed corporation on account, principally, of the duty on carpet wools. An indefensible tax, no such wools being grown in this country.

All the duty collected on such wool is a direct tax on every yard of carpeting made, and there is no way to evade it.

Mr. PERKINS. I understood the gentleman to say that all the woolen manufacturers at the East had gone into bankruptcy without exception in the last few years.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. You misunderstood me. I have not said so.

Mr. PERKINS. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I have said over and again that the business was not prosperous, and I may say that many large and small manufacturers have become insolvent in the past ten years—some of them not once but two or three times.

Mr. PERKINS. And that was in consequence of this tariff which gives to the wool-grower his protection? I would like to read an extract from the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] answering the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I want to put one free-trader against another on that proposition. I want to show from the speech the profits of wool manufacturers, and then ask which is correct, free-trader MILLS or free-trader RUSSELL.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I can not yield my little time for such a purpose.

[Mr. PERKINS and others rising in much confusion and many questions.]

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order. We can not hear; there is too much confusion. Let the Chair call the committee to order.

The Chairman rapped to order, but before order could be restored Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts, Mr. PERKINS, and others made remarks not heard by the Reporter.

Mr. MILLS. This is a violation of our agreement, and I call upon gentlemen on their honor to carry out their agreement.

Mr. BRUMM. Then why do you violate it every time you permit questions to be asked from your side?

Mr. DAVIDSON. But this is not questioning; it is interruption.

Mr. PERKINS. I, of course, recognize the fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor, and without his permission I would not interrupt him.

Mr. COWLES. He gave no permission for such interruption.

Mr. REED. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means has made an asseveration that our agreement has been violated. As I watched the course of proceedings here I heard the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] request permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] to ask a question. The gentleman from Massachusetts continued his remarks and then stopped, turning to the gentleman from Kansas, and permitted his question. What violation of agreement was there there?

Mr. MILLS. It was not the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] alone, but half a dozen gentlemen at once, interrupted the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. REED. He consented to it.

Mr. MILLS. He did not consent to the interruption of but one——

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I have an impression, somewhat shaken by events, that I have the floor; at least I had it. [Laughter.] I think I am more tolerant of interruption than any man in the House, and if my time was not limited I would refuse no gentleman. I yielded to the gentleman from Kansas because he was so persistent that I thought I could get through with him quicker by answering him, but he wished to interject matter into my speech that I think irrelevant, and requested me to reconcile my statement with something another gentleman had said.

Mr. PERKINS. I wanted to know if that gentleman was correct in his statement.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I do not speak for the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. He is able to take care of himself and answer any gentleman on that side of the House [applause on the Democratic side], and if the gentleman from Kansas wants to debate with him he can get plenty of opportunities.

Mr. PERKINS and others. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I must insist on having part of my time. Gentlemen see that I have no notes and evidently seek merely to break me up and prevent me from getting in my speech.

Mr. PERKINS. I am afraid the gentleman has neither notes nor facts to sustain him.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask if it is right when a gentleman has the floor and is trying to be heard that he should be continually interrupted by questions and noises hurled at him in this way? It is indecent.

The CHAIRMAN rapped to order.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I am willing to return to the questions of the gentleman from Kansas and explain more in detail what I said about the business of woolen manufacturing in Massachusetts. I said in a speech the gentleman perhaps did not hear last month that there were towns in my district whose business was wool manufacturing that had not built a new mill since the tariff of 1846. When mills are burned they are left unrestored, and I made other statements showing the difficulties of the trade.

As a proof of my statement I will quote Mr. Charles A. Beach, of Connecticut, a manufacturer of wide repute and large experience, who testified before the Committee of Ways and Means in the last Congress that the wool manufactories of the United States—not of Massachusetts, not of New England, but of the United States—would not sell for 25 cents on the dollar of their original cost. I speak, and gentlemen can correct me in their own time if I am wrong. One of the largest woolen corporations in the United States has been sold lately. The plant cost something like two millions, and it brought less than $300,000.

Mr. MORSE. Name it.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. It is the Washington.

Mr. ARNOLD. Was not that mill worn out?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. No doubt it was worn out, and so were the stockholders worn out. They had not made money enough to keep up the machinery. I could name other broken corporations and mills that are worn out, and their operatives, too. [Laughter on Democratic side.]

I think the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. ARNOLD] knows what it is to buy woolen mills at bankrupt sales. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I see that my time is just expiring and I will conclude. I would not have trespassed so long upon the time of the committee if the gentlemen on the other side had not been so anxious for information. [Laughter.] I thank the committee for their courtesy.

Mr. FITCH obtained the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITCH] was to occupy the remainder of the present hour, of which, however, only ten minutes remain. He desires to ask consent to occupy now thirty minutes, twenty minutes of which shall be taken from the end of the next hour.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. This arrangement will not interfere with the time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ALLEN], nor with that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITCH] will proceed. Mr. FITCH (reading):

THE TARIFF.

Unless the tariff men take heed, unless they consent to a rational and considerate adjustment of the tariff such as only can be made by the full light that a careful statistical study of the subject will bring, I fear from them, more than from any other source, a reaction which will bring us by and by into free trade and all its consequences of evil to the manufacturing interests of the country.

I desire to say that, in my judgment, it is not the best mode of defending a tariff to denounce every man who does not pronounce the shibboleth after our fashion as an enemy of the tariff.—James A. Garfield, July 13, 1868.

Mr. Chairman, in the brief remarks which I desire to make on the bill under consideration, in the spirit of the words which I have just read, I do not propose to discuss at length the arguments which gentlemen on both sides of the House have already fully presented, nor shall I attempt to review or to put a new meaning into the great mass of customs figures which have been so carefully prepared and explained by the gentlemen who have preceded me. I do not intend to debate the question whether or not we shall have a tariff, or whether that tariff shall be one for protection or not.

I assume that, whether this bill passes or not, we shall continue to have in this country a protective tariff, and that protective tariff, if it be fairly adjusted, if its burdens be distributed with justice so far as interests of my constituents are concerned, I expect to defend and advocate as long as I live. And as long as I live, whenever I find in the tariff laws or in any other of the laws which affect the people whom I represent anything which seems to me in any degree unfair or unjust, I shall not hesitate to advocate their revision and amendment. [Applause.] I propose here to discuss at this time only what seems to me to be the question before the House, whether or not the present tariff and the free-list which accompanies it should remain unchanged during the existence of the Fiftieth Congress.

In the discussion of this question I shall not attempt to imitate the gentlemen who have with such wonderful patience and industry examined the views of the earlier Presidents and the construction of the tariff of 1789, and who have so carefully reviewed the whole course of legislation on this subject since the foundation of the Republic. They have analyzed for you every fluctuation in the prices of our manufactures, and they have accounted satisfactorily for each financial crisis in the history of the country. Every statesman who has in any way identified himself with this question has been quoted by them, and every text-book and essay on the subject has been examined. Each gentleman has found in the same material the most convincing proof that his particular theory was correct and that of his opponent mistaken.

For my part, and with the utmost deference to the learning and ability of gentlemen who have spoken, I am forced to believe that, owing to the changes in transportation, invention of new machinery, the growth and development of the country, and improvements which have accomplished modern civilization here and all over the world, the problem presented to us is entirely different from that considered by the earlier contestants over these questions. It seems to me that no two countries in Europe are to-day more strikingly different in the manner in which their inhabitants live, their means of communication, and their business customs than are the United States of fifty years ago and the country and people whose interests we are considering here.

I desire therefore to leave to other gentlemen who have done it so well the consideration of all the earlier precedents, and to speak only of what the Republican party in our day and generation has promised to do, and to consider what duties are incumbent on us here and now in connection with that promise. I propose also to speak of what I consider to be the interest of the people in my own district, whose condition and whose wants are naturally better known to me than those of others. It can hardly be denied that the present tariff was largely made up in this way: Different interests in special districts sent information and delegations to Washington, urging the enactment of duties specially favorable to them, and sometimes elected Congressmen especially with a view to obtaining a protection which they deemed necessary for their district. It is not probable that the views of the persons represented in this way were always unselfish, and it is possible that the advocates of these particular interests were not unwilling to profit by taxes which bore unequally upon other sections of the country.

It is easy to say, and everybody says in the abstract, that we should legislate for our whole country and not for sections of it, and that this bill should be considered as to its effect on the people at large and not on particular classes. But how has it in fact been considered in this debate? One eloquent gentleman after another has told of the special needs of his district, and has protested solemnly against some proposed interference with the vested rights of his constituents in the present tariff. First of all, and above all, the gentlemen representing the farming interests have been heard. I have read, for instance, with profit, and almost with conviction, the argument of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] for the continuance of the present tariff in all its parts for the protection of the farmers, who, it seems to him, are now insufficiently protected, and with equal interest have studied the seconding appeal of his colleague and my friend, Mr. BREWER, to the same effect. Nothing could have pleased me more than the touching tribute from the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] to the virtues of the farming constituency, among which he is fortunate to live, unless it were the kindly offer of my genial and eloquent friend from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER], the guardian of the American infant, to put a duty of 4 cents per dozen on the fourteen million dozens of eggs which are now imported free of duty, and which we in New York eat and are obliged to pay for in order to protect the American hen and her rural owner against the combined poultry of Europe.

I concede willingly the truth of all that the gentlemen say in the praise of their country constituents. We in New York City have an intimate acquaintance with and a real liking for the New York State farmers, and will never willingly suffer them to be injured by any form of legislation if they will only be fair with us. It seems to us often that they hardly appreciate our friendship. It seems to us that they allow their representatives in the State Legislature to treat us unfairly at Albany. From there, in their wisdom, these representatives regulate our docks and control our street openings; they fix the height of our buildings and the depth of our sewers; they manage the quarantine in our harbor and they arrange the rate of fare on our elevated roads. We are relieved by their kindness from any particular responsibility or trouble about our local tax levy, and they improve, as seems to them necessary from time to time, the charter of our city. Above all, our morals and personal habits and the manner of our observance of the Sabbath are their especial care. [Laughter.]

They study with great personal attention the errors of our metropolis, and they prepare yearly new and elaborate schemes for our reformation. They vote enthusiastic indorsements of home rule in Ireland and explain to us at the same time that New York is hardly fitted to govern itself. We recognize the truth of all the praises which have been bestowed on the farmers in this debate by almost every gentleman who has spoken, but we will never let pass any opportunity to ask them to treat their city neighbors and friends more kindly. And while their interests in this bill are so carefully watched and protected, it is perhaps not unfair that one of us from the city should glance over his district and see if there are no people of whom we can say, as my eloquent friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] said of the farmers, that they are "hard-working, earnest, intelligent, frugal, and moral," and whose interests may deserve some degree of consideration in connection with this bill.

The upper part of the city of New York is mainly a residence district. The majority of the people who live there live on fixed incomes paid them as salaries or wages every month, or by the proceeds of professional employment in which their incomes are limited. Some of them are architects, artists, clergymen, clerks in banks, insurance and law offices, journalists, musicians, lawyers, physicians, teachers, book-keepers, railroad employés, drivers, conductors, policemen, firemen, telegraph and telephone operators, salesmen, mechanical engineers, civil engineers, stenographers, printers, and skilled mechanics of all sorts not employed in industries which have protection under the present tariff.

In that district lives, too, an army of deserving women who earn their living by unprotected labor, and often that of others dependent upon them. There is perhaps a necessity within the course of this long debate that somebody should say a word for these people. The farmer has his eloquent advocate trained in the county and State fairs, who is in arms to defend every product of his ground. The workmen in factories and the manufacturers have their special advocates, who lie awake at night to study their interests and whose voices have been heard here every day since the beginning of this session, asking for one measure or another for their protection. Almost every class has had its advocates here, except perhaps the millionaires, whom nobody will own to represent, and who have no friends in this House.

Suppose, as examples of the class of people to whom I refer in the city of New York, we take the policeman, who guards our houses; the fireman, who will risk his life for our children; the reporter and the printer, who spend the night in preparing our morning papers; the carrier, who brings it through all kinds of weather, and the locomotive engineer on the elevated railroad, who takes us up and down town. These classes of workmen have no direct protection. They are not overpaid, nor is their life more luxurious than it ought to be. The money which they draw at the end of every month is not more than they need, and they are often sorely pinched to buy even the taxed doll to fill the taxed Christmas stocking or to pay for the taxed medicine necessary for any member of the family.

Perhaps an impartial examination may show that these people are as intelligent, as patriotic, and as deserving of consideration in the matter now before the House as are the Rhode Island mill operators or the Kansas farmers. Their wishes and views may be even as important to the Republican party. If you are to get any Republican votes in New York City you must get them from these people. These classes gave you under the wise management of Arthur votes enough to keep down the Democratic majority in the city so that a Republican President was elected by the vote of the State of New York. They gave in my district a Republican an election to Congress, largely because his Democratic opponent refused to support any measure of tariff reform, and voted against the consideration of the Morrison bill.

You can hardly afford to pass these voters over in your desire to conciliate the factory operatives and the farmers, unless, indeed, you have decided to elect your candidate without the vote of New York State. I have had it explained to me that this can easily be done. It is a favorite theory apparently of the same gentlemen who have decided that the city workingmen who gave the most outspoken and determined free-trader in this country, Mr. Henry George, 68,000 votes at an election when we could only get 60,000 for so good a candidate as Theodore Roosevelt, are wild with enthusiasm for the absolute maintenance of the present tariff; and of those other wise leaders of the party whose declared policy is to alienate the German voters who are still true to the Republican party, in order to please the Prohibitionists, who laugh at their concessions and have always sought and always will seek the downfall of that party.

I for one am not willing to accept such theories or acknowledge such leadership. In the interest of the Republican party, and in the interest of common fairness, I propose to ask gentlemen on this side of the House to consider for a moment how the present tariff, which we have promised to revise, now affects the people whom I have described, and to consider what they pay taxes on in the general distribution of the customs taxes now in force.

They pay upon everything. Look for a moment at what they eat. There is a tariff duty on beef, on pork, hams and bacon, butter and lard, cheese, molasses, grapes, wheat flour, oats, corn meal, rye, barley, potatoes, raisins, vinegar, honey, rice and rice meal, sugar, extract of meat, pickles, currants, apples, salt, and condensed milk. The list is substantially an inventory of the stock of the grocery store at which they buy. There is a duty on the coal which warms them, on their cooking and household utensils, on their entire clothing from their hats to their stockings, on the medicines given them when they are sick, and on the roofs over their heads. What the professional men object to pay is shown by a letter which I will ask to have printed as a part of my remarks:

NEW YORK, May 15, 1888.

To Hon. ASHBEL P. FITCH, M. C.:

I beg to address you as a member interested in the revision of the tariff. My plea is in behalf of instruments used in scientific medicine, which is the same as saying that they contribute to the exact information of the profession at large, and are without money profit to the possessor.

I can make you understand me by citing my own case.

For six years I have been pathologist to the New York Foundling Asylum, making post-mortem examinations for purposes of study upon the children that die, and recording the findings in detail. I have contributed to the professional stock of exact records nearly 1,500 cases. These are available for all time to the profession for reference.

A complete case for purposes of study consists in a carefully-recorded clinical history, with post-mortem findings and microscope examination of the structural charges in the tissues of the organs.

Now, it is the expert work of the pathologist to make the examinations, both gross and microscopic, of the ravages of disease, and it is upon this kind of work that medicine is to advance to the dignity of an exact science.

For my microscope I sent to Jena, where are made the best instruments for my work. At the factory it cost $91; to get it out of the custom-house 40 per cent. more.

Later I sent for an oil emersion lens, and paid $80 at the factory, 40 per cent. more at the custom-house.

Hermann Katsch, of Berlin, makes an instrument called microtome, for cutting infinitely thin sections or shavings from the surface of a piece of an organ of the body, hardened in alcohol. Herr Katsch is the only man in the world who makes this particular variety of the instrument. To prepare a section thin enough for careful study under the high powers of the microscope, this mechanism is necessary. To get this microtome from the custom-house I had to wait two weeks and pay a duty of 40 per cent. on its factory price.

The celebrated Dr. Koch, of Berlin, published a report of the cholera commission, conducted under the auspices of the Government. At most twenty men in this country could require this work, and they must needs pay 25 per cent. duty to get it from the custom-house after paying its publisher's price and freight. What use could this report be to these scientists? To aid them in maturing methods of recognizing the disease when it appeared on ship-board in our harbors; to devise means to suppress it; to protect the country.

It was to the expert work of one such scientist that the city of New York must give its gratitude that a certain steam-ship just developing cholera among its steerage passengers was detained at quarantine and the city escaped overwhelming infection.

For Koch's report he paid 25 per cent. duty and never received anything from the city or Government.

When we look up from our laboratory tables, microscopes, microtomes, and alcohol—taxed to suffocation—and read in the papers of the United States Treasury filled to suffocation, we reflect that our scientific work takes much time, brings no money return, increases our outgoes, and has not even the encouragement of the Government nor laity.

Respectfully yours,

DR. WILLIAM PERRY NORTHRUP.

Is it unfair to ask for these people a little consideration? Grant that we are to have a protective tariff; must we have this particular one forever?

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], whose argument against this bill has interested me greatly, said the other day, "Human wisdom has never devised statutes of taxation or methods of industrial development which are not subject to just criticism." I can not put in any better words my conviction that this tariff is a fair subject of discussion. We had lately a Republican President, under whose able and skillful management the Republican party was an important factor in political affairs in New York City, and who gained for us the last victory which our party has had in the city of New York. Few men knew the people of that city of all classes as well as he did. He had been collector at the port of New York and knew well the practical effect of the tariff, and he said in his message:

> I recommend an enlargement of the free-list so as to include within it the numerous articles which yield inconsiderable revenue, a simplification of the complex and inconsistent schedule of duties upon certain manufactures, particularly those of cotton, iron, and steel, and a substantial reduction of the duties upon those articles, and upon sugar, molasses, wool, and woolen goods.

On such Republican doctrines as that I am satisfied to rest. On such Republican doctrines as that we can ask for votes in the city of New York from the classes I have spoken of, and we will not then be forced to stand and defend, before people whose monthly wages hardly suffice for their necessary expenses, a tariff which imposes 25 per cent. on India-rubber boots and shoes and 10 per cent. on precious stones. [Applause.]

The commerce of New York, where most of the customs duties are collected, while it asks in vain for the money which is necessary to improve the water ways where $147,000,000 of our revenue is collected every year, pays cheerfully taxes which are used to keep up custom-houses where nothing is ever collected, and to carry the mails on routes which use up the great profits of the city offices, to build harbors in Texas, where a sailor who happened to be stranded would be lost and lonesome, to improve rapids in Tennessee which no one but the lumberman ever sees, and to dredge out creeks in Georgia which the Government engineers who are given charge of the work spend a month in trying to find. Just so the people of the city of New York, sooner than object in any way to the protective tariff, which they believe to be, if properly laid and fairly administered, for the good of the whole country, have paid without objection and cheerfully, on everything they use or touch or handle, from the beginning, these customs duties for the benefit of the manufacturer and his employé and the long-suffering farmer. The time has now come when a revision of the tariff has been promised by both parties, and when the present duties yield so large a revenue that its further accumulation has become admittedly dangerous. Is it strange that at this time and under these circumstances they ask that a readjustment, partially at least, in their interest, may take place? And is it unreasonable to ask that a tariff which puts jewelry at 25 per cent. and oil-cloth for tenement-house floors at 40 per cent. ad valorem; which brings in silver-plated harness at 35 per cent. and children's cotton stockings at 40 per cent.; under which India shawls of the finest quality pay 40 per cent. and common woolen shawls 86 per cent., should be modified? On the theory of protecting or pleasing the manufacturing laborer and the farmer the mass of people in my district in the city of New York have paid for many years, each of them, out of money which they can ill spare, more for their meals, their shelter, their clothes, and their medicines than these things ought to cost them.

The appreciation and kindly feelings which exist towards us in return from the most highly protected manufacturers is shown by the remark in this debate of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. O'NEILL, speaking in opposition to this bill, that "New York is in a large measure a foreign city." It is true, of course, that New York has many foreign-born citizens, and among them are a large number who bear the name of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Laughter and applause.] All of us in this country are foreign-born or are the descendants of European immigrants. Whoever speaks deprecatingly of the patriotism of the citizens who came to this country by choice and not by accident throws thereby a doubt on the integrity of that ancestor of his who first took the oath of allegiance to the United States.

I have little regard for the man who contrasts his own patriotism with that of his grandfather, to the disadvantage of the latter. It is true, too, that a visitor from Philadelphia, when he first steps into the busy streets of New York and sees the movement of the commerce of a continent, when he enters first into the life and amusement of a city as interesting as London and as charming as Paris, may easily feel that he has passed a boundary line, and is in another country than his own. [Laughter.] But if the gentleman meant, as he probably did, that New York was a foreign city in the sense of being un-American, he was simply as much mistaken as he would have been if he had said that William Penn was a native American, or that the German settlers in Pennsylvania, and their children, were not as good and patriotic citizens of this country as we are.

Now when we ask of the manufacturers who are represented by our kindly critic, Mr. O'NEILL, a fulfillment of the Republican promise to remedy the admitted irregularities of the tariff, they say that if we touch one article in the present dutiable list, if we add one article to the present free-list the whole protection scheme is in danger. Let me answer them by a quotation again from General Garfield, in the debate on the duty on coal, on March 10, 1871, in this House:

> I was surprised at a remark of the distinguished gentleman from Michigan. He asserted that there is no item in the whole tariff that can stand alone on its own merits, but that all must be taken in a lump in order to stand. That coal must take salt by the hand, and they, too, must take something else by the hand; and thus all interests unite with all forces before they can make a stand before the country. If this remark be true it strikes a blow at the whole tariff system. a blow I am not willing to strike. I am unwilling to admit that bad taxes must be tied to good ones and thus be kept afloat. I think it unwise to continue this duty on coal, and I am therefore in favor of its repeal.

That, gentlemen, was the view of the last Republican President when a member of this House. I quote him always with peculiar pleasure, for he was one of the Republican candidates who could not only excite great enthusiasm in his own party and among his personal friends, but who could get votes enough from the business people who care little for politics to be elected to office. It seems to me that General Garfield fully answered that objection, but the highly protected manufacturers have endless objections. They seem to think that they are to have a monopoly of objections. We must not ask for cheaper vegetables in the city; the farmer objects. We must not want cheaper clothes; the wool-grower objects. We must not ask for cheaper carpets or household utensils; the manufacturer objects. We must not ask for cheaper coal; the mine-owner objects. We must not claim cheaper sugar or rice; the planter objects.

Well, for one, I for my district of consumers, object to this chorus of objection. We do not own sheep; we can not raise rice or vegetables or sugar; we mine no coal in the Thirteenth district of New York. If every interest in this country which is protected is to come here and cry out at any proposed addition to the free-list or reduction of the tariff taxes, in the interest of the great principle of protection, we, in our turn, shall ask that our monthly wages and the limited incomes on which many of us must live shall have the protection promised us by both political platforms, and that not by and by, but now and in the Fiftieth Congress.

We shall ask this courteously and modestly now. If we are met only by selfish and determined refusals the request will have to be made more emphatically. Certainly we are willing to have a protective tariff, but we do not want an unreasonable and an unchangeable tariff. We want a tariff which shall protect where protection is needed, and a free-list which shall give us the necessaries of life on terms that are at least fair to all.

Gentlemen say that the tariff builds up a home market. Very good. In the residence district of New York City we are the home market; we use our monthly pay the whole year around to buy your goods. Now that you have an opportunity, now that you can afford it, now that you have promised it, be fair to your home market. Show us by timely and reasonable concessions that you are not entirely selfish, and we will, as we have heretofore, go on cheerfully paying more for every thing which we use than we think the goods ought to cost us.

The answer to this seemingly reasonable demand on our side of the House seems to be this in substance: It is true that the tariff ought to be revised. The party platform promised it; the last Republican President and his Secretaries advised it; the party conventions in many States have agreed to it; but it must be done only by the Republican party in a House of which that party shall have a majority.

There are two objections to this answer:

First. It is a postponement, an indefinite postponement of something which was promised four years ago, and ought to have been done before now. Whatever hopes gentlemen may have of the future, no one can say when we shall be strong enough to make and carry through by Republican votes alone a revision of the tariff. If you are to read out of the party everybody who reminds you of your promises, or who has any of the old Republican habits of free speech and candid criticism, perhaps you may never be strong enough to control the House. [Applause.] Even if the fall elections should return a majority of Republicans, nearly a year and a half must elapse before the Fifty-first Congress can even meet, and if a tariff debate like this should then ensue, certainly two years must pass before the present tariff can be changed. And it is more than probable that even then the highly protected industries would still find some new reason why action should be postponed for another indefinite period, and that their representatives would vote again as many gems of poetry and prosaic tables of figures as we have heard for the last two weeks to demonstrate that the slightest alteration of the sacred tariff for the relief of the people, on whom some portions of it weigh heavily, would end forever the prosperity of the country.

And it is still more likely that gentlemen who are interested in the preservation intact of the present tariff would claim that the election of a Republican House was a verdict of the people against any revision whatsoever. [Laughter.]

For my part I desire to consider this question now, in the Congress to which I was elected partly for the purpose of considering it. Whether the Fifty-first or Fifty-second or Fifty-third Congresses are to be Republican or Democratic, what their action may be in the changed circumstances under which they may meet, is something which concerns me at present very little. I propose to do what I can—recognizing how very little it is—towards fulfilling the promises of the party on this subject now, when I have an opportunity. [Applause.]

Second. It is an unpatriotic answer to the reasonable demand that our promises to reform the tariff be fulfilled to say that as a condition precedent we must first have a success of our own party. If the revision is right, if it is in the interest of the business and development of the country, as our conventions and our leading statesmen have said it was, I for one am willing to make it, whether there is any political capital in it or not.

It is a business question more than a political question, and it is a business question on which we are committed.

If a revision of the tariff is necessary, it seems to me to be as absurd to vote against it on party grounds as it would be to oppose the admittedly necessary appropriations for the Government because they are prepared in a Democratic committee and proposed to a Democratic House.

I am one of those who were disappointed that we have as yet before us no Republican bill to reform the tariff. I do not forget the excellent bill putting coal, sugar, molasses, rice, wool, and some raw materials on the free-list, introduced by my Republican friend from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], whose 43,000 votes at the last election demonstrate what a hold on his people his fidelity to their interests has given him. I admired his speech and I would gladly vote for his bill. But I mean that I had hoped that before this we would have had submitted to us a bill put forward by authority, framed by gentlemen whose length of service and great ability fitted them for such a task, a bill in regard to which all of us would have been consulted, in which our varying views could have been compromised, a bill in which all of us would have yielded something to reach a common agreement.

For such a bill, framed by such high authority, perfected by such consultation, and giving to the people of our city some of the benefits to which we think they are entitled, even if it did not give us all which we could desire, I would have given my support most heartily. Instead of such a bill, those of us who think that the reform of the tariff is a business question, and who are committed to its support, are given so far only an eloquent denunciation of the manner in which this bill under consideration was made. For myself, I do not know that I care particularly how it was made or who made it. If the gentlemen who denounce its authors and the place where it was constructed will prepare, in a manner in their judgment more suitable for the purpose, a better bill than this one, I shall certainly be glad to give my support to their measure in preference to any other. But if I am asked to oppose this bill, not so much on account of its contents as on account of its history, I must decline to do so, even if I stand alone on this side of the House.

The history of the bill before it came before us is as immaterial to me as was the political history of the voters who sent me here before their appearance at the polls. I did not decline their suffrages on account of their antecedents, and if 6,500 of them could afford to forget their Democracy and give that district to a Republican I can in my turn forget the origin of this bill in the consideration of the question whether it is in the interest of my district and in the line of what I claimed in the canvass to be the belief of my party and my own belief. There is something better than Republicanism or Democracy, and that is common honesty. I have insisted, over and over for years in my district, that the Republican party was committed to tariff reform. I have attacked, in the canvass, my Democratic opponent for doing exactly that which gentlemen here propose that the Republican party should do. If the gentlemen in charge of the party interests on this floor propose to abandon the position which I and others have defended and insisted upon, it is not for me to criticise their wisdom; but I can not recognize their authority to make me give up the convictions which were good Republican doctrine when I adopted them and to break promises which I feel bound in honor to fulfill.

I can not as yet know in what shape this bill will come before us for final action. I believe that it should be amended in many particulars before it is passed, and I have submitted and shall submit some amendments which seem to me necessary. I can not as yet know whether or not a Republican substitute will be offered, or if there be one what it will cover. This much, however, I know now, that whenever I have an opportunity to vote for any measure which seems to offer the relief which I believe my people are entitled to have, and which I have myself for years insisted should be given them, I shall not fail to vote in their interest and for my own convictions, without regard to the consequences of my vote to myself. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR].

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, when I requested the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL] to permit me to interrupt him my object was to make a statement which would have relieved him very greatly from seeming, if not intentional, misrepresentation of a fact to which his statement related. I wanted to say to him, and I now avail myself of the courtesy of the gentleman from Michigan to make the statement, that he who undertakes to make a comparison of figures between 1867 and 1861 as to the sheep flocks of Ohio and then undertakes to apply those figures to a solution of the effect of the tariff revision of 1867 upon that industry errs very greatly in the force of his argument.

Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan. I yield the gentleman another minute.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The tariff of 1867 found the sheep flocks of Ohio of a character not fitted for the production of wool; they were killed and sold in various ways. As rapidly as new grades of sheep could be imported and bred the flocks of sheep grew up in Ohio, and steadily improved in numbers until 1883. I have included in the speech which I had the honor to make a table showing the exact number of sheep in Ohio, the steady growth of the flocks up to 1884, and their steady diminution from 1884 to the present time. I place these statements as matters of fact against the mere flippant declaration of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

[Mr. ALLEN, of Michigan, withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. DALZELL. I had no intention to take any part in this discussion. My name is not on the Speaker's list, and I have the floor now only by the courtesy of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN], who yielded to me a portion of his time.

I do not rise to make a speech in defense of the protective system, but to correct some gross misstatements of fact that have been made on the floor of this House in respect to certain of the industries of my district, to expose in their true light the illogical, inconsequential, and basurd conclusions sought to be drawn from those misstatements, and to resent impertinent intrusion into the private affairs of certain of my constituents and misrepresentations in respect thereto.

I find the text for the few remarks that I propose to make in the very extraordinary screed read on the floor of this House on Friday last by the gentleman who represents the Erie district of Pennsylvania. I call it extraordinary because, for one reason, the gentleman saw fit therein to class himself with statesmen, and at the same time to characterize as a "demagogue with his mouth full of catch-words," and "a Bourbon," every member of that very large and very respectable class that does not believe that political economy is an exact science, or that the gentleman from Erie is a statesman. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

I shall not stop to discuss his claims to that lofty title nor to explore with a precision which might prove distasteful so as exactly to locate "a demagogue with his mouth full of catch-words." The American people may very safely be left to pass judgment on that question, and history generally manages to locate public men in their proper places without the use of such men's own yard-sticks.

Nor shall I stop to discuss the learned propositions of constitutional law to which the gentleman holds. I prefer not to measure swords with him in that arena. With respect to the constitutional right to levy a protective tariff I am a Bourbon to the extent that the origin of the Constitution, the practice of the Republic for a hundred years, the opinions of the fathers, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are amply satisfying to my conservative mind.

But I would like to know who it was that told the gentleman that Thomas Jefferson ever said any such thing as he puts into his mouth as having been said in answer to Alexander Hamilton when, as the gentleman states, Hamilton and Washington were engaged in "building up a business aristocracy as an important part of a projected government of corruption and splendor." I say to the gentleman that whoever gave him the information played on his credulity; that Thomas Jefferson, in his sixth annual message to Congress, in 1806, discussing the question of a surplus, put the pertinent inquiry, "Shall we suppress the impost and give the advantage to foreign over domestic manufactures?" And I would be further pleased to be advised in what edition of American history the gentleman found it recorded that the Presidential campaign of 1800 was fought on the issue of protective tariff and settled on the gentleman's side "by the American people in favor of Thomas Jefferson and the Constitution." I fear that somebody again has been playing on his credulity. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

But when the gentleman leaves those departments of statesmanship which involve history and philosophy and quotation and gets down to a description of the present bill, I do not find so much fault with him.

I find that the bill has been framed in the interest of the whole people, and for two purposes.

A MEMBER. Who says that?

Mr. DALZELL. I am reading from the speech of the gentleman from the Erie district.

First, to stay the mounting surplus in the Treasury, and, second, to relieve the overburdened industries of the country from excessive taxation, the proceeds of which do not pass into the Treasury, but go directly to the support of grasping monopolies, which are for the most part combined in utterly indefensible and atrociously oppressive trusts.

We shall find a little later on that the statesman from Erie is the inveterate and unrelenting foe of monopolies and the enthusiastic champion of the wage-worker and of the rights of labor. [Laughter.] Now, the method by which this twofold benign purpose is to be accomplished is also twofold. Our industries are to be relieved and our labor interests advanced by throwing open to the world our markets with respect to certain things to be put upon the free-list, and the revenue is to be decreased by lowering the import duties 7.7 per cent.; so that the imports that are now kept out by the present tariff may come in in an ever-increasing stream under the new. I do not believe that I need discuss that part of the gentleman's position, because I am again Bourbon enough to believe that history repeats itself; and as all experience in the past discloses that lower import duties mean increased revenue, so I believe that all experience in the future will disclose the same thing.

But I come down now to that in which I am particularly interested, and which in all probability prompted my appearance on the floor today. The statesman from Erie asserts that the proposition that protection gives a home market to the farmer is, to use his elegant language, "a fallacy and a fraud," and he illustrates his position by supposing a case, namely, that of a farmer in the neighborhood of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, at Braddock, in my district, and this, as I say, is the point at which I begin to have some interest. As I have lived within sight of Braddock Field for nearly twenty years, and in sight of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works ever since they were erected, I may be permitted to say that the illustration of the gentleman contains not a line or a letter consistent with truth. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

The fact is that he could by no possibility have selected an illustration which would more thoroughly and effectually refute his theory. Industrious farmers near the Edgar Thomson Steel Works have been affected as farmers always have been, are now, and always will be, by the planting of a manufacturing establishment in their midst.

They are no longer obliged to raise wheat or to come into competition with Mark Lane, London. The teeming population of the steel-works furnishes to them a market, and a market such as they never had before, and for products that they could never sell before—for all sorts of garden truck, vegetables, milk, butter, and all that sort of thing. If the statesman from Erie did not know that, he was grossly ignorant; if he was not grossly ignorant, his is a bad case of moral strabismus. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

But when he pursues his illustration further, to the extent of picturing the farmer, discouraged but not disheartened, struggling to pay off the mortgage upon his farm which cost him $100 an acre, the ridiculousness of his illustration becomes sublimely grotesque. The men who bought their farms in the neighborhood of Braddock for $100 an acre have long since sold them at $2,000 an acre. The statesman from Erie [laughter], if he wanted to buy an acre there, would find it difficult to buy one anywhere within miles of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works, on the banks of the Monongahela River, or in the valley of Turtle Creek, for $2,000 an acre.

But, to pursue the gentleman's illustration, my heart fairly bled for this industrious farmer (who must have been a neighbor of mine) when he found himself obliged to pay 3.3 cents a pound for a steel beam. [Laughter.] What the farmer wanted the steel beam for the statesman from Erie did not explain. [Renewed laughter.] But, thinking it over, I consoled myself with the idea that he probably did not want many pounds and that possibly he had something left out of the $2,000 that he got for the last acre that he sold.

The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that the erection of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works has changed Braddock from a straggling village into a busy town, filled with an intelligent, industrious, cheerful, and prosperous population; a town wherein there are two national banks, handsome stores, paved streets, an opera house, and a public library founded by the munificence of Mr. Andrew Carnegie.

Mr. SCOTT. Out of proceeds plundered from the American people [applause on the Democratic side]; contributed as a part of the plunder to secure the $500,000 that he admitted to me he had put in his pocket in one year.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I had no idea that I had hurt the gentleman half so badly thus far. [Laughter on the Republican side.] I hope he will try to keep his temper.

Mr. SCOTT. I will answer you if the House will give me the time.

Mr. DALZELL. But the misapprehension of the statesman from Erie as to what he was talking about when he made use of this illustration is mild as compared with his delusion when he talks about the profits of the steel company and the percentage of wages paid to their employés. It is just at this point (and the gentleman has only this moment illustrated it) that his moral strabismus becomes actually pitiable. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

In estimating the cost of manufacture, and therefore the manufacturer's profit, the statesman from Erie ignores altogether $20,000,000 of invested capital. [Laughter.] He omits any allowance for depreciation of plant, for insurance, for taxes, for repairs, for transportation, for commissions. He allows nothing even for the cost of fuel to furnish the steam power, and he omits, according to his own confession, the cost of spiegeleisen, an element necessary to be used in the manufacture of steel rails.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him a question?

Mr. DALZELL. Well, I am not dealing now with anybody but the statesman from Erie; the statesman from Ohio may come further along. [Laughter.]

It must therefore be absolutely and mathematically true that the figures he gives as to cost and profits are deceptive and unreliable. To suit his own purposes he further puts a fancy figure upon steel rails, namely $37.50, when the report of his own committee, which he signs, puts it at $31.50.

Mr. SCOTT. Here are your own figures on the price of steel rails.

Mr. DALZELL. I do hope the gentleman will keep his temper. [Laughter.] Add now to the cost of a ton of steel rails at $26.79, the gentleman's own figures, the omitted items of cost, and take $6 off his selling price, and then, having solved that problem, define for me the difference between a statesman and a demagogue. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] His figures as to the percentage of wages to the cost of production are even wilder, if that were possible, than those he has already given us. He seems to assume that Bessemer pig-iron grows on the trees at the Edgar Thomson furnace, and even then he does not allow anything for the labor of picking it. [Laughter.]

All the figures that relate to labor, beginning with the ore in the mine, its loading and unloading; with the coal in the hills, its mining, its carriage to the coke oven, its transformation into coke, its transportation to the place of consumption—all the various figures that go to make a ton of Bes-emer steel represent very little more than labor, are suppressed; and the absurd conclusion is announced that the percentage of labor to the selling price is 10.9 per cent. Why, the first figure in his calculation is $18 for a ton of Bessemer pig; and he knows—I think he knows—that of the $18, $16.50 represent labor; and he deliberately left that out in his calculation when he read his screed in the House.

Mr. SCOTT. There is a duty of $6.72 a ton on pig-iron and $17 on steel rails. Does the gentleman forget that?

Mr. DALZELL. I do not.

Mr. SCOTT. Then he is misstating and misrepresenting the facts. Recollect that there is a duty of $6.72 a ton on pig-iron and $17 on steel rails, making $23.72.

Mr. DALZELL. Yet the statesman from Erie, when he comes to boasting, contradicts himself. He tells us that from his practical experience of a third of a century in coal-mines, labor there gets 70 to 85 per cent. of the selling price of the product. I suppose that must have been coal not mined to be made into coke or to go to steel works. With respect to his figures representing wages of coal-miners, which you will find in his speech in the RECORD, I was told to-day by an intelligent and competent miner that if any such wages were ever paid they were exceptional.

I hope the gentleman is listening to me now, because I affirm that if those wages ever were paid, they were paid at Scott Haven, in Pennsylvania, in store orders upon a truck store, kept in violation of the laws of Pennsylvania, by means of which the employer is enabled to rob his employés.

The gentleman's figures as to the steel beams are just as inaccurate as his other figures, for the reason that he starts to get the final result with the steel-rail figures as a premise, and of course the result must be as incorrect as the premise.

Now, that is about all that the gentleman said with respect to this particular industry in my immediate neighborhood, and having demonstrated that with respect to this industry his figures are wrong, I have accomplished my purpose in rising, and I do not care to pursue him further.

With respect to every other subject that he touched upon, it will be found on examination that his methods were the same; and he even resorts to the flimsy business of disproving the plain conceded facts of history by the percentage method, by which I mean, of course, the method which ignores the fact that a given sum is a larger percentage of a small sum than it is of a larger one. [Laughter.]

But I must not leave my colleague simply with words of criticism. I have words of praise for him, too. My heart bounded as I heard him roll off from his screed words of denunciation of "monopolies" and "base and indefensible trusts." I congratulate him upon becoming the champion of labor; but I congratulate more the great army of labor in this country upon the accession to its ranks of the statesman from Erie. I cry a threatening warning to the hosts of "monopoly" and of "pernicious and indefensible trusts" that their destroyer is in the field. What labor has gained and monopoly lost by the conversion of the statesman from Erie it would be difficult for any one not living, as I do, in Western Pennsylvania adequately to appreciate.

Turn for a moment, if you will, to the autobiography of the statesman of Erie as contained in the Congressional Directory. [Laughter.] I read:

> Engaged, in 1850, in the coal and shipping business, owning and running several vessels on the Lakes; subsequently became largely interested in the manufacture of iron and the mining of coal, as well as in the construction and operation of railroads—

[Laughter.]

I beg your attention to this—> either as president or director of various lines aggregating over 22,000 miles of completed road, the greatest number of miles of railroad, probably, which any one individual was ever an officer or director of.

[Laughter and applause.]

Think of that for a labor champion [renewed laughter] and for an opponent of monopolies and indefensible trusts? There will be much joy among the miners of Scott Haven; there will be tears of gratitude on many a blanched cheek; the light of hope in many a lack-luster eye; a benediction and the sweet incense of thanksgiving from humble hearthstones in the poverty-stricken huts of Scott Haven, when the news shall arrive that the statesman of Erie is no longer their oppressor, but has become their champion and friend. [Laughter and applause.]

Think of the consternation in the strongholds of monopoly and amongst the naughty partners in indefensible trusts!

If it were given me, Mr. Chairman, to advise the historian of the future, I would have him choose for his most dramatic page the statesman of Erie, when like some mediæval knight clad in armor, with visor down and lance apoise, his pennon flying, its motto, "Death to monopoly," he rides down the cheering line of admiring labor, full tilt in his conquering career of glory. [Laughter and applause.]

But here, Mr. Chairman, I would leave him with only a word of friendly advice, for which I charge him nothing. It is not statesmanlike to discuss the private affairs of your neighbors behind their backs. Besides, this House and the country are no more interested in the question whether Mr. Andrew Carnegie has a summer castle amid the hills of his native Scotland than they are in the question whether the statesman of Erie has a $5,000 clerk and a $10,000 cook. [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, yesterday evening I received a letter by special messenger from the member from Pennsylvania who has just taken his seat, as follows:

> HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, Washington, May 15, 1888.
> DEAR SIR: Some time during the session to-morrow, probably in the afternoon, I propose to make some observations with respect to your speech of Friday last. I think you will probably be interested, and hope you may be present.
>
> Yours, truly,
> JOHN DALZELL.
> Hon. W. L. SCOTT.

A letter so courteous, Mr. Chairman, could not but receive that consideration to which it seemed to be entitled. I have therefore, sir, remained here all day waiting until the member from Pennsylvania might have an opportunity to explain to this House and the country wherein, as has been whispered about, I was mistaken in the facts presented in my speech of Friday last. Sir, I expected the gentleman, as the special representative of the trust interests of this country, to come here prepared at least to say something in rebuttal of the facts I have presented. With those interests, representing $20,000,000, at his back to supply him with the data necessary to refute my statements, with five days to prepare a carefully written speech which he has just delivered, with time unlimited in which to deliver it, I have waited here until this late hour expecting to hear the statements I have made controverted, or at least denied. But, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania confines himself to the subject only in a criticism of my historical allusions and ridiculing my illustration of the Braddock farmer. There he stops and devotes the remainder of his speech to a personal vilification of myself.

Mr. DALZELL rose.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he has ever heard of the case of the Thomson estate?

Mr. DALZELL. Against whom?

Mr. SCOTT. Against the Pennsylvania Steel Company. I propose to state here facts brought up in a court of justice and which can not be disputed.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh! I know all about that case.

Mr. SCOTT. I paid very close attention to what the gentleman said.

Mr. DALZELL. I am giving you attention.

Mr. SCOTT. I will ask the Clerk simply to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> At the auditing of the account of the trustees of the estate of Edgar Thomson, the decedent, the following facts appeared:
> The testator at his death owned one thousand shares of stock of the Pennsylvania Steel Company. This company being in need of funds, the stock at the time having been somewhat depressed, sold to the Pennsylvania Railway Company six thousand shares, and used the proceeds to improve its plant and carry on a larger business, which proved very remunerative, and in December, 1881, the directors of the Pennsylvania Steel Company authorized their president to repurchase of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company five thousand shares at $265 a share; which was accordingly done and duly paid for. At the purchase it was stipulated that the Pennsylvania Steel Company should immediately offer to its shareholders to take their pro rata proportion of these five thousand shares at par, and that the Pennsylvania Railroad Company should also take and pay for the shares which might be allotted to it on the remaining one thousand shares which had not been resold to the Pennsylvania Steel Company.
> On the same day a communication marked "confidential" was sent to each stockholder of the Pennsylvania Steel Company, citing the facts and offering to apportion these shares pro rata and at par among the stockholders of the company. The rate for fractional shares was fixed at $200 a share. At the time of this purchase the undivided profits of the Pennsylvania Steel Company amounted to $3,286,423.51. The net cost to the company of the purchase was $825,000, leaving a surplus of profits which amounted to $2,461,423.51.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in my remarks of Friday last I only referred to one steel works in our State in connection with their enormous profits under the protective system, and I have merely had read the case which I sent to the Clerk's desk as corroborative evidence of what I stated in connection with the Edgar Thomson Steel Works and their profits, and which the gentleman in his remarks has not attempted to refute. The Pennsylvania Steel Company, with a capital stock of $2,000,000, I think, after the payment of dividends, had surplus earnings amounting to $3,286,423.51, and these large accumulated profits were earned during a period when the iron and steel industries of this country could hardly be called in their most prosperous condition.

But, Mr. Chairman, the member from Pennsylvania appears here as the special attorney of the proprietors of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works and their interests, and he has not had one word to say on behalf of the wage-workers employed in that industry.

Will the member from Pennsylvania rise in his seat and say that he believes Carnegie & Co., in forcing their men by Pinkerton's detectives to go back at 10 per cent. reduction on their wages, considering their enormous profits, can be justified? Does he justify it?

Mr. DALZELL. Do you want me to answer the question?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, I want you to answer it.

Mr. DALZELL. There are two answers. The first is that you are trying to divert this House from the subject that I discussed, and which I would like you to meet. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, answer the question. Do not try to evade it.

Mr. DALZELL. And this is the second, that the statement that the Edgar Thomson people compelled their employés to go back by detectives is untrue in fact.

Mr. SCOTT. I did not state that, but I stated that they covered their works with Pinkerton detectives and then hired foreign labor to come there and drive their men out. And you are standing here to-day professing to represent an enlightened constituency, and yet advocate the man who would be guilty of such an act as that. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DALZELL rose.

Mr. SCOTT. No; just let me proceed now.

Mr. DALZELL. But do you not want me to answer your question?

Mr. SCOTT. I say to the gentleman that he has mistaken his calling.

Mr. DALZELL. That may be; but do you not want me to reply?

Mr. SCOTT. I do; but I have but five minutes left. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Then you ought not to ask any questions.

Mr. BRUMM. We will give an extension of your time.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Will the statesman from Erie allow a question right at this point?

Mr. SCOTT. No, sir; you are a general interrupter, and I will not yield to your questions. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SCOTT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I admire the patriotism of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the interest of those he represents. But I would like to know how many days' labor he ever furnished to the wage-worker of this country. I would like to know when the week came around how many men have ever been on his pay-rolls.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, I am not a millionaire, and do not pretend to be. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SCOTT. Oh, you are not. You have had the opportunity of being a millionaire, but you have not had the brains to get there. [Derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, no, I had not the opportunity.

Mr. SCOTT. It is just such gentlemen as the member from Pennsylvania whom the Constitution and the laws of this country are intended to protect and whom we are all endeavoring to protect to enable all, whatever their abilities may be, to get an honest living.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, I can take care of myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has not denied, or at least he has not submitted any figures or facts denying, the statement I made that $4.09 was the total amount that labor received in the production of a ton of steel rails.

Mr. DALZELL. Why, certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I can prove right here that what you state is not true.

Mr. DALZELL. Now will the statesman from Erie allow me just a minute?

Mr. SCOTT. No, sir. Here is a contract under seal, as awarded by the board of arbitration between the Edgar Thomson Steel Works and their employés, specifying the number of men employed, the work they were to do, and the percentage each man was to get. I will further state to the gentleman that if he can induce his principals to open up their books, if he will get up on this floor and offer a resolution appointing a select committee to go to the Edgar Thomson Steel Works and ascertain from them what they pay for their labor or what it costs to produce a ton of steel rails, I will open every book I have, every balance-sheet I have. I will take them up to Scott Haven and compare the wage-workers of Scott Haven with those of the industries which the gentleman here is pleading for, and I will abide by the report of that committee, and a majority of it may be gentlemen on the other side if they are only honest and square men.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman include, also, his anthracite miners?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, the anthracite miners, too.

Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that a question so important as this to the whole country could have been discussed on this floor without personal attacks upon any gentleman. I made no personal charges against the proprietors of the Edgar Thomson Steel Works. I merely stated facts in connection with that industry as shown by their contracts, and I merely stated what the senior member of that firm had admitted to me in the Committee on Ways and Means, that he had drawn this amount of money which I stated he had drawn, namely, $1,500,000 in one year as his share of the profits, and I made certain illustrations in connection with it. But it appeared to have stuck in the heart of the gentleman who has just preceded me, and in answer to my facts he comes here and makes a personal attack upon me. I can say to him, sir, that I mind it no more than I would the barking of a dog in the street. [Applause on the Democratic side and derisive laughter on the Republican side.]

I will stand upon my record at home and with my people. And if I have ever been the oppressor of labor, if I have ever ejected a man from his home, if I have ever endeavored in my life, although I have been, I may say, a large employer of labor, to put one laborer in the place of another, or to force one man in the place of another; if I have employed a detective—not a Pinkerton detective, merely, but any other kind of a detective—to come and protect my property or to protect it against the men that are working for me, or have worked for me, I, sir, will resign my seat and leave this Hall the day it is proved.

Mr. BRUMM. Does the gentleman not contribute to pay the coal and iron police?

Mr. SCOTT. I never so contributed. I know you made a statement on this floor that I had employed Pinkerton's detectives, which is false.

Mr. BRUMM. And I will prove it.

Mr. SCOTT. I will make you prove it. I am going to bring you before the bar of this House and make you prove that charge.

Mr. BRUMM. All right; I will be there.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's argument in regard to my employing a $10,000 cook has the same foundation for truth that some of his other statements have; and if such were the fact, sir, I could only compare the wages paid my cook with the wages paid by his clients at the Edgar Thomson Steel Works. As to the salaries paid my secretaries, or at least those who assist me in my business, if he refers to the men in my employ, I can tell him that there are a good many of them who get more than $5,000 a year.

Now, I have nothing more to say. I have been identified with the laborers of this country all my life; I have worked and toiled with them; and when I start out to rob anybody or to get anybody's money it will not be the money of the wage-worker of this country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House the committee will now rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill H. R. 9051, had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 5.30 p. m. having arrived the House, pursuant to order, stands in recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m.

The House was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN as Speaker pro tempore, who directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 16, 1888.

I hereby designate Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN to preside as Speaker pro tempore at this evening's session.

JOHN G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

TARIFF.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. WICKHAM. Mr. Chairman, we are engaged in discussing no matter of ordinary legislation. The bill under debate touches upon subjects that affect every hearth-stone in the land. It will reach, if passed, with its invisible hand into the parlor of the rich, and fail not to affect the cabin of the poor. It will not only touch these extremes, by its direct action, but also reach them by its equally as certain indirect effect. It will come home not to one class alone, but to all classes and conditions.

Well may I say, then, that it is no ordinary subject of legislation. It will determine, if adopted, the manner in which, the extent to which, and effect with which, all the vast revenues necessary to support the immense machinery of our Government shall be drawn into the Treasury.

A piece of legislation, having for its end and aim such results, demands our best endeavor and our most patient consideration, and the exercise of our highest patriotism. We may not, each for himself, consider alone the wants and interests of our respective localities, but it becomes our duty to take a broad and comprehensive view of the whole country, with the intent and purpose to do that which will redound most to the welfare of all the people.

If we honestly approach this discussion in this spirit, with our gaze fixed steadily and unswervingly upon this polar sta which should guide all our actions, we can not fail to do that which will commend itself to our conscience and better judgment, and resul in benefits, far reaching and permanent, to all classes and conditions—the high and the low, the rich and the poor—the only legitimate and just object of all general legislation.

OUR SYSTEM.

We have, and for many years have had, a protective system of revenue collection. It is not perhaps in some of its details without imperfections and defects, but it was designed to have and has had the effect of protecting our industries against the competition of foreign industries of like kinds.

It is in the main a system that sprang into existence through the necessity for a large revenue growing out of the war of the rebellion, and it has been continued with some modifications through the necessity of large revenue, growing out of the results of the war.

War is a curse taken in every view, but in some of the aspects of our late war it was not an unmixed evil. It not only destroyed the worst system of human bondage that ever existed among men; it not only resulted in a restored Union of the States, more firmly cemented than before, but it caused to be demonstrated, in keeping with what protectionists have always contended, that a protective tariff would not only bring prosperity to industries already begun, but would encourage and stimulate the establishment and prosperity of new ones in the land; that such a tariff would not only stimulate and develop manufactures, strictly so-called, but would also protect labor engaged in all other departments as well—in mining, agriculture, stock-raising, wool-growing, and common day labor; that it would drive the blood of prosperity into every artery of the commercial and industrial body; that while it would not decrease the estates of the rich, it would immensely enhance the material prosperity and comfort of the great middling and poorer classes; that from a country comparatively poor and undeveloped it would in less than a quarter of a century develop a mighty empire of prosperous people, and that, too, notwithstanding during the same period a relentless civil war of four years' duration wiped out of existence labor and property to the extent of $5,000,000,000, and destroyed or greatly impaired the energies and producing power of a million of men, equal at least to twenty million years' labor of a strong man; that it would, from a time when the middling class lived in a comparative deprivation of many of the necessaries, bring us to a time when the poor would be living in good houses, well furnished, be wearing good clothing and enjoying many other comforts and even luxuries.

Before the enactment of the tariffs of 1861 and 1867 it is within the memory of very many upon this floor that the homes of the mechanics, laborers, and farmers of our country contained only the barest necessaries; that upon their floors were found no carpets, in their "best rooms" no musical instruments, upon their walls no decorations of art; that their means of transportation, for the most part, consisted of the ox-cart or lumber wagon; while to-day, after twenty-five years of a protective system, upon their floors are found the finest products of the loom, in their parlors are heard the sweet tones of the piano, their walls are covered with exquisite designs in paper or fresco and hung with the productions of the artist, while the owners ride to their devotions or on their pleasure in carriages which in days before the war were rarely used by the rich.

These results of a protective system, an enumeration of which might be greatly enlarged, were, long before the beginning of the tariff system that made them possible, even from the beginning of our government, foretold and promised by our wisest and most patriotic statesmen. What their clear and prophetic vision saw our day has realized.

Yea, more; the establishment of the Union of these States grew out of a necessity felt by the people of the colonies for protection against the importation of foreign-made goods and the consequent destruction of our own manufactures.

During the period between the Revolutionary war and the adoption of the Constitution, a period of six years, the distress and depression and gloom that had settled upon the people as a result of the absolutely free foreign trade under which they were living, which had resulted in the destruction of the manufactures of the land and the drainage of all the specie from the country, drove our fathers to the plan of the formation of a "more perfect union," as a measure by which to secure protection against England, who had become tenfold more formidable by reason of the importations of the products of her factories, in competition with ours, than she had been during the war on the battle-field.

I know that upon this floor, during this debate, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] has contended that there is no warrant in the Constitution for the passage of laws designed to protect labor. He asks, with great emphasis: "But what right have you to protect labor?" Mr. Chairman, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and before the Revolution, there was a well-defined and accepted distinction between the two powers of "levying taxes to raise revenue" and "laying duties for the regulation of commerce." The right to regulate commerce by the laying of duties was never denied to the mother country by the colonies, but the right to levy taxes for revenue was denied, because the colonies were without representation.

As early as 1766 Benjamin Franklin, in his famous examination before the House of Commons, recognized the distinction. The questions and his answers were as follows:

Q. What will be the opinion of the Americans on these resolutions? [Asserting the right of Great Britain to tax America.]

A. They will think them unconstitutional and unjust.

Q. Was it an opinion in America before 1763 that the Parliament had no right to lay taxes and duties there?

A. I never heard any objections to the right of laying duties to regulate commerce, but a right to lay internal-revenue taxes was never thought to be in Parliament.

Q. On what do you found your opinion that the people of America make any such distinction?

A. I know that whenever the subject has occurred in conversation it has appeared the opinion of every one that we could not be taxed by a Parliament when we were not represented. But the payment of duties laid as regulations of commerce was never disputed.

In the same year Lord Chatham, in the House of Commons, in his celebrated speech on the "right of taxing America," recognized the distinction when he said:

If the gentleman does not understand the difference between external and internal taxes I can not help it. There is a plain distinction between taxes laid for the purpose of raising revenue and duties imposed for the regulation of trade for the accommodation of the subject, although in the consequences some revenue may incidentally arise from the latter.

On the same occasion he further said:

The commons of America, represented in their general assemblies, have ever been in possession of this constitutional right of giving and granting their own money. They would have been slaves if they had not enjoyed it! At the same time this kingdom, as the supreme governing and legislative power, has always bound the colonies by her laws, by her regulations and restrictions in trade, in navigation, in manufactures, in everything except that of taking their money out of their pockets without their consent.

In the House of Lords, in 1775, we find Lord Chatham using the following language:

Let this distinction, then, remain forever ascertained—taxation is theirs, commercial regulation is ours. As an American, I would recognize to England her supreme right of regulating commerce and navigation; as an Englishman by birth and principle, I recognize to the Americans their supreme, unalienable right in their property—a right which they are justified in the defense of to the last extremity.

Among the earliest proceedings of the Congress of Independence, recorded in its Journals October 14, 1774, may be found the following unanimous declaration with reference to the colonies:

They are entitled to a free and exclusive power of legislation in their several provincial legislatures, where their right of representation can alone be preserved, in all cases of taxation and internal policy, subject only to the negative of the sovereign, in such manner as has been heretofore used and accustomed; but from the necessity of the case, and in regard to the mutual interests of both countries, we cheerfully consent to the operation of such acts of the British Parliament as are bona fide restrained to the regulation of our external commerce, for the purpose of securing the commercial advantages of the whole empire to the mother country, and the commercial benefits of the respective members, excluding every idea of taxation, external or internal, for raising a revenue on the subjects in America without their consent.

In 1778, Lord North, for the purpose of winning back the insurgent American colonies to their allegiance to the British Crown, procured the passage of a bill by Parliament, which contained an offer of unconditional surrender of the original ground of controversy, in these words:

It is expedient to declare that the King and Parliament of Great Britain will not impose any duty or tax for the purpose of raising a revenue in the colonies, except only such duties as may be expedient to impose for the regulation of commerce.

I have quoted these authorities to show that there was previous to and during the Revolutionary war, and down to the adoption of the Constitution, a well-understood and well-defined distinction between "duties imposed for the regulation of commerce" and "duties imposed for raising a revenue." And we find this distinction well preserved in the Constitution, for we find expressed in that instrument not only the power conferred upon Congress—

To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises—

But the further and distinct power—

To regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

It seems clear, in the light of the language of the men whom I have quoted, that the power to regulate commerce involved the power to restrain and regulate the importation of foreign articles of commerce. But we are not limited to our own opinion. Let us hear what historians, framers of the Constitution, their contemporaries, and the great expounders of its meaning have said. James Madison, one of the framers of the Constitution, and whose qualifications as an expounder of its meaning will not be denied by any one, said in his letter to Joseph C. Cabell under date of September 18, 1828:

It is a simple question, under the Constitution of the United States, whether the power to regulate trade with foreign nations as a distinct and substantive item in the enumerated powers embraces the object of encouraging by duties, restrictions, and prohibitions the manufactures and products of the country. And the affirmative must be inferred from the following considerations:

Which he proceeds at length to enumerate. Bancroft, in speaking of this period, says:

Of the many causes promoting union, four above others exercised a steady and commanding influence. The new Republic as one nation must have power to regulate its foreign commerce, to colonize its large domain, to provide an adequate revenue, and to establish justice in domestic trade, by prohibiting the several States from impairing the obligation of contracts. Each of these causes was of vital importance; but the necessity for regulating commerce gave the immediate impulse to a more perfect Constitution.

It was with the belief impressed upon his mind that the impending ruin hanging over the people of the Confederacy was the result of the unrestrained foreign trade, that Fisher Ames said in this House in 1789, when debating the first tariff bill:

I conceive, sir, that the present Constitution was dictated by commercial necessity more than any other cause. The want of an efficient government to secure the manufacturing interest and to advance our commerce was long seen by men of judgment and pointed out by patriots solicitous to promote general welfare.

Daniel Webster, that giant expositor of the Constitution, and who was thoroughly acquainted with its history and to the causes which led to its adoption, said in 1833:

The protection of American labor against the injurious competition of foreign labor, so far at least as respects general handicraft productions, is known historically to have been one end designed to be obtained by establishing the Constitution.

And in 1844 he said:

I defy the man in any degree conversant with history, in any degree acquainted with the annals of this country from 1787 to the adoption of the Constitution in 1789, to say that this [laying duties for the protection of American labor and industries] was not a leading, I may almost say, the leading motive, South as well as North, for the formation of the new Government. Without that provision in the Constitution it never could have been adopted.

Rufus Choate, another great constitutional lawyer, said in 1842:

A whole people, a whole generation of our fathers, had in view as one great end and purpose of their new Government the acquisition of the means of restraining by governmental action the importation of foreign manufactures for the encouragement of manufactures and of labor at home, and desired and meant to do this by clothing the new Government with this specific power of regulating commerce.

As soon as the First Congress assembled petitions flowed in upon it from every section of the Union, from the South as well as the North, praying for the enactment of a law to protect the manufacturing interests of the country, and Congress, in response to this almost universal desire, met it in the second law it passed, which was an act to secure the coasting trade and protect the mechanic arts by discriminating duties.

Since the enactment of this law many others from time to time have been passed by Congress, more or less protective in their design or effect, according to the political complexion of the Congress at the time.

And it has been our experience during the hundred years that have passed away that our people of all classes have been the most prosperous during the times when we have had the most pronounced protection.

It will be found upon the examination of our history that every period of gloom, despondency, and bankruptcy through which we have passed has followed the abandonment of protective tariffs and a resort to those for revenue only, save one—the last—which clearly was the result of the enormous waste of life, labor, and property caused by the war of the rebellion; and let me say that this one was of comparatively short duration, because of the magnificent recuperative power which we had as a people developed through the fostering effect of our tariff protection.

Upon the truth of what I have just said I call a Democratic witness, the Atlanta Constitution, a paper that has shown its devotion to Democracy for more than a generation. This is what it said in a recent issue:

OUR TARIFF HISTORY.

It was not until some time after the colonies became independent that there were duties placed upon imports. From 1784 to 1790, inclusive, the imports from England exceeded the exports from America in the sum of $52,372,875, and a clamor arose for protection.

The first tariff law passed was approved by the President July 4, 1789. Its preamble recited: "Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement of manufactures that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported."

From the year 1796, when the protective tariff was in full operation, to 1801, a period of seven years, the exports of this country exceeded the imports by $89,374,316, leaving England in debt to America. In 1824, although the revenue was sufficient, a new tariff was adopted with higher duties in order to extend the benefits of protection. This measure had the active support of Presidents Monroe, Jackson, and John Quincy Adams.

In 1833, owing to the demands of South Carolina, then in almost open rebellion, a revised tariff law was passed, lowering the duties to about 20 per cent.

By 1840 this "tariff revision" had so diminished the revenue, and manufactures were so prostrate, that the Government and the people were almost in bankruptcy. This caused a raising of customs duties to the protective point in 1842, under which trade revived and the Government's credit was preserved.

In 1846 a reduction was made in tariff rates, and during the next eleven years, while these reduced rates were in force, the revenues fell short of the expenditures by $21,790,805. In 1860 the Government had to borrow $20,000,000 to maintain its credit.

The duties were increased in March, 1861, and since then, while the war tariff has been reduced to natural proportions, the manufactures of America have flourished as never before.

By the passage of this bill and its enactment into law, we are called upon to enter upon an abandonment of and a departure from the policy established by our fathers, and written by them in our very Constitution; a policy under which we have grown from three millions of people to sixty millions; under which our property has increased from a few millions in value to the enormous aggregate of sixty billions, an average of $1,000 for every man, woman, and child in the land; an amount far outstripping the wealth of free-trade England, which less than a quarter of a century ago largely exceeded ours, and which she had been centuries accumulating; under which our people have not only increased their possessions so largely, but have increased their comforts and luxuries beyond those falling to the lot of any other people on the footstool, and which far exceed the wildest prophecies or dreams of the wildest visionary.

I say we are in this day and generation, after realizing all these benefits, a fitting description of which is beyond, far beyond, the power of my tongue to express, called upon to enter upon an experiment, to say the least of it; to put in peril and hazard all these magnificent and glorious results; all this wealth and consequent power; all this comfort; all this luxury; all this improvement in the condition of the laboring classes, by inaugurating a system that no man upon this floor, or elsewhere, has been able to show will not result in the great impairment, if not entire destruction, of them all.

I do not claim that the passage of this bill alone will cause the ruin of our industrial system; but I do say that if this bill becomes a law the wedge will have been entered that, by the future blows British effort and Democratic subserviency shall strike, will be driven to the complete rending asunder and final destruction of our grand system, from which so many and great blessings have flowed.

While the passage of this bill would not alone entirely ruin our industries, it would result in the destruction of many of them, and the consequent train of dire and far-reaching results in other branches.

I know that the advocates of this bill deny such a result and declaim eloquently of the beauties of free trade, or what they choose to call a revenue tariff, and lament and deploro the ruin that is sure to follow the further continuance of our present tariff. I know that they point to England and what they call her prosperity as an evidence of the beneficent effects of the system. I know that they read advice to us to adopt her policy from Englishmen and English books. But they forget that England's present system, so far as her manufactures are concerned, is one of the most powerfully protected systems in the world; they forget that her statesmen have seemed to think that her manufacturing proprietors were the only class that should have protection, while all other classes of producers and all classes of laborers should be subjected to the grinding and destructive effects of free trade; they forget that by allowing the entry into her ports free of duty of raw materials for her shops, and exempting her manufacturing capital from all direct tax under the excise, she has protected them, and so enabled them to undersell the manufacturers of other countries not protected by tariffs, or in some other way.

I know it is fashionable among so-called tariff reformers to point to England and talk of the advantages which free trade has given her industries, but those who have given study to this subject do not hesitate to say that she is a protective state, so far as her manufacturing proprietors are concerned, and this evidence is afforded by an advocate of free trade, who will not he charged with making such assertions to bolster a preconceived opinion.

David A. Wells, a pronounced free-trader and formerly Special Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and now a member of the Cobden Club, in his report for the year 1868, uses this significant language:

Again, a careful study of the financial systems of the various commercial nations of Europe has led the Commissioner unhesitatingly to the conclusion that whatever may be the state of European public opinion in respect to free trade, and whatever may be the claims preferred for it on the broad grounds of liberality and humanitarianism, the fiscal legislation of Great Britain, France, Germany, Belgium, Holland, Austria, and Russia is now, and always has been, framed solely and exclusively with reference to one object, namely, the promotion of supposed national self-interest, and has never had the slightest regard to the interest of any other nation, or to any arguments, other than those based upon specific national wants and specific national experiences.

Thus, the policy of Great Britain, which exempts capital employed in manufacturing and banking from all direct taxation under the excise, and all raw materials imported from foreign countries from all taxation under the customs, although not so termed, is undoubtedly protection in its most subtile and effective form, and as such has been recognized and commented on by the French economists.

It will thus be seen that England's fiscal policy is designed, not to favor her laboring poor, not to enable them to draw and receive higher wages, not to enable them to live easier and surround themselves with more comforts, but to enrich her manufacturing princes, to swell their plethoric coffers, and that, too, in disregard of the interests and welfare, not only of the artisans in her shops, but also regardless of the effect upon her farmers and common laborers.

Her legislation in this particular is clearly class legislation, designed to enrich the few and impoverish the many. That this is so, and that it is having the effect upon the laboring classes that might be expected, abundant testimony is at hand.

This is what Mr. Howard Vincent, M. P., says in a letter to the London Times:

No national party could possibly ignore the serious state of affairs now prevailing. It is detailed from day to day in your columns. Land worth from 25 to 75 per cent. less than forty years ago, and almost unsalable. Arable land thrown into pasture, yet fewer animals in the fields. Agricultural distress very similar to that described by Lord Shaftesbury as prevailing about 1844. In the towns hundreds starving, owing to factories being closed or working only half time. Deputations to local authorities praying for relief works. In the metropolis hungry men at every corner. Pauperism increasing. Discontent rising. Employment everywhere scarcer, while the population is rapidly multiplying.

There is no class, no profession, no avocation, no calling unaffected in some degree. Distress must always be felt more in some places and in some communities than in others. But the general fact is undeniable. The commissioner of police of the metropolis, the vestries, the guardians of the poor, as well as philanthropic societies and statesmen, may open registers for the unemployed, but that will not provide the employment, for little or none is to be found in town or country. Temporary remedies may be applied, but they will not be more effectual than palliatives to a malignant cancer.

Mr. Henry Champlain, M. P., recently stated in the House of Commons that the British farmers were losing £50,000,000, or $250,000,000 a year. In other words, England has ruined its farmers that its manufacturers might grow rich, while it has kept the wages of operatives as low as possible for the same reason.

Is it to be wondered at, in view of these acknowledged results of British free-trade class protection that the stalwart young English farmers are leaving their unprofitable farms and flocking in such numbers to our shores? Or that her poets, that class so quick to respond to the cry of human distress, should, with pens dipped in the gall and bitterness of human want, be writing words like these:

Old England when, by tariffs low,
Protected fair from foreign foe,
Felt everywhere the thrill and glow
Of labor and prosperity.

But England showed another sight,
When Cobden's scheme with killing blight
Fell as the fall of gloomy night
On industry and husbandry.

By selfish greed and fierce tirade,
By class and party feeling swayed,
A "free," a falsely canting Trade
Was throned in pious tyranny.

Then came in cheap, poor foreign skill;
Then grew the rich man richer still,
The while the worker's cup did fill
With idleness and beggary.

But richer yet the few will grow,
And labor yet shall sink more low,
If England's conscience still be slow
To execrate the infamy.

E'en now the curse of Cobden's hand
Lies on our workshops, on our land,
And, wanting food and labor, stand
Our artisans and peasantry.

The misery deepens; what shall save
Our men from sinking to the slave,
But that we doom to deepest grave
Free trade with all its villainy?

False, false to England and her race,
There let it hide its traitor face,
And lasting scorn and dark disgrace
Shall be its fitting sepulchre.

Or words like these:

Clothed all in contradictions I saw this fetich dread,
This hypocrite, free trade, lift high its vaunting head;
If reason to his hearers would any warning bring,
Thus, thought I, to his fellows an Englishman might sing:

"Why starve your workingmen through foreign labor cheap,
The labor of such misery as makes the angels weep?
Why drive them off abroad, your toilers skilled and true,
And open wide the door to a vagrant foreign crew?

"Think you this greed of gold shall add to England's fame?
Know you these foreign slaves shall bring eternal shame?
The hand of Cain is on it, this cheapness that you seek,
The sweat of blood of men, the tears of women weak."

Lines, that if they do not contain so much poetic art, none the less echo the woe that England's humane poet sung in his "Song of the Shirt" forty years ago, when he heard the cry of her who was—

Sewing at once with a double thread,
A shroud as well as a shirt.

And wailing in her anguish—

O God, that bread should be so dear
And flesh and blood so cheap!

The President in his message calls upon Congress to enter upon the same policy that has ruined the farmers of England. He substantially recommends the removal of tariff duties from several of our greatest agricultural staples.

While the comparative unimportance of the agricultural interests of England as compared with her manufacturing interests might in the minds of British statesmen have furnished an excuse for their course, so ruinous to England's farmers, no such excuse can be found for the members of this House.

Agriculture in America, with her breadth of acreage and fertility of soil, holds the most important place among industrial pursuits. In view of the fact that, according to the last census, of 17,392,099 of our population engage in all kinds of industries, 7,670,493, almost nine-twentieths of the whole, are employed in agriculture, of which a very large proportion, if not all, are engaged in the production of one or more of the articles to which the bill under discussion proposes to apply the principle of free trade by removing all duty upon their importation, this House can not say that the interests of the farmers are so small comparatively that their success and prosperity may be sacrificed or greatly impaired for the benefit of those engaged in other pursuits.

This portion of our society is just as much entitled to the protection of the laws as any other. It will be a sorry day for America when her farming industry shall show signs of decay. That portion of our population engaged in agriculture are at once the safety and the glory of our nation.

They are intelligent, conservative, patriotic. They are attached to the land and love their country with intense affection. They draw their substance directly from the bosom of mother earth, and so are most interested in preserving us against invasion or any other evil that may threaten us.

Shall this great and important portion of our population be abandoned in the adjustment of our tariff duties to the remorseless competition of wool-growers and flax-raisers of other lands, where labor or lands or both are cheaper? Or shall we preserve our magnificent markets for their use, and thus enable them to continue to hold their proud place among the toilers of America?

We want in this country no such one-sided monopolistic system as that which curses England, but we want rather to continue that system which encourages and builds up all industries and all labor, whether engaged in manufacturing or in producing the fruits of the field.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], while conceding that wages are higher in this country than in Europe, and trying to account for their being so, and trying to show that it is in no manner due to the protective tariff, makes a claim which seems to me to be absurd; one which he is not only unable to prove, but which he does not attempt to prove, and concerning which he is content to rely alone upon dogmatic assertion.

He says:

What, then, is it that makes higher wages? It is coal and steam and machinery. It is these three powerful agents that multiply the production of labor and make it more valuable.

He says further that fifty years ago it required five persons to make eight yards of cloth in one day, for which they received 20 cents each, or an aggregate of $1 for the five; that in a year the five persons produced 2,400 yards, but now, when coal, steam, and machinery are used, five persons in a year can produce 140,000 yards; that the result of the labor-saving machinery is an enormous increase in productive capacity, and that the result of that has been a great increase in the rate of wages. Why? How? In his own language, I ask the gentleman, "How can it be explained?" He does not condescend to tell us. Is not the statement ludicrous? A manufacturer employs five persons one day to work for him, for which he pays them $1. The next day, having at great expense to himself and the consequent employment of greatly increased capital, put in steam machinery, he pays the same five persons for one day's labor, which was no harder for them to perform, or any more skillful, than the work they did before, five or ten times as much wages. In other words, he makes a large outlay of capital, and instead of reaping the benefit himself he generously turns it all over to his workmen.

Surely in making this claim the gentleman pays the manufacturer a high compliment as a generous and benevolent man, not quite in keeping with his statement made a few moments before, that although a manufacturer may be able to pay higher wages, he does not do it. He says, "Unquestionably he is [able] but he does not do it." And he further emphasizes and also illustrates the argument by saying, Jay Gould is able to pay his bootblack $500 a day, and Mr. Vanderbilt his hostler $10,000 a year, but neither of them does it; but each goes out into the market and employs his man at the market price.

Neither is his claim that wages are made higher by coal and steam and machinery quite consistent with his other statement, made almost in the same breath, and which is a good deal more nearly correct, that wages are regulated by the "demand and supply and the capacity of the laborer to do the work for which he is employed."

Yes, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman, at the risk of being inconsistent, puts the rate of wages on the true ground when he says that it depends upon the demand and supply. And it is because their rate depends upon the demand and supply that the protective tariff is instrumental in increasing them. It increases the demand. It does this by creating a wide diversity of employments. It stimulates the establishment and success of a great variety of manufactures, adapted to the varied talents, tastes, and opportunities of the working people, instead of confining them to one or a few industries to which they must adapt themselves or starve. And this answers, too, his question:

How is it that the wages in the different States of the Union are different, while the tariff is the same from Maine to California?

There is a demand for the employment of labor in a given industry only in that part of the country where that industry is carried on. A cotton factory in New England will not create a demand in Texas for spinners; nor will an iron mill in Alabama create a demand for puddlers in Maine. And right here lies the secret of the difference between wages generally in the South and in the North. In the North attention is paid to manufacturing of all kinds, while in the South in many parts, even where great natural advantages exist, no attention is given to the matter. In the North capital takes advantage of the opportunity afforded by a protective tariff and builds up manufacturing establishments, while in the South, from lack of capital or enterprise or from prejudice, and perhaps from all three, the opportunity afforded by the protection given by the tariff is not seized, and so no new demand for labor is created in that portion of the country, and of course, as a result, there being no new demand, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] in his better moments, there is no advance in the price of labor.

But in some parts of the South light is breaking in. Some of her people, seeing the great material prosperity of the North, and seeing, too, the great advantages nature has conferred upon the South, have in some places invested their capital, aided by additional capital from the North, in manufacturing enterprises with great, and in many places, almost marvelous success. In Birmingham and Chattanooga and other places this has been done. Does the gentleman from Texas not believe that there is a greater demand for labor and for more kinds of labor in those cities than there was before such enterprises were established there? Has there not been an increased demand, and therefore an increased price?

It is only a question of time when the South, fully awaking from her lethargy, will arouse herself, put forth her mighty strength, avail herself of her great advantages, seize the opportunity which the protective system affords her, erect factories, build up the waste places, employ her own raw materials and her vast supply of labor, and exceed in wealth and material prosperity anything that has yet been seen in America, and throw into insignificance by contrast her boasted days of greatness, when cotton was king and slavery was her corner-stone. May God speed the day when thus she will have fulfilled her destiny and the prophetic hopes of her early statesmen, who appreciated and advocated the doctrine of protection to American industries!

The gentleman from Texas includes among the three agents causing higher wages, machinery; but he does not tell us what has produced the machinery. How came the machinery he speaks of to exist? Clearly it came into existence in response to a demand for it. This, of course, everybody will admit. What created the demand for it? Clearly the demand for multiplied and cheapened processes of manufacturing goods for consumption. Why did methods of manufacturing goods need to be cheapened? Why, certainly because of the competition of manufacturers, each and all of whom were striving to possess the market by offering their wares cheaper than others.

How could these manufacturers, while thus competing and inventing machinery to cheapen their products, endure competition with the goods manufactured in Europe by cheaper labor? Surely only because they were protected by a protective tariff. Thus it was that the tariff afforded the inventors and improvers of machinery the opportunity and incentive to bring the same to the high state of perfection to which it has attained. In this manner it was that a protective tariff brought into existence the improved machinery, and so is entitled to the credit at one and the same time of creating the machinery of which the gentleman speaks and also enhancing the rate of wages.

Again, in reply to the claim of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] that wages are higher in this country because of the use of coal and steam and machinery, I call his attention to the fact that in Europe, where low wages are, he will also find coal and steam and machinery, and find them cheaper, too, in many places, if not in all places, than in this country.

It is also an open secret that European manufacturers, especially the English, through agents whom they keep in this country constantly on the alert for anything new, buy up and ship to Europe every new and useful improvement in machinery; so that in the matter of machinery the shops in Europe are as well supplied as those of this country; and there is the best authority for the statement that there is no perceptible difference between the skill and speed with which machinery is operated in the best factories in Europe and America.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have not mentioned the only inconsistencies to be found in the position of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and the others who with him are advocating this bill. They speak with vehemence and often with bitterness of the manufacturer. They say, in the language of the chairman, that "unquestionably" he is able when the value of his products is increased by protection to pay higher wages, but that he does not do it; that he has no regard for the laborers he employs; that he grinds them down; that he robs them of their fair share of the profits of the business in which he and they are engaged; that he is heartless, selfish, wicked; that while a protective tariff enables him to charge a large price for his products he pockets the entire benefit, and that his laborers get (in the language of the chairman of the committee) "not a dollar of it." And yet, Mr. Chairman, the advocates of this measure have been laboring for weeks to show, and that is the burden of their song, that to allow raw material to be introduced free will cheapen to the consumers the goods made out of such raw material; that if the manufacturer gets raw material cheaper he can afford to and will sell the manufactured product cheaper; and their offered consolation to the wool grower is, that while he will not get so much for his raw material, he will be enabled to buy his clothing enough cheaper to more than make up the difference in price.

What consistency! How is this to be brought about? Why, they tell us that the manufacturer getting his raw materials cheaper, will sell his goods cheaper; that he will be more considerate of the farmers than he will be of his own employés; that while cheaper wool will enable him to make more profit at the same price for the product, he will kindly and generously relinquish that increased profit, and give it to his customer, a stranger, while he will withhold a profit made under a protective tariff from his neighbor, his employé. In other words, that under a protective tariff he is a robber, but under free trade in his raw material he will "presto change" become a benefactor. "To this complexion" are the supporters of this measure come at last. It is an undignified, uncalled-for, and wanton attack upon a worthy class of American citizens. And that policy or system of fiscal legislation that requires a resort to such methods to sustain it and bolster it up, is unworthy of consideration in such a place as this, and unworthy the gentlemen who advocate it.

Oh, no; it is not true that our manufacturers as a class are robbers and extortioners. There may be, doubtless are, among them bad men, as there are in all walks of life, and as there may be even among the manufacturers of free-trade England, who have their raw materials placed at their disposal, in part, at public expense and the cost of the other classes in that country; but as a class they are as generous, as honest, as benevolent as other men. They, as a class, show and feel an interest in their employés, as is evidenced by efforts that they are constantly and voluntarily making in innumerable ways to better their employés' condition morally, intellectually, and physically, and above all, in their willingness, as statistics show, to constantly increase, as fast as able, their wages.

I am not saying, and do not say, that labor, even in America, is sufficiently rewarded. I do not believe that it is, except perhaps in a few branches. I believe that labor here and everywhere is entitled in many branches to a larger share in the results of its own exertions; and I long for the day when laborers from one end of the land to the other shall be rejoicing in higher wages; when they shall be able to enjoy more comforts and a greater degree of luxury even than they now enjoy; when, under the beneficent influence of a protective system, the branches of labor shall be so diversified and multiplied, and the consequent demand for workers shall be so increased throughout the land, South as well as North, that the toiler of whatever degree shall be in the enjoyment of all those good things of the earth that it is possible for him to enjoy and which it is profitable for anybody to enjoy.

I believe that the only system under which this "consummation so devoutly to be wished" can ever be realized is the protective system.

And, Mr. Chairman, at the same time that our tariff is thus enhancing the price of labor it is reducing the cost to our people of manufactured goods. We have the authority of Mr. Dudley, late consul at Liverpool, for this statement:

> Upon investigation it will be found that nine-tenths of the manufactured commodities used by the farmers of our country, including clothing, household goods, furniture, implements of husbandry, tools, etc., are as cheap in this country as they are in England, and in some instances even cheaper.

Again he says:

> An examination will show that there is not a single manufactured commodity, so far as I know, that is not cheaper to-day in the United States under our protective system than it was in 1860 under free trade, and before the present protective tariff went into operation.

But, Mr. Chairman, upon this latter point we do not need the testimony of Mr. Dudley. There are as many witnesses on this floor to the truth of what he says as there are members entitled to be here. Who is so ignorant or forgetful as not to know its truth? Who does not know that there is hardly a manufactured article of common use, of use by the middle classes and those who are poorer, that is not cheaper than before the tariffs of 1861 and 1867? Who is prepared to deny that carpets, furniture, implements of husbandry, the artisan's tools, books, newspapers, linens, woolens, cottons, prints, writing materials, carriages, wagons, hats, shoes, clothing, all things made of iron, plate-glass and all other glass, pottery, and many like articles are cheaper—some several hundred per cent. cheaper than before the war, and that very many of these things are now manufactured in this country which before were produced in foreign lands? And who does not know that while this is so, and notwithstanding the farmer's products are not for the time being bringing as good prices as they were a few years ago, they are for the most part sold for far more than they were before the war? In view of this condition of things, what becomes of all the fine-spun theories about the evils that protection will bring upon us, and of what avail are the distorted percentages in which our friends upon the other side so delight to deal?

These are facts which the common people can understand and appreciate, and which will not be hidden from their view by all the sophistries of all the free-traders or revenue-tariff tinkers in the land.

This cheapness of manufactured goods in this country and advance in the price of farm products must be ascribed to the tariff. How else can it be accounted for? If not to be credited to the tariff, it must at least be admitted that it coexists with the tariff; that the tariff does not militate against it. And if the tariff does not prevent this state of things, what harm in permitting it to remain?

But we are told by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] that the rate of wages is higher in free-trade England than in Germany under her protective system, and then he asks, "Why is this?" But he forgets to say that while Germany has a protective system, she has had it only since 1879, and that since she adopted that system the rate of wages has steadily increased, as shown by the following table, which gives the increase for a period of five years, and which is an official statement carefully prepared by the Iron and Steel Association of the empire:

Items.	Increase per cent. from 1879 to 1882.	Increase per cent. from 1879 to 1883.	Increase per cent. from 1879 to 1884.
All works:
Number employed	25.2	33.9	32.2
Total wages	42.0	57.2	52.1
Wages per employé	13.4	17.4	14.2
Iron and steel works:
Number employed	23.5	26.9	26.3
Total wages	39.4	50.4	41.4
Wages per employé	12.9	18.5	11.8
Machine shops:
Number employed	29.3	50.9	32.9
Total wages	48.3	73.6	82.0
Wages per employé	14.6	15.0	18.2

And as evidence that this desirable condition of things did not cease in 1884, the last year mentioned in the table, I quote the language of Mr. George Strachey, Her Britannic Majesty's chargé d'affaires at Dresden, as found in a recent report made by him to the British Government:

The belief is widely diffused that the tariff reform of 1879 saved Germany from great ruin, and that the empire is now on the road to industrial greatness, perhaps to the succession of that hegemony which Great Britain, it is thought, now with difficulty holds in her hands. Protection is in the national air and it will not be dissipated by foreign arguments, however accurately deduced from the axioms of scientific doctrine.

Mr. Strachey is not a protectionist, but a free-trader, and his testimony is not, therefore, that of a willing witness.

The fact is, that the wages in Germany in some industries have already in nine years of protection advanced from a point considerably below those paid in England to a point of equality with them.

THE ENGLISH SOLICITUDE.

A few years ago, in 1879, it is said by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], our English friends took alarm about the growth and development of our cotton industry, and sent an expert to the United States to inquire whether their industry was imperiled by ours. "He came, he saw," and returned, with the glad assurance to his people—

Be still, sad heart, and cease repining,
Behind the clouds the sun is still shining.

because, as the gentleman from Texas says, he found that the people of this country, while we could beat them in labor cost, like Ephraim, joined to our idols, and maintaining a high tariff on our raw materials, which would prevent our competing with the English. What raw material it was entering into the manufacture of cotton goods, the high tariff on which prevented our manufacturers from competing with those in England, he does not state; but no matter, it sounds well, and like many other free-trade arguments, being only "sound," "signifies nothing."

Now, will our friends upon the other side tell us why it is, if those experts who have been sent over here from England to "spy out the land" report that, owing to our tariff on raw materials, the English manufacturers are safe, there is so much anxiety in England over the passage of this bill? Will they tell us why it is that in 1880, the next year after the journey of the expert, the London Times said:

It is to the New World that the Cobden Club is chiefly looking, as the most likely sphere for its vigorous foreign policy. It has done what it can in Europe and is now turning its eyes westward and bracing itself for the struggle which is to come. It can not rest while the United States are unsubdued.

If the tariff on raw materials was preventing American manufacturers from competing with British manufacturers why was the Cobden Club, made up largely of those same manufacturers, seeking the repeal of the tariff?

If our tariff on raw materials stands in the way of our competing with the English manufacturers, as reported by this mythical expert, why do we find the following British papers using the following language in commenting upon the message:

[The Statist.]

There is hardly a single industry in the United States that is not interested in maintaining protective duties.

[People's Journal, Dundee.]

The change in the American fiscal policy will be beneficial to this country, and the prospect of it has diffused fresh hope throughout the business circles in the city.

[Haddingtonshire Courier, Scotland.]

We may look to an impetus being given to our home trade that will go far to make up for the depression of late years.

[The Scotchman.]

The free importation of iron, coal, and wool would be a great boon to British producers.

It looks a little, Mr. Chairman, as if imposition upon the credulity of the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means had not been confined to making him believe that seamless stockings could not be manufactured in America.

TRUSTS.

But, Mr. Chairman, many of the gentlemen who have advocated this bill have charged that protection fosters trusts, and that a large majority of that pestiferous brood have been organized to deal in or control so-called protected products. Not one of those who have made this assertion has proved or even assumed to attempt to show how protection is favorable to the formation of trusts. They have all been contented with the bald declaration. This form of argument may do for consumption in the districts or among the people represented by these gentlemen, but hardly goes for much here, where we are engaged in the important and responsible duty of trying to ascertain the truth and of shaping the fiscal legislation of sixty millions of people. If protection brings into existence these formidable combinations we want to know it, and that gentleman who can demonstrate it will earn the everlasting gratitude of an abused and anxious public.

Mr. Chairman, while it is true that not one argument or illustration showing or tending to show that these trusts are the offspring of protection has been brought to our notice, there are many proofs to the contrary. The very fact that there is a single unprotected commodity which is the subject of a trust, demonstrates to my mind that protection is not essential; for if a trust can be formed to manipulate the market in one unprotected production, why may it not be to do the same in another and in all; and where, then, is the connection between its formation and the principle of protection? Why, the most gigantic of all trusts, the pioneer and model for all the others, the one whose success has been the inspiration (if anything so wicked can said to be inspired) of all the others, that consists of fifty or more different partnerships and corporations, of which the Standard Oil Company proper is but one—the one whose success and profits have far outstripped that of the Hudson Bay Fur Company, or the world-famous East India Company—the Standard Oil trust—manufactures, deals in, and substantially controls the market in a commodity upon which no protective tariff duty has ever cast its blight.

And this is not the only unprotected commodity controlled or sought to be controlled by a trust; large numbers of such articles are manipulated by them. And within a few days information has come to us over the wires that in the far West a farmers' trust, with a capital of $20,000,000, has been organized, of course for the purpose of controlling or trying to control the products of their industry—the very class of all who, the free-trade orators say, are not protected by our present tariff, but who are the victims of protection unjustly afforded to other industries at the farmers' expense, and to whom by far the greater part of the appeals of the supporters of this bill are directed.

Far be it from me, following after those who are so expert in making unsupported declarations, to assert that these trusts are the result of free trade in, or insufficient tariff protection of, the commodities in which any of them deal; but it would seem that those who are not, or who may fancy that they are not, sufficiently protected in their business would be the very ones to cast about for protection, and would seek to build up a barrier of some kind, to destroy or break down competition. I do not say that this is so; but I submit that there would be much more reason to expect it to be so than that those who our free-trade friends say are so highly protected by a tariff that they are growing immensely rich, and whom they so flippantly call "robbers" and "swindlers," would resort to it.

Again, Mr. Chairman, if protection is the mother of trusts, how is it that they are found to exist in free-trade England?

Oh, no! Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it would be less disingenuous to inquire whether trusts are not simply another manifestation of that selfishness which exists, and always will exist, in the human heart; that inclination on the part of men engaged in business of any kind to seek advantage over their competitors; that tendency to overreach and thrive at the expense of others, that has been known, at least in rare cases, to invade even the kind and benevolent precincts of an English trader's heart, and has led him to force his odious fiscal and land laws upon impoverished Ireland and his opium trade upon an unwilling and unhappy people.

Would it not be as well to inquire whether a trust is really anything new under the sun; whether it is anything more than another form for the "combinations," "corners," "pools," and "rings" with which for years, reaching back of the enactment of the present tariff law, we have been familiar?

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that this is all there is of it. And I believe, too, that the remedy for the evil does not lie in the destruction of the protective system, under which the country and the whole country has been so prosperous and under which thousands and millions, not members of a trust and who do not dream of becoming members of one, have prospered.

The remedy is rather to be found in State control. It is competent for the people of the respective States, and probably competent for them alone, to take away from partnerships or corporations organized under their laws the power to enter into such combinations, and thus prevent the evils arising from their creation. Then let this work be left with the authority constitutionally empowered to perform it, and let us perform the duty which devolves upon us—decide whether the country shall enter upon the road to ultimate free trade, or whether it shall continue its grand triumphant march on the highway of protection to American labor.

THE SURPLUS.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, states that on the 1st day of December last there was in the Treasury, after every possible obligation, including the sinking-fund requirements, had been provided for, the sum of $55,258,701.19, which was every day growing larger, and which would, as shown by a careful estimate, be increased on the 30th day of next month to $140,000,000.

We are informed by the same official that there has been each year for twenty-two years a surplus of revenue above current annual expenses, amounting during that time, which ended June 30, 1887, to the grand total of $1,491,845,953.12. What was done with this surplus by former administrations? Why, it was applied, except what was needed for permanent funds in the Treasury, as it should have been, to the reduction of the public debt. It never occurred to any former administration that while we were owing an enormous debt there was anything to be done with the annual surplus except to apply it to the payment of our indebtedness.

It was left to the one now in power to discover that there was great danger in the existence of a "surplus" much smaller than that which had been found to exist in each of several former years, and to make frantic appeals for its reduction by removal of tariff duties and gloomy prognostications of the dire results of a failure to do so.

Why is it that the present Administration has not, like its predecessors, applied its surplus to the payment of the bonded debt? It has had ample authority to do so by express provision of law, so plain that it would seem that he that runs might read, and one which this House has, by a two-thirds vote, declared to contain the authority. Why, then, has it not, without being driven to do so by the inexorable demand of public opinion, and by the voice of many of its supporters in this House, instead of endeavoring to alarm the money market, and so bring on a financial panic, gone about doing what any wise business man would have done—paid its debts with its surplus?

The reason is too evident. Having a pet theory to establish, wishing to bring about the adoption in this country of a free-trade system, it has not hesitated to use the assumed pressure of a plethoric and overburdened Treasury to force its peculiar views upon the people. In other words, it has abandoned its relation of servant of the people and assumed that of their guardian and master.

Mr. Chairman, let the Administration continue in the good work of redeeming the outstanding bonds at a large saving of interest, as it has been compelled to do against its will, and it will not be long before there will be no "surplus" to complain of, and in its place will be found a large decrease in the principal of the public debt, and consequent reduction in the interest burden upon the people.

But, Mr. Chairman, if for any reason this course should not be found practicable, or if unfriendliness to this method shall result in tardy action in this direction, the Democratic majority in this House can find ample ways to prevent the future accumulation of any surplus in the Treasury by wise expenditure of the money that shall come into it.

A bill has already been passed by the Senate of the United States, providing for the expenditure of $77,000,000 in eight years, in the education of the illiterate masses which will, if not enlightened, so dangerously threaten our peace during the coming years; a bill which a large majority of the members of this House would gladly vote for; but which, in obedience to the behest of the free-trade cabal that rules the Democratic majority, sleeps the sleep of death in the committee-room.

The dependent-pension bill, that act of tardy justice to the disabled defenders of the Union, is upon the Union Calendar of this House awaiting action. Pass it, and a large portion, if not all, of the so-called "surplus" will be distributed among the people, and one of our most sacred obligations will be discharged.

A service-pension bill, an act of justice to the survivors of the war, the passage of which the late Democratic convention of Indiana in a catch-vote mood so heartily indorsed, would dispose of a large portion, and perhaps all of the surplus revenue in the Treasury. I say "catch-vote mood," because the representatives of that party on this floor are supporting, and that same convention approved in another resolution, a policy which will make it impossible to pay the pension so indorsed.

Our coast defenses are calling for repairs and improvements, without which we are absolutely at the mercy of foreign nations; and this would require the expenditure of a large sum.

Our Navy is in great need of extension. The same necessity that exists for the erection and repair of coast defenses obtains with respect to the enlargement and increased efficiency of our Navy. In the event of a foreign war our Navy as at present constituted and provided would not be able to cope with those of even third-rate powers. To strengthen and improve our Navy, so that it would be able to enforce our rights on the high seas and protect our coast, would require an expenditure which would greatly reduce the "surplus."

Again, to refund to the States that paid them the direct taxes that were collected from them, and the retaining of which by reason of the refusal and neglect of the other States to pay their share has resulted in such a gross injustice, would take about $17,000,000 from the "surplus" and circulate it among the people.

To refund this money was so apparently an act of justice that three-fifths of the members of this House insisted upon doing it, through an eight days' continuous session, until enough of them, at the crack of the party whip, "took the back track" to indefinitely postpone the justice, and at the same time save the sacred "surplus."

But, Mr. Chairman, if we are not to pay our honest debts and liberal pensions, nor refund the direct tax, nor build and repair our coast defenses, nor increase our Navy, nor instruct our ignorance, and we are to reduce our revenue, the only question remaining is in what manner shall such reduction be accomplished. The President and a majority of the Committee on Ways and Means say it shall be done by a reduction of the duties on imports and the admission of certain articles now paying duties to the free-list.

The amount of the surplus for the current year is estimated at $113,000,000. I have attempted in my feeble way to show why this reduction should not be secured in the manner suggested by these gentlemen. It remains for me as an honest man, upon the responsibility resting in part upon me as a representative of the people, to give my views upon the way in which the flow of this surplus into the Treasury may be prevented.

Personally, Mr. Chairman, I would be glad, if we are to reduce the revenues to current expenses, to see the whole internal-revenue system abolished. It is a system of taxation, pure and simple, and direct in its character, and one that has never been resorted to in this country except in emergencies. It is odious in its burdens and odious in the methods of its collection. Under it the tax-gatherer can enter and invade the privacies of homes and have admission to business men's most valued secrets. It accomplishes its end, and in many cases can only do so, by a system of espionage calling to its aid spies and emissaries.

The repeal of this system would dispose at once of the whole question of a supposed surplus. That surplus is estimated at $113,000,000. The income derived from the internal revenue last year was $118,000,000, which, less the expense of its collection, $4,000,000, would leave the reduction almost precisely equal to the surplus. It is to be observed further in this connection that this would also dismiss an army of officials, four thousand in number, and reduce the expenses of the Government $4,000,000 a year. What better way can be devised to settle this vexed question of a surplus than this? But it is said by the supporters of this bill that this would be leaving the burdens upon the necessaries of life and taking it off from the vices. It is interesting to note, in this connection, that this is the first time in the history of the Democratic party that they have been solicitous to keep burdens upon vice and relieve the necessaries. They are so anxious to place burdens upon vice that they are willing to burden the people with four millions of expense to do it. As is sometimes the case with other new converts, their zeal has got the better of their sense. If the Democratic party in its new-born zeal to reduce the cost of the necessaries, wishes to remove the burdens therefrom, why does it not admit sugar, that article of prime necessity that enters into the consumption every day of the poorest in the land, to the free-list? It pretends to be anxious to warm the poor man's body; why not also be anxious to sweeten his cup? The answer is too plain. It is for political reasons that this unjust discrimination is made. No Democrat can, nor has attempted to, explain it. It is not the only respect in which this bill is truckling, dishonest, cowardly, and sectional.

There is another reason why this tax should be removed from spirits and fermented liquors. The matter of taxing the liquor traffic should be left with the States, the only authority that can, under our Constitution, as a police regulation, impose a tax upon the traffic as distinguished from the liquors themselves. The General Government should not in any manner stand nor seem to stand in the way of the proper exercise of this power by the States to eradicate this great evil from the land, except in the event of a dire necessity, like a war or the resulting necessity for large revenue to pay the cost of it.

But, Mr. Chairman, while this would be my way of preventing the accumulation of a surplus, I am not unwilling to vote for any other method upon which a majority can agree that will at the same time continue in force without any impairment the principle of protection to American labor.

I am willing to vote in a spirit of harmony and compromise for the repeal of all the internal revenue derived from the tax on tobacco and cigars and the special taxes on manufacturers of and dealers in those articles, the tax on spirits used in the arts, and the duty upon sugar. This would, less the amount of a sugar bounty, of which I shall speak, reduce the income ninety-five millions which is perhaps as large a reduction as can safely be made.

To repeal the duty on sugar, under the circumstances, would be no violation of the principle of protection to home industries, since the experience of the past demonstrates that there can not be produced in this country from cane above 10 per cent. of our consumption of this article, owing to climatic and other reasons that will continue to exist. When it is impossible, in the nature of things, to produce an amount of any article of common consumption nearly equal to that consumption, that is not one of those articles that should be protected by a tariff, any more than an article which we can not produce in any quantity. There are of late, however, indications that owing to new inventions and discoveries the manufacture of sugar from beets and sorghum may prove successful, and may yet, with proper encouragement, equal the great demand in this country.

I would, therefore, while removing the duty from this article, provide for a bounty which would sufficiently protect the cane-sugar industry, and at the same time stimulate the experiments which are now promising so much in the way of the production of sugar from sorghum and beets.

But, Mr. Chairman, to return to a subject which I have already touched. We have a public debt of nearly twelve hundred millions. When, I ask the gentlemen upon the other side, do they propose to pay that? If there is to be no income beyond current expenses, when can that be paid? More than two hundred millions of the bonded debt fall due in 1891, now close at hand. How shall they be met at maturity? I suppose our friends upon the other side would say, by making a new loan. But are they in favor of indefinitely continuing our debt? Do they believe that "a public debt is a public blessing?" Do they want to follow in the footsteps of Great Britain and have and forever continue a public loan? The alacrity with which they favor the English idea of free trade may well create the suspicion that they are also willing to continue indefinitely our public debt, because that, too, is "English, you know."

For myself, Mr. Chairman, I have to say that I am in favor of a continuance of the policy of the Republican party, of paying our debts until the last cent of them shall be liquidated; not only those that are bonded, but those other large amounts that are equally as sacred. And the American people, too, are in favor of this policy. They always have been, and have given no sign of a change of opinion. Not a petition has come up to this House during this session of nearly six months' duration asking for any change. A great deal has been said about the burdens of taxation resting upon the people and the necessity for removing them. I call the attention of the American people to a fact which perhaps, owing to the clamor of the Democratic politicians, has escaped their attention, that not a single person has asked this Congress by petition to reduce taxation by a reduction or repeal of tariff duties. Not one. The RECORD will fail to disclose that a single petition has been introduced for that purpose. There could be no stronger evidence that all this talk about the people's groaning under their burdens of taxation has no foundation. It all emanates from the brains of politicians who see the handwriting on the wall that their party has been "weighed in the balance and found wanting," and who are casting about for some issue or party shibboleth with which they may make an attempt to hoodwink the people into intrusting them again with political power.

And, Mr. Chairman, while there is such a dearth of petitions for the passage of the Mills bill, or any similar measure, the record of the proceedings of this House discloses the fact that thousands upon thousands of our people, in all walks of life, but especially those engaged in labor, are, by petitions addressed to us, crying out and protesting against its passage. To all these prayers the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means turn a deaf ear; they give these people no hearing; but, taking counsel alone of the demands of their own political fortunes, they insist upon saying to these people, "You don't know what you want. We alone are able to determine that. What you need is not a continuation of our own American system, but its destruction, and the erection upon its ruins of a foreign system, for which, while it is true you do not ask for it, every English manufacturer and every English ship-owner is devoutly praying; and this being an English administration, to them alone do we give ear."

Mr. Chairman, a vast amount of valuable time has been occupied in the course of this debate by those advocating this bill in the vain attempt to show that the placing of wool upon the free-list will not injure the producers of wool. The same men who say this complain that a duty upon any other manufactured article than wool—and wool is a manufactured article—enhances the profits upon that article to its manufacturer. If it does, why not also to the producer of wool? If a duty will give more profit to one manufacturer, why not to another? To an ordinary mind this question is unanswerable. Even some of those rending the air for free wool admit that the duty does enable the wool-grower to make a better profit; but they say if he will only let them take the duty off he can buy his woolen clothes enough cheaper to make up the difference. If taking the duty off would have the effect thus claimed, how many wool-growers are there raising so small an amount of wool that the difference in the price of their woolen clothing would equal the profits they would lose upon their wool? An exceedingly small number, indeed.

It takes not over 6 pounds of wool to make a suit of heavy clothing for a man. It does not take as much for a woman; but assuming that it does, an average family, say one of five persons, would thus gain at 12 cents, the highest duty per pound upon the 30 pounds of wool required to furnish each of them a good suit of woolen clothing for each year, the sum of $3.60. The President in his remarkable message says that a large proportion of the sheep owned by the farmers are found in small flocks, numbering from twenty-five to fifty. It is my observation that a very small portion of the sheep-owners of the country have only twenty-five. I believe that the average would not be less than seventy-five. But suppose the average to be only fifty. According to the President the enhanced value of their wool would be, because of the tariff, $36. Thus we find that the increased cost of clothing of the farmer, because of the tariff, is $3.60, while his increased profit is $36. In other words, that his profit, by reason of the tariff, is just ten times his loss by it. Now, I have made no allowance for blankets for the family of the sheep-owner. Suppose he bought two blankets a year, weighing 5 pounds each, which would be a liberal estimate, his entire tax, by reason of the wool tariff, would be only $1.80; but to be entirely safe, suppose we double the amount of wool required, we would then have a tax of $9.60, an amount equal to only about one-fourth of the farmer's profit on his wool.

Now, all this is on the theory that the amount of the tariff is added to the cost to the consumer of the article upon which it is levied, while our experience shows that woolens are produced almost as cheaply under the tariff as they can be produced in England, and the President's argument falls to the ground. Even while I am speaking, an all-wool business suit for a man, cut in the latest fashion, elegantly made, and fit for any man to wear, can be bought in the shadow of this Capitol for $10, and coarser styles for proportionately lower sums—prices that certainly refute all argument to the effect that a tariff begets high prices to the consumer.

And when, as has been shown upon this floor without dispute, a pair of blankets of precisely the same weight and quality as those which cost in England $4.45, and upon which tariff duties and charges of $4.90 are levied, making a total of $9.35, are sold in this country at $5.20, it is about time for the President and his co-workers in this House, and for everybody else, to cease making the monstrous claim that the tariff laws "raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties."

Now, if the argument addressed to wool-growers that they can buy their clothing enough cheaper to make up for their loss on the price of their wool is a good one, why is it not equally as good applied to any other producers—to the manufacturers of all the multiplied articles which human ingenuity and industry can produce for the comfort or use of man? Why apply it to wool alone? And if it can be applied to all those industries as well as to wool, why does not the argument result logically in free trade, when all the expenses of the Government shall be raised by a direct tax and the custom-houses shall be abolished? Some of the gentlemen on the other side, not seeing any escape from this logic, accept it as good and boldly avow themselves as in favor of free trade. They are the consistent ones. The argument of the President as certainly ends in ultimate free trade as any conclusion ever resulted from a major and minor premise; and, Mr. Chairman, if the people of this country are ever deluded or driven or persuaded, or dragged by their political leaders into the support of this bill, those leaders will be justified in taking further steps towards free trade, as they can well plead as an excuse that the people have declared in favor of such a policy.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened in vain during the debate for one expression from that portion of the Democratic majority upon the floor of this House who are most vigorously demanding the passage of this bill, to wit, the gentlemen representing the cotton belt, of sympathy for the cause of labor; for the expression of a single desire for the advancement of the cause of labor; for any commendation of this bill because it will enhance the price of labor or better the condition of the laborer. Why is this? The advocates of protection on this floor say that protection will increase the price of labor, and give that as one of the strongest reasons for their support of the system; but the gentlemen from the extreme South, while denying that protection will do what its friends claim, yet sing no peans to labor, speak no good word for it, express no solicitude for its welfare. On the contrary, one of those gentlemen has stated, during this debate, that he wants not only cheap goods, but an opportunity to procure cheap labor; and another, the accomplished and able gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], announces and adheres to the exploded doctrine that no warrant can be found in the Constitution for the protection of labor.

Mr. Chairman, do not these gentlemen thus ignore the claims of labor because they mistakingly conceive the cheapening of labor to be in their interest and that of their constituents? Do they not wish to keep the insufficient remuneration of labor at the low ebb where it now stands in the South that they may be able to raise their cotton, rice, and sugar at the lowest possible cost, and thus increase their profits on those commodities? This I believe to be the reason of their ignoring of labor. They stand in the same position that their free-trade predecessors of ante bellum days occupied. Their chief object was to procure cheap food and clothing for their slaves who performed their labor. The desire of those who follow them is now, since slavery has been abolished, to procure the labor of their former slaves at the lowest possible figure. Consequently they wish to see no general advance in the price of all kinds of labor, which would surely follow the establishment in the South of manufacturing industries under the beneficent ægis of a protective system.

The funny member from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN], as a part of his remarks, introduced and presumably indorsed a long screed in the form of part of a letter from one Dr. B. F. Ward, of Mississippi, whoever he is (a near relative, judging from his "amoozing" production, of the late Artemus), in which the assumed virtues and greatness of the South and the shortcomings and unimportance of the North are set forth in terms as glowing as untruthful.

That part of the letter introduced is as follows. I introduce it again that the people of my district and my section may have further opportunity to understand the animus and present attitude of the unreconstructed rebels of the South and their representatives on this floor:

> No careful observer will probably deny that among the wealthy and fashionable classes at the North there is more idleness and extravagance, more folly and arrogance, more dissipation and vice, and a more impassable barrier between rich and poor than ever existed in the most opulent social circle of slave-holders. For however aristocratic they may have been, they were always courteous and refined. In the North the tendency to divide society on financial lines has grown with constantly increasing intensity for more than half a century, until now it is almost definitely established. The very rich and very poor are as widely separated as Dives and Lazarus. In the old South, on the contrary, there were processes constantly at work, effecting a gradual and steady diffusion of wealth, which preserved in a great measure the homogeneity of society.

Prominent among the agencies were the matrimonial alliances so often contracted between the families of the rich and poor. In fact, it was the rule for the active, intellectual, ambitious young men from the poorer families to marry the daughters of wealthy planters. Instead of attempting to restrain these alliances they were generally encouraged by wealthy parents, with a view to preserving the physical and mental vigor of their families without sacrificing their estates. To employ a homely but expressive phrase, "brains and money were constantly combining" to build up and preserve in the old South the finest society in the world, to the exclusion of those twin evils, the millionaire and the tramp.

The fine moral and intellectual organization of Southern children has heretofore been largely due to the fact that their mothers were exempt from the hardships of physical drudgery and the depressing effects of impending want. The poorest man in the South supported his family with comparative ease, because of the gently rising gradations in society and the universal liberality of the stronger toward the weakest. How is it in those countries so long freed from the "curse of slavery," but where mechanical invention is progressively increasing the congestion of wealth and stimulating luxurious living among the rich, while it alarmingly swells the ranks of the hungry laborer, the socialist, and the pauper? Take Massachusetts, the "hub" of free schools, free labor, and boasted intelligence, as a fair representative. The average expenses of laboring men who are the heads of families in Massachusetts amount to $754.42, while their earnings average $558.68. In other words, the workingman falls short of a support for his family $195.74, or 32 per cent. It is wrung from the toil of the mother and children, not through the discharge of the ordinary domestic duties of woman's sphere, but in the wages mill.

One-third of the enterprises of great pith and moment, rather than the nursery of scribblers. She has made history for others to write and sell. She has carved with the sword the pathway of the pen and made America the stronghold of the Anglo-Saxon race. The first resolutions declaring the right of the colonies to be "free and independent" were introduced into a Southern legislature by a Southern man. The first resolutions to the same effect were presented in the Colonial Congress by another Southern man, and took form and consistence in the Declaration of Independence, under the matchless genius of still another Southern man. A Southern man led the patriot armies to victory, and established the possibilities of the proudest nation on the earth. A Southern man was prime mover of the convention that framed the Constitution. When the Government had been created its organic law was still an unexplained book, a ponderous oar in unskilled hands.

It was left for the greatest legal mind of the age, a Southern Chief-Justice, to analyze and stamp upon it the construction which will be accepted as long as the Constitution is respected. A Southern man framed the ordinance for the organization and government of the great Northwestern Territory, an instrument second in importance only to the Constitution of the United States. A Southern man was the author of the republican theory of popular government which prevailed during the sixty years of our greatest prosperity, peace, and happiness. Of the fifteen Presidents of the Continental Congress, eight were from slave States. From 1789 to 1853, a period of sixty-four years, embracing eleven administrations, the slave States furnished eight Presidents, whose terms of service covered fifty-two years.

During the same time the free States furnished three Presidents, whose combined terms covered twelve years. Of twelve Vice-Presidents, four were from slave States. Under these eleven administrations the slave States supplied fourteen Secretaries of State, eleven Secretaries of War, six Secretaries of the Treasury, nine Secretaries of the Navy, and eight Postmaster-Generals. Of fifty-five Presidents pro tempore of the Senate, thirty-one Speakers of the House, twenty-two were from slave States. Of five Chief-Justices two, and the only two of great eminence, were from slave States. Of twenty-nine Associate-Justices, seventeen were from slave States. Of twenty-one Attorney-Generals, fourteen were from slave States. Of one hundred and eighty-five public ministers to foreign countries, ninety-nine were from slave States.

Without going further into exhaustive details, for which material is abundant and overwhelming, we affirm, without fear of decent denial, that along the lines of these fifty-two years are ranged all the broad and lofty conceptions of statesmanship, all the bold and fruitful enterprises, all the grand and comprehensive achievements from which have evolved the pride, the power, and the glory of the American people.

The war of 1812 was scarcely less important in its results than the war of independence. The one left us an embryonic nation; the other developed full-grown power, wiping out the results of twenty-five years, planting our flag upon the ocean, and dissolving every doubt in the minds of foreign powers that we were a Government de facto, and entitled to a place in the front rank of nations. This war, we are told by a Northern historian, "was a Southern measure for the protection of Northern interests;" yet it was inaugurated and pressed to a triumphant issue under the administration of a Southern slaveholder, supported by a "solid South," in the face of the almost solid opposition of the free States. Who were the master spirits of that struggle? Such men as Clay, Calhoun, Monroe, Grundy, Lowndes, and Crawford; while only five Senators north of the Delaware voted to sustain it.

In the gloomiest and most critical days of the conflict, New England, which "writes all the books," was holding a secession convention, denouncing the war and intriguing with the emissaries of Great Britain. As a consequence, when England sent her powerful fleet to invest our ports, she exempted the coast of New England from the operations of the blockade. When the success of the war had established its popularity in the free States, a Southern man formulated the financial policy which extinguished its immense debt in less than twenty years.

Under these same "slothful and demoralizing" auspices of slavery the great Indian wars were fought, their magnificent country opened to white settlement, the savages removed, and measures adopted for their civilization. Florida was acquired from Spain, and from France that vast domain, the Louisiana Territory, comprising more than one million square miles, greater in extent and richer in resources than the whole territory of the then existing United States, and giving us the sole ownership of the Mississippi River from its sources to the Gulf. This one achievement, conceived and accomplished by a Southern President, through the supreme skill and courage of a Southern diplomatist, overshadows in its stupendous proportions, outweighs in the vastness of its results every national measure presented by Northern statesmanship and secured by Northern enterprise since the landing at Plymouth Rock. It was this far-reaching stroke of Southern diplomacy which elicited from the great Napoleon the prophetic remark that the "acquisition of Louisiana forever strengthens the power of the United States and gives to England a maritime rival that will some day humble her pride."

The war for the independence of Texas and the administration of its government by its Southern Presidents was another manifestation of the "slothful energies" of the "dependent idlers" and "overseers." The war with Mexico and the annexation of Texas were assailed by the free States with the same vehement opposition which they had presented to the last war with England; but a Southern President again held the helm, the pluck and patriotism of the "gentlemen idlers" once more prevailed, and Columbia took in her embrace the giant of whom it has been graphically said: "If Texas were laid on the face of Europe, with the head resting on the mountains of Norway, one palm covering London and the other Warsaw, it would stretch across the kingdom of Denmark, across the empires of Germany and Austria, across Northern Italy, and bathe its feet in the Mediterranean."

It is capable of producing 12,000,000 bales of cotton and will have a cattle range left larger than the whole State of New York. This war, prosecuted by the enervated, non-progressive "overseers," gathered into the national domain also the Territory of New Mexico, itself larger than the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; extended the national boundary to the Pacific, and opened to the world the Golden Gate of California.

Mr. Tillet, in his haste to elevate the new South by degrading the old, forgets that most of the representative men of the new South, her Senators, Congressmen, Cabinet officers, governors, judges, jurists, leading journalists, college professors, eminent divines, and successful men of business in every line were born and educated under the "curse of slavery." There is no new South. The term is a misnomer and a myth. It is simply a phrase costume in which old prejudices masquerade through modern prints, seeking to pervert the education of Southern children into the conviction that their ancestors, if not criminal, were little more than a race of "idiots," blunderers, blockheads, and failures. But the present or future generations will never find reason to be ashamed of the brainwork of the old South.

He tells us that the wealthy families in the South, with a view to preserving the physical and mental vigor of their families without sacrificing their estates, encouraged matrimonial alliances between their daughters and the sons of the poor. That the vigor, physical and mental, of the wealthy families of the South needed the infusion of new blood from some outside source, I am not prepared to deny, but he fails to tell us what alliances were provided for the sons of the rich. They seem to have been overlooked. Or were their alliances not matrimonial, but contracted outside the pale of that sacred relation, and between them and their bondwomen? The tell-tale bleaching complexions of the African race in the South only too plainly answer this question. Who wonders that the families of the rich in the South needed more mental and physical vigor?

Brains and money were constantly combining, he says, to build up and preserve in the South the finest society in the world "to the exclusion of those twin evils, the millionaire and the tramp." The arrogance of this claim is only equaled by its oblivion of the combination that existed between brains and the greed for money to build up and preserve slavery, that "twin relic of barbarism."

This same reliable gentleman tells us in his remarkable letter that all the brains, all the patriotism, all the moral worth of the country in the early days of the Republic were found in Southern men; but he forgets to point out which one of them all was from the cotton States, that section to which he belongs, and which is attempting, by the passage of this bill, to fasten upon the whole country the infamous labor-impoverishing system of English free trade.

He does not remind us that of all the splendid galaxy of great men who introduced into a Southern Legislature the first resolutions declaring the right of the colonies to be "free and independent," who presented the first resolutions to the same effect in the Colonial Congress, who wrote the Declaration of Independence, who led the patriot armies to victory, who were the prime movers of the convention that formed the Constitution, who stamped upon the Constitution the construction which will be accepted as long as the Constitution is respected, and who framed the ordinance of 1787, not one was from the cotton States of the Union, not one from that portion of the South denominated "solid," where elections are a farce, and where Representatives on this floor are, with few exceptions, recorded as coming with "no opposition," by a vote in many instances less than one-tenth of the legally authorized constituency. He is also careful to omit mention of the glorious part which his own State has taken in all the grand achievements of the country's history.

He does not mention the name of one "illustrious son" of Mississippi who, possessed of that "fine moral and intellectual organization" of which he prates, has shed any luster on our country. Has this Mr. Ward, or has the gentleman from Mississippi, the name of one to give us? Why is it that while the South has been making "history for others to write and sell" the State of Mississippi has received in that history no mention worthy of record, except that she repudiated her honest debts, and was the home of the only president of the only Confederacy ever organized to destroy that Constitution which this braggart in his letter boasts Southern men framed, established, and construed?

But the "apex of audacity," to use the language of another, is reached by this scribbler, when, as a stigma upon the fair fame of the North, he repeats the stale and long ago exploded lie that the Hartford convention was a "secession convention," and when the only "secession conventions" ever held were in those States, including his own, which through him are arrogating to themselves all the virtue and greatness and patriotism in the land.

While recounting the glories of the "old South," as he is pleased to call it, why does he finish his record at 1853? Is he ashamed of the part the "Senators, Congressmen, Cabinet officers, governors, judges, jurists, leading journalists, college professors, and eminent divines," "born and educated under the curse of slavery" have taken in the period since that year? Is he not equally as proud of the glorious part "Southern men" have taken in that period of our glorious history as of that period to which he confines his praise? Is it strange, Mr. Chairman, that a man who thus extols slavery, and the system of society which it created and fostered, should protest against anything "new," and declare that there is no "new South," and that the term is simply a "phrase costume?"

It is just such men as this that have kept and are trying to keep the South in the shadow of the past; who constantly wave the "bloody shirt" and get mad because they can not have a monopoly of the business; who refuse to look forward, but have always their eyes towards the rear of the procession. It is not strange that the South should be so slow to avail herself of the benefits of the American system of protection to labor when men who are capable of writing such stuff are complimented on this floor as "distinguished citizens" and their productions are read and indorsed by honorable representatives from that section.

Mr. Chairman, I deny the imputations implied in the attempt of this letter to belittle the part taken by the men of the North in securing and maintaining our liberties. Her great names come trooping into my memory. Her Adamses, Franklins, Morrises, Schuylers, Shermans, Warrens, Hamiltons, Jays, Livingstons, and a host of others make up the noble array. Their deeds I do not need to recount; they are written on the glorious pages of imperishable history. And I am reminded that while it may be true that men of the South were the first to pass resolutions (and I honor their memory), men of the North were the first to act, and the first to seal their devotion by shedding their blood in defense of American independence.

I have only disgust and contempt for the fulsome twaddle in which this man talks about the "fine moral and intellectual" superiority of the men of the South over those of the North, and the sneers with which he speaks of the "hungry laborer, the socialist, and the paupers" of the North. It smacks of the sentiment so prevalent in the days of the "old South," that the farmers of the North were the "mudsills" of society and the mechanics were "greasy," so often and so defiantly flung into the faces of the patient freemen of the North before the days when it was demonstrated that it took more than one of those Southern cavaliers to whip five "mudsills" and "greasy" mechanics, and when it became necessary for those same "mudsills" and "mechanics," by their prowess and devotion to human liberty, on a thousand fields, to defend that Constitution which only Southern men established and construed, against the deadly assaults of their descendants.

Mr. Chairman, free-trade writers and orators are given to gloomy prognostications of impending ruin. But somehow such forecasts have always proved to be the mistaken utterances of trembling fear, and have never been realized. Many of those who stand high in the councils of the free-traders have been thus unfortunate in their prophecies.

Hon. David A. Wells, in a speech delivered by him in Cooper Institute, in November, 1883, and in which he claimed that protection had so stimulated manufacturing in this country that the home market was overstocked, and until free trade should come to our relief we should go on from bad to worse, said:

> Things will grow worse until, through wreck and disaster, the home domestic manufacturing production is forced down into correspondence with or below the requirements for domestic consumption, unless in the mean time, through a change in our national fiscal policy, other and larger markets and outlets for our present surplus product can be opened, or some special providence, like famine or war in the Old World, comes to temporarily help us out of our dilemma.

Well, neither foreign war nor famine has come to our relief; there has been no change in our fiscal policy, nor has there been any forcing down of production; but, on the contrary, many more manufacturing establishments have been commenced, and the production from shops and farms has been largely increased, and no "wreck and disaster" have come, and we are more prosperous and wages are higher and goods are more in demand than then. The fact is, and one which Mr. Wells in the same speech admits, that at that time there was, as all will remember, a general stagnation in business throughout the civilized world, including even free-trade England, from which our country, owing to the fiscal policy of which Mr. Wells complains, has recovered more rapidly and more surely than the nations of the Old World.

Again, he said in the same speech:

> A continuation of the causes and policy which restricts our American manufacturer merely to the domestic market for the sale of his products and debars him in a great degree from access to foreign markets, inevitably means, therefore, low wages and the degradation and impoverishment of the masses, or insures the very results which it is claimed a high-tariff policy is certain to avert.

Well, nearly five years have elapsed, and while the policy of which he complains has continued we have not had low wages nor degradation and impoverishment of the masses, but, on the contrary, an advance in wages and the opposite of degradation and impoverishment of the masses.

Mr. Chairman, the argument of the free-trader and of the advocates of this bill, it seems to me, is a sordid dollar-and-cent argument. It rises to no great height. It has to do only with the question, How much cheaper can I buy a suit of clothes or a pair of shoes. It does not take a comprehensive and patriotic view of the situation. It does not ask what is the best thing for the country as a whole, but what is best for me as an individual. It does not occupy the standpoint of the country's glory, of its increase in wealth and power, of the multiplication of its industries. It does not take an account of America as standing by herself and for herself. It does not appeal to our patriotism, but to our love of money. It expresses no desire to see the price of labor enhanced, but drivels about cheaper clothing for those who have first to earn their money before they can buy clothing, either cheap or dear.

It does not glory in a system of our own, but has its eye fixed upon the system of a foreign people no more adapted to our situation than is that same people's government to our free Constitution. In short, it looks backwards and not forwards. It would foist upon a young, vigorous, progressive, and free people the old, worn-out, effete, impoverishing, and class-preferring system of a country whose rich are ever growing richer and whose poor are ever growing poorer. It is not the argument that the American people will listen to. It is not the argument that a people who unhesitatingly assumed the expenditure of $10,000,000,000 and the sacrifice of half a million of valuable lives to sustain and enforce a great principle will appreciate. They still love that country they sacrificed so much to save, and are looking forward to her greater and grander glory, when her people, through and by means of her beneficent protective system—her own American system—shall surpass the prosperity and happiness which they have already achieved, and stand unrivaled in the world's history in all that constitutes a people's greatness.

And now, Mr. Chairman, what is our duty as representatives and patriots? Shall we, in response to the demands of doctrinaires, and in the face of our experience, abandon a policy under which we have advanced from a third-rate to a first-rate power; under which we have undergone a complete industrial revolution; under which we have emerged from a condition of comparative obscurity to the proud position among the nations typified by the magnificent figure, with torch in hand shining a hundred miles out to sea, of "Liberty Enlightening the World;" under which we quelled the greatest rebellion recorded in history; under which we have more rapidly and more easily paid the enormous debt incurred thereby than could any other nation ever organized among men; under which labor has more liberty, more rights, more comforts, more power than under any other government on the earth; under which religion is freer, truth more untrammeled, freedom more assured, and wealth more diffused than among any other people?

Shall we continue the policy of keeping American markets for American labor, and so foster our own industries and build up our own greatness, or shall we return to our condition before all this greatness and glory came upon us, to that condition always following free-trade legislation, and surrender to England our independence and prosperity?

To these questions for myself I have but one answer. I stand for the toilers of America, their continued and increasing prosperity, and the consequent glory of my country.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, in considering the subject covered by this bill we are addressing ourselves to a duty which in every age has been the most important that has devolved on the representatives of the people. Inherent in the very idea of human government, no matter under what system, no matter how crude or how perfect, is the principle that each individual member must make some contribution to a common fund to be used for the common good.

Every individual who is worthy to become a member of organized society, known as government, will cheerfully make this contribution just so long as he feels that the amount exacted approximates a fair distribution of the common burdens among those to be benefited, and no longer.

The methods by which these contributions are gathered into the common fund, no matter how simple or how complex; no matter how harsh or how insidious in their operation; no matter whether paid in hard cash out of the citizen's pocket, or by the sale of his property by a collector, or concealed in the enhanced price of what he eats, drinks, or wears, constitute taxation.

It certainly goes without saying that under our boasted free government, whose people we are representing in our deliberations on this bill, both the methods and measure of taxation ought to be just and equal to every citizen wherever be his home or whatever be his occupation. However much we may differ on other propositions; however difficult it may be for the member on this side of the House to convince the member on that side that when the consumer has paid $1.47 for an article that it cost only $1 to produce he is poorer than he would have been had he bought it for the $1; and however difficult it may be for the member on that side to convince this side that the man who paid the extra 47 cents received a blessing in disguise; however persistently and vociferously and ingeniously the tax-eater may plead with the taxpayer that both are made richer by the peculiar twist of the wrist by which this operation was performed; however doggedly the tax-payer may insist that the emptiness of his pocket is none the less real because his money was taken by a process which he was led to believe would fill rather than empty his purse! however much we may debate these questions, I venture the assertion that no man in this Hall or out of it will be found to say that the burdens of the Government, like its blessings, ought not to fall equally on all the people.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is fortunately one other proposition upon which we can all agree. Much adverse criticism of the President's bold, fearless, and manly message has been indulged in, both in this and in the other end of the Capitol, and in the press, by the representatives of those whose "business interests," as they style their right under the existing laws to levy contribution on the necessaries of life, they say will be disturbed if this bill passes. At first some were even bold enough to say that there ought to be no reduction of taxation; that instead of reduction of taxation there ought to be expansion of expenditure to get rid of the surplus; that the representatives of the people ought to be as fertile in expedients to squander the surplus as they had been in expedients to collect it; that they ought to be able to find or invent some new drain by which an overflowing Treasury might be emptied. With them it mattered not how or where the money was expended, so it was expended, and the necessity for tax reduction averted. But this idea was advanced cautiously to ascertain whether the people would submit to having their money thus squandered. An unmistakable negative response from the press and the people has warned the opponents of revenue reform that the people stand guard over this avenue of escape from the duty they owe their constituents, and have promised time and again to discharge—to reduce taxation.

So that now I believe I am justified in saying that no member on that side of the House, however he may hate to see the pruning-knife of revenue reform applied, however much he may resist reduction of taxation, will dare to rise in his seat and say that more money is not collected from the people than ought be collected, or that the remedy for this surplus is not to reduce taxation and leave the money in the pockets of the people, where it belongs. Hence I say that upon this proposition we are all agreed, that the way to prevent a surplus is to reduce taxation. I know that is the unanimous judgment of this side of the House, and if any one of my Republican friends on the other side of the aisle believes now that the surplus ought not be reduced by reducing taxation, I would like to have him announce that fact as part of the platform on which he asks his constitutents to return him to this House.

Then, Mr. Chairman, agreeing that taxes ought to be reduced, how much and on what ought they be reduced? Ought they be reduced so as to relieve the tax-payers of the most possible or of the least possible of the burdens that taxation necessarily brings? Shall the reduction be made in the interest of those who lose by taxation or in the interest of those who gain by taxation? Shall the reduction be made at the dictation of the gentlemen on the other side of this House who represent those who receive largely more of the amount paid by the people than the Government itself, or shall it be made under the direction of gentlemen on this side of the House who represent those who are appealing to have some part of a ruinous and unnecessary burden rolled off their shoulders?

In short, shall we repeal internal-revenue taxes, every dollar of which is levied on luxuries and when collected goes into the Federal Treasury, or shall we reduce tariff taxation, less than one dollar of which out of four paid reaches that Treasury, the other three going into the pockets of the manufacturing capitalists, corporations, and trusts, for whom, attempt to disguise the fact as they may, our Republican friends are making the fight on this floor? I shall not stop now to discuss the question whether this three-fourths of the enormous toll gathered by these manufacturing capitalists, combines, and trusts, while the Government gathers one-fourth, is ever, by a peculiar process of legerdemain which no human being has ever yet been able to understand, voluntarily transferred from the pockets of these charitable capitalists back to the pockets of the laboring men and farmers whence it was taken. I leave that question for the manufacturing laborer, struggling with capital and Pinkerton's armed detectives for enough of his hard earnings to keep want and hunger from the door of his cabin, to answer. I leave the answer to that question to the Western and Southern farmer, competing single handed and unprotected in the markets of the world against the cheapest labor in the world with his wheat and cotton for enough money to pay the annual interest on the mortgages that tariff-fatted capital has fastened on his humble home. But we are asked to believe that capitalists are honest and liberal and magnanimous, and generous, and just. Only get the tribute of protection into their pockets and they will divide liberally with the farmer and the laborer. They must exercise faith in the generosity and liberality of the capitalists. Nobody can see how they get back their share of this tribute which consumption pays to manufacturing production, but they are asked to trust.

For myself, Mr. Chairman, I have come to loathe and despise the word "trust," as applied to wrongs now committed under that name. I believe that if it was within the scope of legislation I would vote for a bill to strike it from the English language.

Mr. Chairman, I have in my short service on this floor heard from this side of the House some of the severest arraignments of trusts. Indeed, I wish to be just and say that through this debate, when driven to the wall, many of our friends on the other side of the House have disclaimed any desire to legislate in the interest of trusts.

But, sir, there is one trust; a legalized trust; a forced trust; a trust by which the farmer and the laborer, the blood, the bone, sinew, and intellect; the sweat and toil that produce wealth, is by law compelled to make, not the natural and voluntary, but an unnatural and unequal combination with capital, which is only wealth already produced. This combine, under the forms of law, compels labor, whether on the farm, or in the shop, or at the loom, to pay to capital as its trustee almost one-third of its hard earnings, 47 cents out of every $1.47, under the guise that in some mysterious way, and after it shall have deducted what it deems its proper share, it will return it to its proper owner.

Mr. Chairman, I represent a constituency of 160,000 people. Fifty thousand of these by their daily toil make for themselves and the 110,000 who constitute their helpless and dependent families such subsistence as is left to a farming community, after paying the tax and tribute exacted by the revenue laws which we are trying to amend. I do not intend to claim that this subsistence is as comfortable as the rich soil and natural advantages of my State ought to afford. Nor do I intend to stop now to argue with the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], who was so recently Kentucky's guest, and who seems, like the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], to think it the proper thing for a Republican protectionist who enjoys the hospitality of a Southern State, to seize the first opportunity to misrepresent and belittle his host.

Nor shall I, by comparing his speech in Louisville with his speech on this floor, rob him of the satisfaction it seems to afford him to boast that he not only insults, belittles, and misrepresents my people here, but that he was ill-mannered enough to do the same thing in the very home of his host. Kentucky is not what she ought to be. She is not what she longs to be. She is not what she would have been if my venerable friend from Pennsylvania had not so successfully spent twenty-five years of his mature and vigorous manhood in fastening on the country a system and rate of taxation that have made her industries pay a constant and exorbitant tribute to the industries of his State—that have made her people poor and his people rich.

The gentleman says he has—devoted the years of his vigorous manhood to the overthrow of the political influence of the slave oligarchy in this country.

If he would only devote his declining years to the emancipation of its political affairs from the fatal embrace of its twin-sister, the high-tariff oligarchy, which fastens the chains of slavery on every human being who eats his bread in the honest sweat of his brow, without regard to race, color, or previous condition, he would outlive the day when even his imagination, distorted as it is by prejudice, could conjure up such a dark picture of Kentucky as to say of her that—the masses of her people are steeped in poverty and illiteracy, and are strangers not only to the comforts of humble life, but to the commonest and most absolute necessaries of Northern laborers.

Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that the condition of the farming and laboring people of my State, engaged in occupations that pay but receive no protection, occupations that yield but meager returns on the money and labor expended after Pennsylvania has collected her tariff tolls, appeared pitiable in the extreme to the great apostle and representative of the tariff barons of the State of Pennsylvania.

But, Mr. Chairman, it ill becomes this great apostle and leader of that system of high tariff, which has wrought comparative poverty not only among my people but among all the people of the South and West, to taunt the victims his system has wronged.

Compared with his people, who have an equal or even a much less capital invested in manufacturing under the peculiar privileges and bounties the present tariff affords, I am forced to confess that my people are poor. And they will remain poor just so long as other industries have a legal right to levy 47 cents on every dollar that they are compelled to spend for the necessaries and comforts of life. No member on this floor has so far had the hardihood to claim that any farmer engaged in producing the great staples of this country gets directly one dollar of benefit from protection. It is admitted that he is constantly paying out more money on every one of the four thousand articles covered by the tariff schedule which he buys than he would pay if the tariff was reduced.

As a portion, and a very large portion, of the consumers, these farmers paid into the public Treasury last year their portion of $217,000,000 collected on imported goods. It will be admitted that four times as many home-produced goods were bought and consumed as there were of foreign. The tariff put it within the power of home manufacturers and producers to sell these goods for $868,000,000 more than they could have been bought for in the foreign markets if we were allowed to buy our goods where we can buy them the cheapest.

In every case where any foreign goods of a similar class were imported and sold here in competition with similar goods made at home the proof is conclusive that the home manufacturer was adding to his goods the entire tariff the foreigner was required to pay. Whenever and wherever the home manufacturer is selling at a less price than the foreign goods, with freight and tariff added costs, then it is shown conclusively that more tariff is being charged than is necessary to protect the home manufacturer, and he can make no complaint at a fair reduction.

If it be true, as gentlemen on the other side of the aisle in their stress are sometimes led to argue, that goods are made and sold as cheap or cheaper here than we could buy them if there was no tariff duty on them; or, in other words, that the tariff duty is not added to the price and paid by the consumer of home-produced goods, then the tariff is of no benefit to the manufacturer, and all this desperate resistance to tariff reduction by the representatives of protected interests is waste of lung power and valuable time. If it was not added; if it did not go into the pockets of the manufacturers; if the consuming farmers and laborers did not have it to pay, that side of the House would not only lead the van for reduction, but for its entire removal.

Turning again to agricultural Kentucky, which the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania says is "steeped in poverty and illiteracy," and which, I am bound to admit, is poor when compared with tariff-fatted Pennsylvania, let us see if the gentleman, had he been disposed to deal fairly with this matter, could not have found a better reason for this condition than that she is "the most illustrious victim of" the internal-revenue or the whisky trust. It would have occurred to one who could lift himself above sectional prejudices and mercenary interests, especially when he was searching for statistics to misrepresent our illiteracy, to examine the internal-revenue returns and to ask himself why it is that Ohio and New York, each of which pays more internal revenue than Kentucky, are not "steeped in poverty and illiteracy." Why it is that Illinois, which pays twice as much internal revenue and makes more and meaner whisky than any State in the Union, "is not steeped in poverty and illiteracy." [Applause.] Indeed, he might have come closer to home, even into the precincts of his own wealthy State of Pennsylvania, and found that she was paying two-thirds as much internal revenue as Kentucky, and that she had 19,540 retail whisky shops, more than five times as many as Kentucky, dealing out, as he eloquently expresses it, this—most fruitful source of poverty, ignorance, vice, crime, disease, insanity, and ignominious death known to the civilization of the nineteenth century.

By looking a little further into the statistics he would have found that there were in the State of Illinois 11,635 and in the State of Ohio 15,540 retail liquor-dealers, the former over three times as many and the latter over four times as many as the 3,598 in the State of Kentucky. Yet the gentleman will not dare rise and say that Illinois, with over three times as many retail whisky-shops and making more mean whisky than Kentucky makes of good, is a victim of the whisky "trust" or is steeped in "ignorance and illiteracy." [Applause.] If he said that of Illinois my usually good-natured friend [Mr. CANNON] of that State, who so cordially indorsed this sentiment when uttered about Kentucky, would draw his Spofford's Almanac and utterly confound him by reading to him and the House all the statistical tables it contained.

But, Mr. Chairman, the explanation of Kentucky's poverty and Pennsylvania's wealth is so plain that he who runs may read. A few words tell the simple story: Kentucky pays 47 cents of tribute on every dollar's worth of tariff-protected goods she buys. Pennsylvania receives 47 cents tribute on every dollar of these goods she sells.

Commerce is nothing but exchange of products through the convenient representative of values known as money. And when the Kentucky farmer comes to exchange, through the process of sale and purchase, his farm products for the manufactured products of Ohio, Illinois, Pennsylvania, and the New England States, he is, under the existing tariff laws, required to give $1.47 of the value of his products, fixed in the markets of world, for $1 in value of those manufactured products fixed in the same market.

Thus for twenty-seven years the hard earnings of the farmers of the South and West have, under this high protective law, poured in a constant stream of 47 cents on every dollar into the coffers of the manufacturing States, with the same unerring certainty with which the waters from the mountains, the hillsides, and the valleys have under the laws of gravitation poured into the bosom of the ocean.

In my State, Mr. Chairman, there were in 1880, as shown by the census, 320,000 persons engaged in farming. The same census shows that for each person who labors there are two helpless women and children dependent on his labor for support.

The census does not show how much of the products of the farm are sold or exchanged for the necessaries of life which are manufactured or produced by our protected friends who say they will be ruined if this bill passes, but I assume that even the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who says the masses of our people "are strangers not only to the comforts of humble life, but to the commonest and most absolute daily necessaries of Northern laborers," will admit that every person engaged in farming spends on an average at least $100 for machinery, farming implements, clothing, sugar, and salt, and other protected articles for himself and the two that are dependent on him.

This is only $33⅓ for each per year, and is certainly poverty enough to satisfy even the distorted imagination of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Kentucky's 320,000 farmers spending $100 each with our manufacturing friends under a tariff averaging 47 per cent. will pay $22,000,000 for the goods they buy and $10,000,000 tariff for the glorious privilege of dealing with our own people.

Ten millions a year is the contribution, not of all these people of my State, "steeped in poverty and illiteracy" to this high-tariff Moloch, but the contribution of the farmers alone. My district contains one-tenth of the farmers of the State. One million dollars is exacted from its farmers, one hundred thousand from each of my ten counties, $100 from each man, woman, and child that from choice or stern necessity wields the hoe, follows the plow, or drives the reaper, whose occupation coming closer than any other to nature and nature's God ought to be as free from unjust human exactions as the air he breathes, which according to the gentleman from Pennsylvania is about the only comfort the poverty-steeped illiterate enjoys.

But some one on the other side of the aisle in his zeal to justify this wrong is ready to say: "I am ready to admit that $33⅓ is less than will buy the tariff-taxed articles consumed even by the pauper in the Kentucky poor-house. But when you say that 47 per cent. is added to all those articles he uses you put the figures too high. The prices of all protected articles are not increased by the amount of the protection given." Then if they are not, why all this fuss about the small reduction asked in this bill? If you are not using the full rate of protection you are getting under the law, how are you to be hurt by striking off what you are not charging?

If you say that under the tariff laws you sell an article cheaper than it could be sold without a tariff, then I say abolish a tariff that does the manufacturer no good. Whenever a tariff does the consumer no harm it can do the manufacturer no possible good, and ought to be promptly abolished. But, if you think my per cent. is too high, name one yourselves. What is the per cent. of protection that we pay and you receive? It must be large or you would not stake your party and close your eyes to all considerations of common justice and honesty, to make the fearful fight that you are making here to retain it.

I will take the lowest per cent. that any honest Republican statistician will say the consumer pays the producer of tariff-taxed articles, and show that in ten years it will impoverish any community of consumers and enrich any community of producers of these articles. Reverse the effect of the tariff laws in Kentucky and Pennsylvania. Let us receive and her pay the same tribute that we are paying and she is receiving now. At the end of ten years Kentucky will bloom like the garden of Eden, and the venturesome crow that should attempt to wing his flight across the once rich and proud and arrogant Republican State of Pennsylvania would either carry his provisions with him or reach civilization again with an emptier stomach than ever went to bed with a Kentuckian "steeped in poverty and illiteracy." [Applause.]

But we are told, Mr. Chairman, that the farmer and laborer ought to pay the present rate of taxation cheerfully because the manufacturer needs it and uses it to pay the farmer better prices for his produce, and the laborer better wages for his service. These propositions seem now to constitute the larger part of the stock arguments for high protection, since the protected industries have been driven from the plea of infancy. To ask if the manufacturers and capitalists have heretofore dealt so generously with the farmer and laborer in return for the enormous sums these beneficent trustees have collected, ought to be a sufficient answer to both of these arguments.

But in view of the readiness with which the representatives of capital and monopoly on the other side of the House, driven from all other grounds of defense, retreat behind these subterfuges and make a piteous appeal for high protection in the interest of the poor laborer and farmer, it becomes us to examine these arguments with more seriousness than they really deserve. Necessity is the mother of invention, and the necessity of the attorneys of tariff-fed capital, in this last ditch, appealing in the interest of the two classes they have fleeced and impoverished since 1861, that their tribute be not disturbed, would merely excite ridicule, if it did not so often deceive.

Do they need the present rate of protection to enable them to pay, not only the wages now paid laborers, but even higher wages than ill-paid and discontented labor has ever demanded? What are they paying labor? Production is the joint earnings of capital and labor, and ought to be divided in proportion to what each puts into the common partnership. If a laborer borrows $1,000 of capital he pays for its use and the risk of its loss 6 per cent., or $60 per year. When the laborer is able thus to form a partnership with $1,000 of capital, by borrowing it and investing it himself, $60 is the amount of the joint profits that $1,000 of capital receives.

If the laborer invests this $1,000 in farming it is the universal experience, and no man who has observed the farming operations or studied the farming statistics of this country will deny the proposition, that as a rule even this interest, this apparently small exaction of capital, will finally consume all the profits of the joint venture. And in three cases out of four the farmer borrowing the capital will finally fail. On the other hand, the capitalist who lends his money at this rate, whether the borrower uses it in farming or other pursuits, will grow gradually but certainly rich. And I undertake to say now, and fear no contradiction, that no man or class of men have any right to invoke the aid of special laws to enable them to realize more than 6 per cent. on capital invested in the production of articles our own people must buy and consume.

And I undertake to say further, that whenever capital employs labor in producing that which the people must buy and consume, it has no right to demand, and especially has no right to invoke, the aid of law to demand more than 6 per cent., which is a fair profit on the capital invested. All the profits beyond that ought either be paid to the laborer by increase of wages or released to the consumer by reduction of prices. Applying these propositions to the manufacturing, farming, and labor statistics of the census of 1880, and what do we have?

The States of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois seem to make the most desperate efforts through their high-tariff representatives to keep up tariff taxation, and thereby take care of the farmers and laborers not only of their own States but of the whole country. It is therefore pertinent to inquire what they are doing for the farmers and laborers for whom they entertain such tender regard. I will not compare the rich manufacturer of these States with the poor farmer and laborer of Kentucky or of the Southern or Western farming States. Nor will I compare the farmer of Massachusetts with the farmer of Illinois, as is done by the St. Louis Republican, against which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] so warmly protested when the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WILSON] a few days ago had such a comparison read at the Clerk's desk as part of his remarks.

But I will compare the earnings of the farmers and laborers of Massachusetts with the earnings of the protected manufacturers of Massachusetts; the earnings of the farmers and laborers of Pennsylvania with the earnings of the protected manufacturers of Pennsylvania; the earnings of the farmers and laborers of Ohio with the earnings of the protected manufacturers of Ohio; the earnings of the farmers and laborers of Illinois with the earnings of the protected manufacturers of Illinois. These States are certainly conspicuous examples of the development of the farming and manufacturing industries in the same State, side by side, under the benign influence of the very tariff laws we are trying to reform.

The census shows that in 1880 there was in Massachusetts invested in farming $164,288,956; that there was engaged in farming 64,973 persons; that the value of the total products of the farms of that State for that year was $24,160,881. By simple division we find that to each person engaged in farming there was invested $2,528 of farm capital, made up of the value of the land, farming implements, and stock. We find further that the entire value of the product of the labor of one person using $2,528 of farm capital was $372 for the year. We find further that the entire capital invested in manufacturing in that State was $303,806,185; that the number of persons engaged was 352,255; that the entire product, after deducting the cost of material, was $244,162,629.

It is easy to figure from this that to each person engaged in manufacturing there was invested $863, and the product of each person so employed using $863 capital was $693. A manufacturer, then, joining his labor to an investment of $863 made $693 in Massachusetts, and a farmer in the same State, joining his labor to $2,528, made $372; or the farmer, with nearly three times as much money invested in land, farm implements, and stock as the manufacturer invests in mills and machinery can make a litle over one-half as much profit. This is the beneficent effect of our high protective tariff on the farmer in Massachusetts.

But some Massachusetts Republican is ready to jump up and say that, although more than twice as much money to the hand is made with one-third the capital in manufacturing as in farming, manufacturing capital pays the difference to the manufacturing laborer. Let us see whether this is so. Fortunately, the census statistics settle this, too. Those statistics show that the entire wages paid to the 352,255 persons engaged in manufacturing in Massachusetts was $128,315,362, or $364 to each person. I have found no statistics showing farm wages in that State.

But let us illustrate these statistics. Mr. A has $2,528 and he invests it in a farm, farming implements, and stock, and putting his own hands to the plow-handles works twelve months on this farm. Mr. B has only $863, which he invests in a manufacturing establishment, and hiring Mr. C, who has no money, to do his work, spends the year loafing around the hotel and market place telling the farmers and laborers the great value to them of the protective tariff, and writing me and other Congressmen that not only his special industry, but the entire country will go to the bow-wows if the rate of tariff is reduced.

Here we have the farmer, the manufacturer, and the laborer playing their respective parts in glorious manufacturing Massachusetts under the glorious tariff law which is kept up for the benefit of the farmer and laborer. How do they come out at the end of the year according to the census statistics. A has for the use of his $2,528 and his year's work $372. B receives as the product of his $863 and C's labor, $693. How much of this $693 does he give to C, the laborer, for his year's work? He gives him $364 and keeps $329. Two thousand five hundred and twenty-eight dollars and farmer A's hard year's work bring $372. Laborer C's year's work brings him $364. Eight hundred and sixty-three dollars and the war tariff brings manufacturer B, who has not struck a lick of work, $329.

But turn to Pennsylvania. Capital invested in farming in 1880, $1,095,405,324; number occupied in farming, 361,112; farm products, $129,760,476. To each person engaged in farming $3,637 is invested in land, implements, and stock. And the labor of each person so employed with $3,637 invested yields $431.

In manufacturing there is $474,510,993 invested, 387,072 hands engaged, who received in the year 1880 $134,055,904 in wages, and produced, after deducting raw material, $279,797,882.

To each person engaged this gives $1,252 of manufacturing capital invested, and each person produced $719 and gets $346 in wages. Substantially the same result follows. The farmer for a year's toil and $3,637 invested gets $431. The laborer engaged in manufacturing gets $346, and the tariff-eater, otherwise known as the manufacturing capitalist, can put in $1,252, do nothing, and get $373—$27 more than the laborer gets for his hard year's work, and only $58 less than the farmer gets for his year's work and his investment of nearly three times the money.

But some representative of the Ohio or Illinois protectionist, on the other side of the Hall, is ready to say that the lands in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania are poor; that no such meager returns to the farmer and laborer, as compared with the returns of manufacturing capital, can be found on the rich soil of Ohio or Illinois. Not too fast, my friends. Let us examine this tale-telling census. From the State of Ohio hails the distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. MCKINLEY] who writes such an elegant minority report to show that the country will be ruined if even the slightest move is made toward stopping manufacturing capital from robbing the farmer and the laborer.

In Ohio there was in 1880 invested in farming, $1,261,726,263. Of her population 397,495 were laboring in this occupation and the product was $156,777,152. In manufacturing there was invested in that State $188,939,614, and laborers engaged, 183,609, and they received $62,103,800 in wages and produced after deducting material, $132,964,132. This shows that to each person engaged in farming there was invested $3,174; to each person engaged in manufacturing, only $1,029. That each person engaged in farming received for his year's labor and a farm capital of $3,174, products to the amount of $394. That each person engaged in manufacturing received for his year's labor, if he worked himself, and the use of only $1,029 of capital, $724 in products. That the manufacturing laborer received for wages only $338.

So that if the manufacturer invested his $1,029 in mills and machinery and hired a laborer to do his work, and gave himself up to idleness and the enjoyment of fine whisky and the other luxuries which our Republican friends are so anxious to untax, he gets $386—$42 more than the laborer, for whose benefit he has made so many hard fights to maintain the tariff, gets for twelve month's toil; and only $8 less than the farmer, to whom his tariff furnishes such a profitable market, gets for his twelve months' toil and his investment of $3,174.

And this in the great State of Ohio, where Democratic Representatives are expected to vote for high tariff because wool is protected. I can not so much blame her few sheep-farmers for clingling to protection on wool. Impoverished by manufacturing tariff, made beasts of burden for every bounty and subsidy manufacturing capitalists choose to heap upon them, it is but natural that the few who can, by the aid of these manufacturers, saddle part of their burdens on their fellow-farmers by collecting of them tribute on their wool, should hasten to do so. It is only another illustration of the stronger shifting burdens and levying tribute on the weaker.

But let us go farther West, to the great agricultural and manufacturing State of Illinois. If there is anywhere on the continent where it might be supposed that the farmer would hold his own with the manufacturer, tariff or no tariff, it would be on the rich lands of Illinois. In 1880 Illinois had $1,175,772,293 invested in farming, and 436,371 of her population were engaged in the business. Her entire farm products were $203,980,137; or each person engaged in farming invested $2,694 in capital, and with this capital and his labor produced $468. In the same State for the same year there was invested in manufacturing $140,652,066, and 144,727 persons employed. The product, after deducting cost of material, was $125,020,766, and the wages paid amounted to $57,429,085; or each person employed used $972 of capital, produced $864 in value of manufactured articles, after deducting price of material, and received in wages $397, the same results as in Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Ohio.

The Illinois protectionist invests $972 in some manufacturing corporation, hires one of the laborers he loves so much to do the work, spends the year in reading the New York Tribune and delivering lectures on the benefits of a high protective tariff to laborers, and his hard-working, horny-fisted neighboring farmer, who has $2,694 invested in his farm and is working twelve hours a day to try "to make buckle and tongue meet" at the end of the year.

And what is the result? How do the three come out? The farmer gets for his hard year's labor and the use of $2,694 invested, $468. The laborer who furnished the year's hard labor to the capitalist, gets $397, and the poor manufacturer who is going to close out his business and be forever ruined, and is not going to make any more cheap goods for the farmers and laborers of this country, and is not going to furnish the farmer a good market for his produce any longer, nor the laborer high wages for his work, if the Mills bill passes, gets $467 for the use of $972 and the hard labor he performs in talking up high tariff and filling the mails with petitions and circulars sents to Congress to assure members that his industry is about to be ruined.

Glorious country this where for a year's toil on a farm costing, with implements and stock, $2,694, the farmer can make only one dollar more than he who "neither toils nor spins" gets on $972 invested in a manufacturing corporation. Where the manufacturer yokes a laborer to $972 of capital, and when this unfair and unequal partnership at the end of the year has made $864, keeps $467 for the part of this small capital, and gives the laborer only $397 for his share. In common decency I would have at least divided equally.

But, Mr. Chairman, whenever a member comes on this floor and lifts his voice in defense of an industrial system that, in its practical results, treats an intelligent American laborer as worth less in our political economy than $972 of capital and pays such a laborer less than that sum earns, and at the same time raises his hands and rolls his eyes back into the past in holy horror at negro slavery, which never rated human service so low, I involuntarily exclaim "Thou hypocrite." The Pharisee "thanking God that he was not as other men" was a model of humility compared with such an exhibition of offensive self-complacency.

But, Mr. Chairman, when from the same census we compare the condition of the unprotected farmer and laborer with the condition of the protected manufacturer in the entire country, the startling results are still more damning to this iniquitous relic of war legislation.

The 7,670,493 persons engaged in farming in the United States in 1880 had invested $12,104,081,440, or an average of $1,578 to each person. They produced $2,213,402,564 in farm products, only $289 to each person using a farm capital of $1,578. The 2,732,595 laborers engaged in manufacturing used an investment in manufacturing capital of $2,790,272,606, or only $1,021 to each person employed. They produced, after deducting cost of material, $1,972,773,642, or $772 to each person employed.

These 2,732,595 manufacturing laborers received in wages $945,953,795, or only $347 to each person. The manufacturing laborer, for whose wages the manufacturing capitalist has such tender regard, gets only $347 out of $772 earned, while this modern philanthropist pockets $375 for the use of $1,021 capital for one year. For this capital, which ought not to bring him over 6 per cent., he gets 36 per cent. without adding a stroke of his labor. The farmer can get only 18 per cent. on his capital, throwing in his own work for the entire year.

No wonder the protected manufacturer, who invests his capital in manufacturing and yokes one of the laborers, for whom he similates such intense affection, to each $1,021 of his investment and gives the laborer only $347 and keeps $375 of the $772 earned, winces and squirms when the Mills bill proposes to reduce the 36 per cent. he is receiving by reducing the tariff which alone makes such enormous gains possible.

No wonder the wages of farm laborers are low, when the tariff robs the farmer not only of the means with which to pay labor, but of the means to furnish himself and family with the commonest comforts of life. No wonder manufacturing labor is struggling for its rights, when manufacturing capital is demanding and receiving for $1,021 more annual divdends by $28 than it pays the laborer for a year's wages.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, in the face of these figures, furnishing, as they do, the solution to the agricultural prostration as compared with the manufacturing thrift and wealth, of even these most favored States in this Union; in the face of constant strikes and lockouts which mark the fierce struggle of laborers in these States to wrest from capital sufficient of these enormous profits to afford a comfortable subsistence, the representatives of tax-pampered manufacturing capitalists but serve their masters in making their appeals in the name of the farmer and laborer.

Listening to the discussion on this floor one would think it had been conclusively proven that the reduction of the tariff meant reduction of American wages. So far from this being true, it is admitted by its strongest advocates that up to this time all efforts of protectionists to demonstrate this proposition have failed. In the annual report of Mr. Herbert Radclyffe, the secretary of the Home Market Club, of Boston, on the last of April, which each one of you has received among the wagon-loads of high-tariff literature poured in upon you, he, lauding constant agitation of that club in the interest of protection, says:

> I believe that the agitation will yet demonstrate that a reduction of the tariff means a reduction in wages to the American wage-earners.

If after all these years of bold assertion of this proposition, and superhuman effort to establish it, the demonstration is only a thing to be hoped for in the future, had we better not heed the lessons taught by the census statistics and labor strikes and lockouts, and turn our attention to bettering the laborer's condition by reducing the cost of his living?

Mr. Chairman, you can no more reduce the wages of labor engaged in manufacturing in this country by the reduction of the tariff than you can reduce the price of the farmer's wheat, corn, and cotton. Both are fixed in the markets of the world. Every honest student of the labor problem will admit that while the laborer of this country receives more per day, week, month, or year than similar labor is paid in Europe, yet he receives no more, and, indeed, in many cases less, for a fixed amount of work here than is paid for the same amount of work in Europe.

This is because he accomplishes so much more work in the same time on account of his superior intelligence and the superior character of our machinery and methods of production. This has been so fully shown by the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and by other gentlemen in this debate, and is so fully admitted by protectionists who meet this question fairly, that I shall not stop to discuss it.

Then where will the loss, if any, resulting from the tariff reduction fall? The struggles of capital, organized and unorganized, in this House and out of it, to prevent this reduction answers this question. If there is loss to any one, which I very much doubt, it will be in reduced dividends on capital. And reduced dividends on capital means reduced interest to the borrower. It means one long step towards the emancipation of our debt-ridden cities, counties, townships, and farms from onerous interest charges, that year by year destroy the prosperity and consume the earnings of the people who furnish the labor, the enterprise, and the energy that organize States, build cities, and develop the waste places of this great country. I believe that a proper reduction of the tariff will cheapen capital, break down unlawful trusts, and emancipate the farmer and laborer from the unjust and unnecessary exactions of the manufacturer and capitalist.

I am not surprised that the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] should talk differently, even though he knew my views were correct. Like Demetrius of Ephesus, he and his co-workers of like occupation, who by means of protection have fastened themselves like parasites onto the backs and stomachs of the poor who must eat and wear their goods, have made no small gain thereby. Indeed, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. MCKINNEY] so thoroughly photographed that gentleman and the tariff monopolists whom he represents that I can not refrain from quoting a paragraph from his speech delivered in this debate.

> Mr. Chairman, I have read in one of the old histories, written many centuries ago, of a class of people who had a monopoly of a certain industry and made great gain therefrom. And there was a certain man came into the land where these people dwelt and preached against them, and his words were so powerful that those who used curious arts brought their books and burned them before all men, and they counted the price of them and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver. And we are told at—
> "The same time there was no small stir about that way, for a certain man named Demetrius, a silversmith, which made silver shrines for Diana, brought no small gain to the craftsmen, whom he called together with the workmen of like occupation and said, 'Sirs, ye know that by this craft we have our wealth; moreover, ye see and hear that not alone at Ephesus but almost throughout all Asia this Paul has persuaded and turned away much people, saying that they be no gods which are made with hands; so that not only this our craft is in danger to be set at naught, but also that the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised, and her magnificence should be destroyed, whom all Asia and the world worshipeth.' And when they heard these things they were full of wrath and cried out, saying, 'Great is Diana of the Ephesians.'"
> Now, like these people of old, Pennsylvania has for a long time had a monopoly in many of these industries which have brought to them great wealth. An apostle has come into their midst who dwells at the other end of this avenue, and has proclaimed to the people against such a monopoly, and many who have heretofore believed in their doctrine are repenting of their sins and proclaiming their conversion before all the people. [Applause.]
> And now comes the great apostle of protection and calls together his people and says: Sirs, ye know that by this protection we have our wealth. Moreover, ye see and hear that not only in Pennsylvania, but almost throughout all the nation this apostle of reform hath persuaded and turned away much people, saying that there be no justice in this doctrine of protection, so that not only this our wealth is in danger to be set at naught, but also that the great goddess of protection should be despised, whom Pennsylvania and all the land hath heretofore worshiped. And when they heard these words they were full of wrath, and cried out, Great is the goddess of protection! [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I intend that justice shall be done Demetrius in this comparison. To his credit be it said that history nowhere records that Demetrius ever, either as a guest or otherwise, belittled or misrepresented the people whom he had impoverished in accumulating his ill-gotten gains.

Our friends on the other side of the aisle say that protection stimulates the manufacturing industries. I admit that it does. It has stimulated them as strong drink stimulates the human system. Leaning and relying on this stimulant year by year, they have demanded and received more of it, till now, drunk and debauched by long and excessive indulgence, they make piteous appeals for more copious draughts from the bowl of protection.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a contest between the principles of free trade and protection, no matter how much the blatant demagogue may expect to deceive the people by this cry. It is an attempt to relieve the people from a small portion of unjust and unnecessary taxation. But I wish to close with a word of caution to those arrogant protectionists in and out of this House who denounce every man who desires tariff reform as a free-trader.

Refuse to reduce and reform the tariff; refuse to lift any part of this burden from the shoulders of the toiling millions of this country; defeat this bill as you have defeated all other measures of relief, and a long-suffering people will rise in the majesty and strength of desperation, and sweep from the statute-books a system the abuse of which has wrought such widespread injustice and poverty in a land where honest labor, under just laws, would bring peace and plenty to every home. [Applause.]

[Mr. SHIVELY withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. MCCLAMMY. Mr. Chairman, the questions of revenue, of how to get the necessary funds to bear the expenses of the Government, has at all times been exceedingly interesting. The object of all government is to secure the best interests of the governed. For this have men banded together into societies, organized governments, made constitutions, and framed laws; the object being to promote the general welfare and secure a community in which individual prosperity and happiness would be the basis of governmental strength and durability. And so our forefathers, fleeing from the wrongs and oppressions of the Old World, came to this new continent and settled into communities and colonies, which in due time were formed into counties and States, and one grand Government, the United States of America. And so the Government was formed and framed for the protection and benefit of each individual, as well as for the protection and benefit of the whole.

And thus our fathers started on a grand and mighty career, after a terrible and exhausting struggle of seven long and weary years for independence. It was never their purpose to flee from one oppression to be sufferers and slaves of another. The bloody struggle had united the people in one patrotic brotherhood, and the white-winged messengers of peace found no sectional lines stretching from east to west to divide and mar and checker this glorious country, the fortitude and courage of whose sons had plucked liberty from the hands of the despot, and forced the Kingdom of Great Britain to proclaim the colonies "Free and independent States." And then "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty," did our fathers "ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America;" "to promote the general welfare," and not create and protect monopolies and trust combinations to enrich the few and enslave and impoverish the many; to protect all, and not enforce a condition in which a few would become the wealthy class and the multitude the poor class. This was not intended to be a government where the word "caste" should line and have a place, but a free government, where the poorest may become rich, and the highest and most distinguished place and office the legitimate ambitions of the sons of toil who follow the plow or drive the jack-plane or wield the trowel. And if the true spirit of the Government is ever destroyed, if liberty is finally lost, it will be because the people will have sold their birthright for a mess of pottage.

I will read with great pleasure the able message of the President of the United States addressed to the two Houses of Congress at the beginning of this session, and sir, I felt a growing interest in my heart and recognized the fact that the country had once more a Chief Executive who felt an interest in the whole country, who recognized himself to be President of the whole country, uninfluenced by sectional ill-will, animated by a patriotic desire to promote the best interests of all the people, and who early calls the attention of Congress and the whole country, not to how best the country may be kept in continued discord, nor how best the strifes and hatreds of sectional animosities may be inflamed and kept burning, but how best peace, prosperity, and happiness may be secured and perpetuated to the people of a glorious and harmonious government after the clouds of civil war have rolled away and the sunshine of peace and kindness once more united friend with friend and section with section. Those dark and bloody and unhappy days are gone, and I hope forever. And as the signs and symbols of the hard strife are fading away from our memories we gladly unite in the hearty wish for the prosperity and continued welfare of the whole country. And for one I shall stand by and sustain that policy which may be best calculated to preserve the peace and secure and promote the happiness and prosperity of the people.

Questions of finance, of political economy and governmental administration confront us, and as lawmakers, representatives of the people, we must address ourselves to these grave and great questions. It may not be expected that partisan spirit has ceased to exist, but hope revives when we witness, as we often do at this Capitol and upon this floor, how Representatives on all sides, if not agreeing in all things, agreeing at least to move steadily on for what is believed to be best for the whole country,

As for myself, Mr. Chairman, I am here with no other purpose in view than to represent my constituents faithfully, and secure for them, so far as my own humble efforts can be effective, the passage of such laws as will enhance the welfare of my constituents, the welfare of my State, and the welfare of the whole country. I have given attention to such matters as I have thought would best secure these results, and if my voice has not been heard upon every question which has challenged the attention of the House, I have felt no less interest and given them no less labor and attention.

But, sir, after all, we have as yet accomplished but little for the relief of the people, and I have thought it were high time we were giving attention to the necessities of the hour. What has yet been done for the relief of the tax-burdened people? What has been done to carry out the recommendations of the President for a relief from the dangers and oppressions of an overflowing Treasury? What has been done to remove from the weary necks of the people the now unnecessary and oppressive war taxes, which to this day, nearly twenty-five years after the close of the war, hang in gloom over the people like a miserable nightmare, attacking labor, destroying the fruits of industry, expanding further the already overflowing and swollen pockets of the rich, and breaking down the hopes of the laboring classes as the rich grow richer and the poor become poorer? Sir, visions of horror rise up before me as I look in the face of the uncertain future, and for one I am here to work and to vote for each and every measure which will restore to the people prosperity at home. And I am ready now to vote for the removal of these high and unreasonable and oppressive taxes, and assist as best I may all efforts, come they from whatever quarter they may, to a return to the times when capital and labor shall be restored to their true relation of twin sisters in this common inheritance of the great Union of our fathers. We acknowledge no authority or claim from any quarter or section of superiority, and I say to Congress and to the Chief Executive, give all the people a fair and equal chance.

Mr. Chairman, time will not serve me to investigate and canvass in a speech at this time all the multifarious questions involved in the bill now before us. But, sir, I have examined the bill in detail, and I shall cheerfully support it. It is a moderate bill. It does not cut down at one lick all the inequalities of the present tariff law. It was thought wise to so legislate that business, now supported and maintained by the kindness and partialities and favoritism of the Government, as seen and felt under the existing law, should have time enough to be warned that the days of their infancy have about expired and they must prepare to walk alone.

Before I enter further the discussion of the injustice and unfairness of a tax upon the necessaries of life generally called the tariff, I wish to consider another species of tax, invented and brought into being by the Republican party, as is said by them, to meet the necessities of immediate war and procure the means of supporting the Government in war between the States, called the "war of the rebellion." To raise a sufficiency of funds to carry on that war it became necessary, in the opinion of those then in control of the Congress, to pass what was called the internal-revenue law. Under this act incomes, and banks, and matches, whisky and brandy, ale, beer, cigars, snuff, tobacco, etc., were taxed and a large amount of revenue was collected, which at that time was of great necessity to meet the exigencies of civil war. These were essentially war taxes, and should have been discontinued as soon as the necessity which created them had passed away.

They were willingly borne, when necessary, because the people recognized the necessities of the Government; but they were never popular, and as the Republican party held on to them after the war was over and used the thousands of internal-revenue officers, who like locusts filled all the land, as instruments in the hands of that party to terrorize the people, to spy upon them and entrap them in all kinds of charges of violations of the law and through and by such influence and prosecutions and persecutions control the elections and perpetuate the continuance of that party in power, the law itself soon become to be despised and hated by the people, and a universal desire was for the repeal of these odious laws. The war was over and the Republicans were in power in every branch of the Government. Did they repeal them? No! In the Forty-seventh Congress the Republicans were in full possession of the Government and controlled every branch of the Government—executive, legislative, and judicial—both Houses of Congress and the President. Mr. Chairman, then they had a fair chance to repeal the internal revenue. Did they do so? Did they introduce one bill to do so? They were in full power; did they take the tax off of brandy and whisky and other distilled spirits? No, sir, no! Did they then take the tax off or make one step to take it off of tobacco? No, sir, no!

What did the Republicans in that Congress do towards lightening the burden of the tax-payers then? Listen, ye oppressed tax-payers; the Republican party then in full power took the tax off of banks and bank capital and incomes, and never said a word about removing the tax on distilled spirits and tobacco. If the Republican party was the friend of the people who suffer from these onerous and disagreeable taxes, why did it not remove them in the Forty-seventh Congress when in full power? There can be but one answer, Mr. Chairman. The Republican party was not in sympathy with the people, not in sympathy with those who had to meet these hard taxes, and only passed such laws as would relieve the wealthy—the banks and those who had large incomes—and gave not a vote to relieve the oppressed or remove these hard laws from the necks of the poor.

But that party now is moving to lift these taxes. Ah! Mr. Chairman, they pretend to be so doing. Following the lead of one who sits on this side of this Chamber, they pretend to be marshaling their forces to repeal these laws, but, sir, judging them by the past, I assert that this is a pure species of political hypocrisy, a mere trick to deceive the people. I charge that at this day they are in favor of keeping up the taxes on spirits and tobacco, and would only vote to take them off in order to keep the tax up on breadstuffs, clothing, and the real necessities of life. I sir, myself, would vote to remove the odious tax and forever abolish it, but I must also vote to relieve the people from an onerous tax on the prime necessities of life, and while I am anxious to remove all these internal-revenue taxes, I must say that I prefer cheap clothes, cheap shoes, cheap hats, cheap blankets, cheap plows, cheap hoes, cheap axes, and cheap necessaries of life to cheap whisky.

A protective tariff is an unjust and unfair discrimination by the Government in favor of one class of citizens against another class of citizens. It is an enforced contribution in which one man is made to contribute to the support of another man's business without a resulting benefit, and contrary to the spirit and letter of our Constitution. The Government has a right to tax people either directly or indirectly to raise money to carry on the Government, but Congress has no right under the Constitution to force A to support B in his business. What right has the Government to show such difference and such partiality as to pass a law to force one man, without value received, to give his money to the assistance of another man in his private business? And yet that is what those who advocate a protective tariff are doing, and that is what has been forced upon the working masses and poor toilers for lo! these many years, until injustice and wrong come up in sighs and groans from the oppressed poor in a greater grief and deeper woe than escaped from the hearts of the unhappy Jews when they toiled and endured Egyptian bondage.

That this Government of the people and for the people, foremost in the arts and sciences and in free laws, with a Constitution the admiration of the world, declaring equal rights to all and special privileges to none, the handy but immortal work of those immortal heroes who before they would submit to have forced upon them a stamp tariff tax of a few pence on tea, and for the maintenance of that right pledged and offered up their fortunes, their sacred honors, and their lives—I say that we, the descendants of such a people, should come at this day, under the cringing and whining plea of aiding and helping poor infant industries, thereby seeking to grow rich by placing hard burdens, grievous to be borne, upon the necks of the poor, the toilers, the workingmen and workingwomen, and the young and tender children, who, because of this powerful giant-infant, are sent so early to the tread-mills of the machine shops instead of to school, that the vast investments in manufactories of affluent corporations might be sustained and upheld in their already too great influence and power—these crimes, I say, are enough to shock, to startle the people from their lethargy to rise up in mass and drive these would be lords and masters from their already fortified castles.

I have not time, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the committee and the country, in detail, to the demands of those who are seeking power and influence from the General Government with which to oppress the people. I can only call attention to a few necessaries, the markets of which are under the control and influence of the protectionists. Such articles as sugar, salt, wool and woolen goods and wearing apparel, blankets, hats, shoes, etc.

Under the plea of aiding infant industries the tools of the workingman are sold at high prices to benefit the corporations which manufacture them.

Spades and shovels and hoes have to pay a tariff rate of about 35 per cent. in order that the same articles made here may be forced upon the men who are compelled to use them. So, also, scythes, sickles, and reaping-hooks are made by the present tariff 35 per cent. higher to the purchaser as the law now stands; screws of iron, called wood-screws, cross-cut saws taxed in 1883 8 cents per lineal foot, and mill pit and drag, over 9 inches wide, 15 cents per lineal foot, and hand-saws over 24 inches in length, $1 per dozen and 30 per cent. additional. Let all the workers in wood hear this. Axes, hatchets, and adzes, a tariff tax of 35 per cent., drawing-knives 24 per cent., squares in iron or steel 6 cents per pound and 30 per cent. additional, and iron squares marked on one side 3 cents per pound and 30 per cent. additional.

I call the attention of the committee and of the people to these high taxes put upon these necessary tools of the mechanics and laboring men. Before a man can start out on his work to support himself and family he must go to a store and purchase these tools of his trade, and pay into the hands of the manufacturers an extra price above what he might get them for, in order that the manufacturer may receive his protected blessings from a one-sided and partial administration of the Government. This, Mr. Chairman, is Republican rule—Republican methods of dealing with the workingman.

If we look to an earlier day, when it was said American manufactories were young and needed assistance, you will see that our earlier statesmen did not make the burdens of the people so hard to be borne.

Wool and woolen goods unmanufactured had no protection from 1789 to 1816, and not until March 3, 1857, did this industry seem to need protection, but was absolutely free up to that time, and then a tariff of 24 per cent. was levied. The act of June 6, 1872, reduced the duty 10 per cent., and the act of March 3, 1875, re-enacted the duties to what they were prior to the act of June 6, 1872, and, Mr. Chairman, as the law now is the people are unmercifully taxed to support these woolen manufactories. Blankets, flannel goods, all goods with wool as part of the texture with as high a tariff as possible, so as to amount to prohibition to the foreign manufacturer with the privilege to the home manufacturers to ask as high a price as these bloated corporations may agree to demand from the consumer. And so the poor consumer has to pay these pets of the Government from the shoes and socks which keep his feet from the ground to the shirts and pants and coats which cover his body, to the hat which shelters his head from the sun and storms. These infant industries are strong. They very nearly own us. They are seeking to be our masters, and we are nearly their slaves.

I call briefly attention to duties on iron, namely:

Cast-iron butts and hinges, 2½ cents per pound.
1883, hoop-iron, $20 per ton.
Iron in rods, $25 per ton, 1¼ cents per pound.
Slit-iron, $25 per ton, 1¼ cents per pound.
Bar-iron, rolled or hammered, comprising flats not less than 1 inch or more than 7 inches wide, nor less than one-quarter inch or more than 2 inches thick. Rounds from one-half inch to 4 inches in diameter, from 1883 1 cent per pound. Bar-iron ditto. Flats less than three-eighths inch. Rounds and squares less than three-quarter inch, 1¼ cents per pound.
Horseshoe nails in 1883, 4 cents per pound.
Cut nails and wrought nails from 1½ to 4 cents per pound. Spikes, 2 cents per pound.
Pig-iron, 1864, $9 per ton.
Pig-iron, 1870, $7 per ton.
Tacks, brads, and sprigs, not including 16 ounces to 1,000, 2½ cents per thousand.
Iron cables and chains, 2½ cents per pound.

We are all, with every interest we have in life, completely dominated by the power and influence of the protectionists.

To show, Mr. Chairman, the enormous amount of tax the people pay, from all sources of taxation, the total amount of receipts of the Government from all directions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, was $371,403,277.66. To make this sum, this enormous drain from the earnings of the people, there was paid in on customs, or tariff, $217,286,893.13, and on the internal revenue $118,823,391.22, which makes an average duty or tax on goods imported into this country of 47 per cent. And of this immense tax we paid a tax on—

Sugar, molasses, and sugar candy	$58,016,686.00
Iron and steel, and manufactures of	20,713,234.00
Wool	5,729,717.00
Manufactures of wool	29,729,717.20
Silk	15,540,301.00
Glass and glassware	4,510,312.00
Earthenware	2,409,[illegible].16
Hemp, jute, material for cotton bagging, and flax goods	6,[illegible]28,310.41
Cotton and cotton goods	1,233,599.57
Lumber and salt, in round figures	1,700,000.00
Total	145,981,773.14

I might go on for hours and hours enumerating the articles which the protectionists have dominion over, and show how they do place heavy burdens on the people—such articles of prime necessity as sugar and salt and wool and woolen goods and wearing apparel and blankets and hats and shoes and almost every article used as necessaries for life which are produced and manufactured in this country.

Upon what principle of right, I ask, Mr. Chairman, has a man who raises sheep to have the Government use its power to enable him to receive for his wool more than it is worth in an open market? What has he done that he should be protected at the expense of the poor? Will the Government make laws to keep the poor from being clad? Will the Government so legislate that the poor whom, we are told by the great Master, we always have with us, must suffer for ordinary raiment to protect their flesh and skin from the cold rains and snows and blasts of winter winds that creep through the crevices of their poorly thatched homes? Will the Government take sides with the wool-growers in a controversy between them and the poor widow with her orphan children, as to how much they shall exact from her to clothe the little boys and girls, and assist these rich establishments in grinding out of the unhappy widow her last dollar to meet the hard necessities of her unhappy life? I again ask, will the Government take sides with these vast monopolies against the poor widow with her young and tender brood, amongst them, perhaps, boys who are to be the defenders of this country? Will the Government assist in making these boys and girls, the children of the poor, tributary slaves and vassals of these powerful trusts and corporations?

Mr. Chairman, I speak plainly. I use the simplest and plainest words which can express the hardship of the suffering poor, the oppressed and tax-burdened laborers and workingmen of our country; and if perchance I may contribute some good I shall be satisfied that my time at the capital of my country has not been spent in vain.

I want to see Congress engaged in making laws which shall be equal and just to all men. We want no partiality shown by the Government to a favored few. But let all men stand alike, upon their personal merits and worth, and not a few favored at the expense of the many laborers of the land. We can not disguise the fact that a miserable and wretched discontent is now universal with the patriotic workingmen of our country; and while I am opposed to strikes and other combinations of like character, because I believe needed redress of their unjust grievances can not be secured by such methods, yet I do sympathize with the efforts of labor to secure a just reward for toil and sweat, that moves engines, builds houses, tills lands, sows seed, reclaims waste places, and fills barns and smokehouses with corn and meat. And for one, in this great struggle for bread, for life, I say to the Government and to Congress, Hands off! and let the laboring man have a fair and equal chance with the capitalist, with the bondholder, the stock-broker, and the kings of imperial corporations and trusts.

If you would not sap the blood of patriotism which gives vigor and life to the Government; if you would not destroy the love of country now so fresh and pure in the hearts of the yeomanry of our country; if you would put down a mean effort to establish caste in this free country, which like some miserable wire-grass is now clogging the plowshare of labor, we will have no more class or sectional legislation; industry will be encouraged by laws which are equal in their burden and equal in their protection and benefits to all, the rich and the poor, the laboring men, the farmers, the mechanics, the merchants, and the manufacturers. Then real peace will be established and strikes and riots will no more disturb our repose.

The honest working people are tired of supporting and gazing at these lilies of the valley, who toil not, neither do they spin; and yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of them.

This is a free Government, and the people want freedom in it—freedom to all, oppression to none; equality before and in the laws to all; special and preferred protection and privileges to none. [Loud and long-continued applause.]

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BYNUM having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. LANE, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. SHIVELY (at 10 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PRIVATE BILLS INTRODUCED AND REFERRED.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 17, 1888.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 5259) to relieve Jacob G. Bostatter from the charge of fraudulent enlistment; and

A bill (H. R. 7398) to subdivide the eastern judicial district of Louisiana, and to fix the time and place for holding terms of court therein.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9711) making an appropriation to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government and the Bureau of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and the Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the centennial exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, from July 4 to October 27, 1888.

OHIO VALLEY CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. ALLISON. I present the report of the committee of conference on the Cincinnati exposition bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9711) making an appropriation to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government and the Bureau of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the centennial exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, from July 4, to October 27, 1888, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3, 8, and 22.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19, 20, and 21, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"That there shall be appointed a committee of Congress composed of ten members, five to be appointed by the President of the Senate and five by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Said committee is authorized and directed to visit said exposition and make such report to Congress in that behalf as they may deem needful and proper."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$147,750;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment, insert the following: "For expenses of the committee of Congress, $2,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Provided, That payment of the expenses incurred by the committee of Congress shall be made on vouchers approved by the chairman of said commitee."

And the Senate agree to the same.

W. B. ALLISON,
H. L. DAWES,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
D. B. HENDERSON,
J. C. CLEMENTS,
BENJ. BUTTERWORTH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CAMERON. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope that motion will not be pressed at this moment. Let us see how far we get on to-day with the business of the session.

Mr. CAMERON. We may as well decide the question now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. ALLISON. I beg pardon of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania insist on the motion?

Mr. CAMERON. I think the question had better be taken now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CALL presented a petition of certain fourth-class postmasters in Florida, praying that their compensation be increased to $50 a quarter in some cases and $75 a quarter in other cases; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. QUAY presented a petition of druggists, citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the repeal of the law classifying druggists as liquor dealers; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present a petition of 14 postal clerks, praying for the passage of an act for the readjustment of the salaries of postal clerks. Although the petition is addressed to me personally it is undoubtedly intended for the consideration of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and I move that it be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally with amendments:

A bill (H. R. 8074) to provide for allotment of land in severalty to United Peorias and Miamies in Indian Territory;

A bill (S. 2901) granting to the Milwaukee, Lake Shore and Western Railway Company the right of way through the Lac de Flambeau Indian reservation in the State of Wisconsin;

A bill (S. 2315) granting the right of way to the Yankton and Missouri Valley Railway Company through the Yankton Indian reservation in Dakota; and

A bill (S. 2807) to grant to the Puyallup Valley Railway Company a right of way through the Puyallup Indian reservation in Washington Territory, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1331) for the relief of John Fletcher, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2265) for the relief of acting assistant surgeons of the Army, reported it with amendments.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to say that I disagree to the report in that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2730) for the relief of Charles F. Bowers, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1058) to relieve John J. Farnsworth of the charge of desertion, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PADDOCK submitted a report to accompany the bill (H. R. 7222) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish agricultural stations in connection with the colleges established in the several States under the provisions of an act approved July 2, 1862, and of the acts supplementary thereto," heretofore reported by him.

Mr. PASCO. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 942) for the relief of George F. Brott, to report it adversely. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2967) to provide for the erection of a monument to the memory of General George Rogers Clark; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2968) granting a pension to Mrs. J. E. Norton; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 2969) to restore to the pension-roll of the United States the name of Elizabeth Reid, formerly Elizabeth Horton, widow of James L. Horton, United States steamship Yantic; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VANCE introduced a bill (S. 2970) for the relief of Calvin J. Cowles and George B. Hanna; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 2971) for the relief of Michael Conlan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, it was Ordered, That the memorial and accompanying papers of J. Goldsborough Bruff be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Printing.

LAND-PATENT SUITS.

Mr. STEWART submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, directed to answer without unnecessary delay the resolution of the Senate of the 26th day of March, 1888, calling for information with regard to suits authorized by the Department of Justice to vacate land patents issued by the United States, so far as said resolution relates to proposed litigation to vacate patents to the Mexican land claims known as the Ranchos Raymundo, Las Pulgas, Corte de Madera del Presidio, Buri-Buri, and Cañada de Guadalupe la Visitacion y Rodeo Viego, situate in the State of California, together with the dates of the several patents for said claims proposed to be vacated; the names of the persons interested in vacating the same, the names of the attorneys employed to prosecute the proposed suits, and by whom they are to be compensated; whether any contracts have been made with private parties to pay the costs of the United States in said proposed suits; whether the Attorney-General has made such an examination of said cases as to determine whether such suits ought to be commenced, how the United States will be benefited thereby; whether the United States is likely to be successful in such litigation; whether the Department of Justice has exact information as to the number of inhabitants residing on said claims; the number of innocent persons whose titles will be clouded by the proposed litigation; and to what extent the Department of Justice proposes to relitigate the private land claims in California which have been adjudicated and patented by tribunals organized by Congress for that purpose.

Mr. STEWART. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution at this time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think that it had better be printed, so that we may see it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution goes over under the rule on the objection of the Senator from Missouri, and it will be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5259) to relieve Jacob G. Bostatter from the charge of fraudulent enlistment was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 7398) to subdivide the eastern judicial district of Louisiana, and to fix the time and place for holding terms of court therein, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business that order is closed, and the Senate resumes the consideration of the Calendar under Rule VIII, beginning at Order of Business 868.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to state that I shall ask the Senate on Monday, the 28th instant, to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 18, being the bill (S. 287) to quiet title of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes. I wish to give this notice now, and I hope that there will be no objection to the taking up for consideration of the bill at the time indicated, inasmuch as a few days thereafter I shall find it necessary for me to absent myself from the city for some time.

The bill was reported December 20 last, and has been passed over from time to time as it has been reached on the Calendar for the convenience of the Senators from New York; but I hope that at 2 o'clock on the day indicated the Senate will allow me to have the bill taken up for consideration and proceeded with to its conclusion. I do not think it will take long to dispose of it; I certainly do not expect to occupy much of the time of the Senate in remarks concerning it.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish to object to any assignment for the accommodation of the Senator from Iowa; I only desire that the unfinished business be not displaced by any arrangement that is made, and that it hold its position as the unfinished business of the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. The 28th is a good way off.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have put the day pretty late in the month, being the 28th.

Mr. BLAIR. I understood it was next Tuesday.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No, not until Monday, the 28th instant.

POSTAL CRIMES.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chief Clerk will report the first order of business on the Calendar.

Mr. SAULSBURY. House bill 7052 passed the Senate yesterday with an amendment. I move that the Senate insist upon the amendment and ask for a committee of conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (H. R. 7052) relating to postal crimes and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware moves that the Senate insist upon its amendment to the bill, and ask for a conference on the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, were appointed.

INSPECTORS OF HULLS AND BOILERS.

Mr. FRYE. I was necessarily absent from the Senate yesterday in the room of the Committee on Commerce considering the river and harbor bill, and shall be detained in committee all day to-day. There are two or three small bills on the Calendar that will take comparatively little time, and I ask unanimous consent that I may call them up now, in order that nothing shall prevent my attending to the river and harbor bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will not ask for a violation of our understanding.

Mr. FRYE. I can not be here to-day, as the Senator knows, and I could not be here yesterday.

Mr. COCKRELL. If when we reach those bills anybody objects to them, we can send for the Senator.

Mr. FRYE. But there was a bill reached yesterday and passed which ought not to have been passed in its present shape; it ought to have been amended before it was passed; and that was done because I was not here.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator will state what the bill is, I shall move to reconsider the vote by which it was passed, so that it may be amended.

Mr. CULLOM. It seems to me that those Senators who are compelled to be out of the Senate on committee work ought to have a little opportunity to call up bills in which they are interested.

Mr. COCKRELL. How many committees are there that have leave to sit and that are in session now? If we grant the privilege to one and violate the rule, we must grant it to all, and if we do that we may as well abandon what we have agreed to do.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator knows the river and harbor bill is one which requires continuous consideration by the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will address the Chair.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator from Missouri objects, I have nothing to say, and I shall ask no further favors of the Senate.

I move to reconsider the vote by which Senate bill 2393 was passed yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title of the bill will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2393) to fix the compensation of inspectors of hulls and boilers in certain districts of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves to reconsider the vote by which this bill was passed by the Senate.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and read the third time will also be reconsidered, if there be no objection.

Mr. FRYE. I move, in line 4, after the word "Michigan," to insert the words "New London."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4, after "Michigan," insert "New London;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the inspectors of hulls and the inspectors of boilers for the districts of Albany, Michigan, New London, and Superior shall hereafter be entitled to receive an annual salary of $1,500 each; and that the inspector of hulls and the inspector of boilers for the district of Apalachicola shall hereafter be entitled to receive an annual salary of $1,200 each; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order of Business 866 is the next bill on the Calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. ALLISON. Pending that, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5445) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on an amendment of the Committeee on Appropriations.

Mr. COCKRELL. The pending question is on the proposed amendment of the Senate committee to strike out in lines 15, 16, and 17 the words:

That in all pensions to widows, payments shall be made from the date of death of the husband.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That all pensions which have been, or which may hereafter be, granted under the general laws regulating pensions to widows in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th day of March, 1861, shall commence from the date of death of the husband.

I desire to know whether——

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will allow me to suggest that he can accomplish the purpose he has in view by simply striking out of the amendment, as it is in the text, the words "which have been or."

Mr. COCKRELL. In line 17, of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Committee on Appropriations, after the word "pensions," I move to strike out the words "which have been or;" so as to read:

That all pensions which may hereafter be granted under the general laws regulating the pensions to widows in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th day of March, 1861, shall commence from the date of death of the husband.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COCKRELL. The amendment which I have proposed is precisely the bill on that question which was reported by the Senate Committee on Pensions, and which was passed by the Senate and is pending in the other House.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire if the Senator means to confine this payment to those who hereafter get pensions?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes. In the bill which was passed by the Senate, known as the dependent-pension bill, there is this proviso—and I propose to insert the same proviso in this bill—

All pensions granted to widows under this or any other general law shall take effect from the date of death of the husband of such widows, respectively, but not dating back of the passage of this act.

That is what was recommended by the Committee on Pensions, and it was passed by the Senate. My amendment simply makes the language of this bill conform to that.

Mr. TELLER. Then that leaves the widows who got pensions between 1880 and the approval of this bill governed by a different rule from that which governs all the payments of pensions to widows prior to 1880, and that will govern them subsequent to the passage of this act, leaving an interregnum of some eight years where one rule is applied and at all other times another rule is applied.

It seems to me that if we propose to make any change at all we ought to put all the widows on an equality and give all the widows of the last war pensions alike. The aim of the amendment of the committee, I understand, is to give the same to all, to give to those who got their pensions between 1880 and the date of the approval of this proposed law and hereafter the same pension. I do not see any reason for leaving the interregnum between 1880 and, say, the 1st of July, 1888, and providing that the widows embraced in that class shall get their pensions on the date of application and the others from the date of the death of the husband. We give pensions to the widows because their husbands were entitled to pensions, and I do not see by what rule we can object to paying the pensions of widows from the date of the husband's death. It seems to me eminently proper, if we are going to pay the pensions in the future as we have paid them largely in the past, that we should apply the same rule to all.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from Missouri will not insist upon this amendment. I think the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations has been very carefully considered, and is a proper provision. It is in practical accord, I will say to the Senator, with the recommendation of the Commissioner of Pensions, as will be seen by his last report. On page 18 of his report the Commissioner of Pensions states:

Under existing law a widow's pension certificate can only bear date from the day on which she files her application. Our knowledge of the sacred relations of husband and wife makes us know that the last thought which often occurs to the widow is that of the pecuniary results of death. Moreover there is a sense of delicacy which prevents a woman from immediately making application to be availed of the results of her husband's death, and so between cares, delicacy, and sometimes ignorance of right, long intervals elapse between the death of the husband and the filing of the application of the widow.

Then it is true he recommends that—

In such cases as may hereafter arise it seems to me that the law should allow the commencement of the pension to date from the death of the husband, where the other conditions required by the law are present.

The reason which actuated the committee in moving this amendment which applies to those cases arising between 1880 and the present time was that as respects all other widows the pension does begin at the date of the death of the husband. Under section 4713 of the Revised Statutes in the case of every widow applying for a pension, where the cause of death originated prior to March 4, 1861, the widow receives the pension from the date of the death of the husband if the application is filed within three years. The statute of March 3, 1879, applied a different rule to widows of soldiers who served in any war after the 4th of March, 1861. That was a manifest injustice. This provision places all the widows upon an exact equality practically, and therefore, although it is retroactive to the extent of allowing widows who filed their applications between 1880 and 1886, or the time of the passage of this bill, arrears of pension, yet it places them upon an equality with all other widows receiving pensions. So I hope the Senator from Missouri will not insist upon his amendment.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senator from Iowa whether the quotation he has read from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions as to fixing the time when the pension of the widow of a soldier shall begin, to wit, at the date of death of the husband instead of the date of the application, was not looking to the future and not to arrears of pension as understood by the Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. ALLISON. It is true the Commissioner recommends it as to the future, but his argument applies to the amendment of the committee as well. I quoted his argument, not his recommendation.

Mr. FAULKNER. Does not his argument apply simply to the question of the delicacy that is incident to the fact of the death of the husband which prevents the widow from applying immediately after his death?

Mr. ALLISON. So it does, but in every other case except that of the widows between 1880 and the present moment, who are widows of soldiers in service after March, 1861, the widow does draw her pension from the date of the death of her husband, notwithstanding her application may not have been immediately made.

Mr. BECK. Is it not true that the widows of the soldiers of the Mexican war must arrive at the age of sixty or sixty-two years before they are pensioned at all?

Mr. ALLISON. That is true of service pensions, but the widow of an invalid soldier of the Mexican war draws a pension from the date of the death of her husband if the application is filed within three years, and if it is not filed within three years, under section 4713 of the Revised Statutes, she, of course, then can only draw from the date of the filing of the last paper.

Mr. COCKRELL. In moving this amendment I was simply aiming to have inserted in the bill the recommendation of the Committee on Pensions and the formal act of the Senate in passing the dependent pension bill which has this express provision in it, as I have read. I thought this bill ought to be made to harmonize with that bill. As I said, in the dependent pension bill, which has passed the Senate and is now pending in the other House, we find this provision:

> All pensions granted to widows under this or any other general law shall take effect from the date of death of the husband of such widows respectively, but not dating back of the passage of this act.

There are just two questions involved. The first is in regard to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations without the adoption of my amendment, and the other is the provision in the bill as it came from the other House. The question is, how much will be the additional cost imposed by the adoption of the committee amendment instead of the House provision. I have made estimates, and they are accurate according to the data upon which they are made; and it is the estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Estimating that 7,000 claims of widows will be allowed during the fiscal year 1889, and that the average period of nine months will cover the arrearage at $12 per month, or $108 for the year, will make the additional cost $756,000 for the fiscal year 1889. This will be the additional cost if the proviso is limited to claims hereafter allowed, which will be the proviso I propose to insert. If the proviso is extended to claims of widows against whom the limitation of arrears act has run, then the estimate is that 9,959 claims of widows have been already allowed since June 30, 1880, wherein pensions have been allowed from date of filing the application instead of from dates of deaths of husbands; and that an average period of nine months elapses between date of death and date of application of widow for pension. Thus, estimating $8 per month for nine months, or $72 for each of the 9,959 claims of widows so already allowed will make the additional cost of $717,048 for this one class alone—that is, for the class of claims against whom the limitation of the arrears act has taken place. If, therefore, the proviso should include only these two classes, and that is what the proposed amendment of the Senate committee includes, to wit, claims of widows hereafter allowed and claims of widows already allowed, subject to the limitation of arrears act, from date of application instead of dates of deaths of husbands, then the additional cost will be $756,000 for the first-named class for the fiscal year 1889 and $717,048 for the last-named class, making a total of $1,473,048, which will be the net additional cost for the fiscal year 1888; and in addition to this additional cost must be considered the claims of widows hereafter—that is, after the end of the fiscal year 1889—allowed each year.

No estimate of the probable number of widows' claims which may be allowed each fiscal year after 1889 has been made by the Pension Office. We can, however, easily make an approximate estimate upon the same data upon which the estimate for 1889 has been made by the Pension Office. Estimating an average period of nine months from date of death of husband to date of application of widow, at $12 per month, we have $108 for each claim of a widow allowed in such fiscal year, and, estimating the number of claims of widows to be allowed after 1889 at 6,000 annually, we have $648,000 as the additional cost each year after 1889 for this class of claims hereafter allowed.

That will be the effect of the amendment proposed by the Senate committee.

If the Senate amendment becomes a law, these estimates will prove rather below than above the actual amounts of the additional costs which will be imposed thereby; but if the Senate amendment is not agreed to and the proviso in the bill as it came from the House shall become a law, and "in all pensions to widows, payments shall be made from the date of death of the husband," then we are at sea without compass or chart, and have no even approximate estimate or supposition from the Pension Office as to the additional cost which will be imposed thereby. We have the estimates for the two classes, which will be included in the proposed Senate amendment which I have already given. To these must be added the claims of 11,831 widows of the war of 1812, and all such claims as may hereafter be allowed; that is, since June 30, 1887.

Mr. ALLISON. May I interrupt the Senator just a moment?

Mr. COCKRELL. It will be no interruption.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator speaks of widows of the war of 1812. The pensions of all those widows are service pensions purely. I wish that to be understood in connection with his statement.

Mr. COCKRELL. As a matter of course the pensions to the widows of that war are service pensions; but the amendment proposed by the committee would give them arrears. That is the point I am making distinctly.

Mr. TELLER. It would give them arrears?

Mr. COCKRELL. Unquestionably, according to my construction of it.

To these must be added, as I said, the claims of 11,831 widows of the war of 1812 and all such claims as may be allowed since June 30, 1887. And the claims of widows of the soldiers of the Mexican war—of which 895 had been allowed up to June 30, 1887, and 4,443 in all had been allowed up to April 30, 1888—and infinite wisdom alone can tell how many will be allowed hereafter, and all such claims as may hereafter be allowed; and in addition to all these must be added all claims of widows allowed by special acts of Congress at the rates specified in each of such acts, many of which are at the rates of $25, $40, $50, and $100 per month. And these widows would take arrearages according to those rates from the date of the death of their husbands, and in many instances the arrearages would run up to many thousands of dollars.

The only estimate made by the Pension Office is as to the number of claims of widows of the soldiers of the Mexican, Florida, and Black Hawk wars, and other wars allowed prior to March 4, 1861, and who are now alive. This number is placed at 1,702, and it is estimated that the average period for which arrears would become due would be five years, and the rate per month would be $8 per month, or $96 per year for each of the 1,702 widows for five years, amounting to $816,960. It must be observed that this estimate only includes 1,702 of the 11,831 widows of the war of 1812 and the 4,443 widows of the Mexican war, whose pensions had been allowed up to April 30, 1888. If we deduct this number of 1,702 widows, for whom the Pension Office made the foregoing estimate, from the whole number of widows of the war of 1812 on the rolls June 30, 1887, being 11,831, and of the widows of the Mexican war on the rolls April 30, 1888, being 4,443, and, together, numbering 16,274, we have left 14,972 widows of the Mexican and prior wars now on the rolls. Estimating the average period of arrears for each of these 14,972 widows at five years each at $8 per month, we have the additional cost of $7,186,560 for these widows, in addition to the $816,960 for the 1,702 widows. In this way the estimate for all the 16,274 widows now on the pension-rolls will be $8,003,520, as the additional cost of the provision in the bill as it came from the other House. This does not include the claims of such widows which may hereafter be allowed.

According to the report of the Commissioner of Pensions for 1887 there were on June 30, 1877, in his office 9,764 claims of widows of the war of 1812, of which 676 were then pending, and 9,088 on the rejected files—that is, rejected, but subject to reconsideration on presentation of proper evidence at any time. And there were 3,095 claims of widows of the Mexican war, of which 3,081 were pending and 14 on the rejected files.

Nearly all, if not all, of these pension claims of the widows of the Mexican war were allowed prior to April 30, 1888, as the large increase in the allowance will show; but how many more have been filed since June 30, 1887, or may hereafter be filed, no one can possibly tell.

It is absolutely impossible for any one to figure or calculate with any accuracy the many millions of dollars which will be taken out of the Treasury by reason of the provision in this appropriation bill inserted by the House of Representatives. The Mexican war pension bill alone provides:

That every such officer, enlisted man, or widow who is or may become sixty-two years of age, or who is or may become subject to any disability or dependency * * * shall be entitled to the benefits of this act.

There are hundreds of these widows who are not yet sixty-two. They are not yet entitled to their pensions. The pension law as enacted here in March, 1886, gives $12 per month to widows. That law must be taken into the account. Fifteen or twenty or thirty years ago a soldier of the Mexican war died and his widow was not sixty-two years of age, but some ten or fifteen years hence she becomes sixty-two years of age and becomes entitled to a pension under the Mexican war pension law. The House provision gives her arrearages from the date of the death of her husband at $8 per month up to the 19th day of March, 1886, and after March 19, 1886, $12 per month. I say there is no justice, no fair dealing, no equity in this, and the Pension Committee took the correct position in its report on the dependent pension bill in limiting the allowance of arrears to cases hereafter allowed.

Mr. PADDOCK. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. PADDOCK. I want to say to the Senator that he must not take the report of the Pensions Committee upon the dependent pension bill as a precedent for any other case.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not taking the report, but the action of the Senate.

Mr. PADDOCK. I understood the Senator to refer to the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. I referred to the bill reported by the committee, the language of the bill itself as passed by the Senate. It is the action of the committee and of the Senate.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to say to the Senator that the committee advised the Senate at the time when that bill was under consideration that it had not reported such a bill as it desired to report, but it reported such a bill as it had reason to believe from the circumstances of the then situation, then fully described, and which I will not now do more than refer to, was the best attainable proposition at the time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I remember that.

Mr. PADDOCK. The committee would have desired, if it had followed its own inclination, to report a much more liberal bill, but it felt itself constrained at the time on account of the peculiar situation to report only such a bill as it did report. And, if the Senator will allow me to say another word as one of the members of that committee, I regret now that the committee had not done what it desired to do, because we find from the action in another place that that bill has been sidetracked and that a pretense has been made to pass a more liberal bill, but probably an action taken with no other design than to obstruct rather than to secure the passage of any bill at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, we have been liberal in these matters; we have been just; we have been generous; we have been magnanimous. On the 19th day of March, 1886, Congress enacted a law entitled "An act to increase the pension of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors," and under that law widows are allowed $12 a month, while the soldier himself is only allowed $8 per month. We provide in that act—

That no claim agent or attorney shall be recognized in the adjudication of claims under this act.

So that the widows get the entire benefit of that increase of $4 per month, an increase of 50 per cent. over what the pension was before, without any remuneration or claim on the part of the claim agents or pension attorneys.

I think the amendment which I have proposed is fair and just and liberal, and that it is all that ought to be granted. I think the provision in the bill as it came from the House should be stricken out, and that the amendment proposed by the Senate Committee on Appropriations should be amended to the extent I have indicated, and I hope my amendment will prevail.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the difference between the proposition of the Senate Committee on Appropriations and that of the Senator from Missouri is that the latter will save to the Government $717,048. We know exactly what the difference is. The uncertainty of the House provision has nothing to do with the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, and it is a simple question for the Senate to say whether they desire to save $717,048 from a class of very needy people, and leave those people receiving a different pension under different treatment from what all other widows who have received pensions previous to 1880 and those who will receive pensions hereafter. If it is so essential that we should save this amount, and take it from this class of people, the Senate ought promptly to sustain the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. If, on the other hand, it is the purpose to do equal and exact justice, the same justice we are to do to those who apply hereafter, if we are going to do exact justice to all sorts of classes alike, we are bound to give to those who got their pensions between 1880 and the passage of this bill the same that we give the others.

How long does the Senator from Missouri or any body else suppose it will be, if we pass this law in this shape, until we shall be asked to provide for this class of cases? He knows, certainly, that we shall be very apt to do it. If we are to deal with this subject at all, we had better deal with it in a proper manner and deal with it in such a way that there shall be an end of it. If there is any reason why we should give pensions hereafter to date from the date of the soldier's death, the same reason exists why we should do it with those widows who have had their pensions allowed since 1880.

This is but a continuation of the soldier's pension, except that we have added $4 a month extra.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if, as the bill now stands on the report of the committee, the arrears of pension are denied to the widows of the Mexican war soldiers? I simply wish to know the fact.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. BLAIR. That being the fact, is there any reason for that save that the pension drawn by the soldiers of the Mexican war is a service pension, as a rule, while in the other case it is a pension founded upon disability? Is there any other reason for the distinction?

Mr. ALLISON. The report of the Committee on Appropriations excludes the idea of the widow of a soldier who receives a service pension being included in this provision for arrears.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit a suggestion there?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. What becomes of the widows of the soldiers in the Mexican war who have been granted pensions on account of the death of their husbands from disease or disability connected with the service and incident to it?

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to that, although of course I should have alluded to it.

The theory of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations is that these pensions shall apply only to widows of soldiers who themselves received pensions on account of disability, and shall not apply to the widows of soldiers who received a pension merely on account of service in the Mexican war or the war of 1812. The Senator from New Hampshire wants to know why that distinction is made. In the first place, it is made because in many cases there are widows whose claims would run back for fifty years, especially in the case of the war of 1812, and they would in many cases run back thirty years, or twenty-five years at least, in the cases of the Mexican war.

The Committee on Appropriations did not wish to deal with that great question of whether the widows of soldiers of the Mexican war and of the war of 1812, who have been widows for thirty or fifty years, and who have been granted pensions on account of the services of their husbands in the war of 1812 for fourteen days or in the war with Mexico for six days, should come now and receive fifty years arrears of pension. We did not undertake to grapple with that great question. We considered that that question was not one which was properly germane to the provision here, and although this clause as it came from the House of Representatives is capable of being construed as it is construed by the Senator from Missouri, yet it is capable of being construed in a much narrower way. If the Senator will look at the report of the Commissioner of Pensions he will see that that Commissioner would probably decide that under this original provision as it came from the other House arrears would only be granted where applications were made hereafter.

Mr. COCKRELL. Some other Commissioner might take a different view.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true, but the Senator himself stated the injustice of that provision as applied to service pensions, because it is true that a widow of a soldier of the war with Mexico could receive a pension when she arrived at the age of sixty-two years, although her husband may have died in 1848, forty years ago. Therefore it was manifest to the Committee on Appropriations that this provision as it came from the House should not be allowed to pass on account of its injustice to the widows of soldiers of the war of the rebellion, and because it was likely to give to the widows of soldiers of the Mexican war arrears of pensions for from thirty to forty years. The Commissioner states that the average of these would certainly be nine years. Hence the Committee on Appropriations undertook to deal with the narrower question, which they believed was intended by the provision put in this bill by the House of Representatives.

Now, the Senator from New Hampshire asks me why it is that we excluded the widows of the war of 1812 and of the war with Mexico? I will state to the Senator frankly why the committee did so. The committee excluded those because up to 1879 the pension of every widow dated from the death of the husband if application was made within three years. At that time we cut off from that provision the widows of soldiers who were engaged in the war of the rebellion, but we retained it as to the widows of soldiers of the Mexican war. In other words, Mexican-war widows up to this very moment, if they have filed their application within three years, by section 4713 of the Revised Statutes receive a pension back to the date of the death of the husband.

We concluded that this liberal provision for the widows of soldiers of the Mexican war was fair and reasonable, and we did not choose to interfere with it. But if anybody thinks that this report of the committee deals unjustly with the Mexican-war widows I am not very particular about their insertion or not. The Commissioner of Pensions estimated the cost to be $800,000, and that the average of arrears would be five years. I think that this is a sufficient answer to the Senator from New Hampshire that this average of arrears being so great is a fair indication that it should be considered as a separate question, while the average of the arrears to the widows of soldiers of the war of the rebellion is only nine months. If the distinction is wiped out it will cost $800,000.

Mr. BLAIR. As long as the amount is so small and the basis on which it is given to the widows of the war of the rebellion is precisely the same in nature and merit as that on which it is to be extended to the widow of a soldier of the Mexican war, would it not be more symmetrical and in accordance with principle and worth more than the $700,000 or $800,000 to have the amendment of the committee modified so as to include all? I would much prefer to support it in that way.

While I am up I wish to say that I think the committee failed to appreciate the new light that has dawned on the horizon of this country within a recent period with regard to something like justice, not to say liberality in the matter of pensions to those who have been the defenders of the life of this country. The Senate ought to take notice of the fact that in the other branch of Congress there has been already reported, so far as I know unanimously, certainly with the ardent support of the majority of the committee, that is to say, the Democratic party, an arrears-of-pension bill, and that the $250,000,000 which the first payment is to cost is spoken of in very appropriate terms as a mere bagatelle and as a proper method of absorbing and distributing the surplus at the present time and for a long time to come. All these matters ought to be considered in view of this dawning reason and this promise of justice liable to become a great tree, if not a great forest, overshadowing the whole country. It ought to be considered, I think, in dealing with so comparatively small a question as is involved here, whether we shall not adopt the new policy and all parties be united to illustrate that policy in this instance in the comparatively slight appropriation of $700,000 or $800,000 that is required. It seems to me we ought to do this.

Then we should remember further that not only has the idea of pensions, based upon disability as contracted in the war of the rebellion, become obsolete in the other end of the Capitol, but they have gone so far as to adopt there the notion of a service pension, and to report favorably to it with reference to all who participated in the recent war of the rebellion; and it does really begin to look as though the country was reconstructed and the Union restored, and that the war amounted to something.

I do not think it is becoming in those of us who, during this long, dark struggle of twenty years and more have tried to secure something like justice to the soldiers of the war of the rebellion, now to undertake to draw distinctions between those who served in different wars; and I respectfully suggest, and I would move if it be necessary to make the motion (I think the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will be able to suggest the language to be inserted himself), to insert what may be necessary to make this provision cover the widows of soldiers of the Mexican war whose pensions depend upon the disability of their dead husbands.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to correct one reference made by the Senator from New Hampshire to the committee of the House of Representatives, if it is permissible.

Mr. BLAIR. If I am wrong I desire to be corrected.

Mr. PADDOCK. I understand, in the same way, I suppose, as the Senator gets his information—from the newspapers—that the Democratic members of the Committee on Pensions in the House, all of them except the chairman, are entitled to be absolved from the charge the Senator makes as to the alleged recent action of that committee looking to a new departure in the matter of a more liberal pension policy.

Our friend, the chairman of that committee, if rumor is to be credited, is playing altogether a lone hand in respect to at least one and the most important of the measures to which the Senator from New Hampshire has referred, the per diem rated service-pension proposition, which was reported from that committee to the House. Therefore the Senator must not state that the committee of the House have performed such an act as that to which he refers, and that our Democratic friends of that committee are responsible for it in any extent, except as to the chairman, who at the present time is somewhat peculiarly circumstanced politically.

Mr. BECK. I hope the gentleman will state here what he means by "a lone hand." [Laughter.]

Mr. PADDOCK. If there is any place in the world where that term is perfectly understood it is in Kentucky, where my distinguished interrogator was reared and educated. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLAIR. I am the only Senator on this side of the Chamber who does not understand it, I think. [Laughter.] I am obliged to my friend from Kentucky for asking the question.

I did not mean to be understood as saying that the committee in the opposite end of the Capitol have sanctioned the service-pension idea in full, but so far as I am aware there is no lack of union in the committee in the indorsement of the removal of the arrears-of-pension limitation as to those who participated in the war of the rebellion, no lack of unanimity in the recommendation that the Treasury be called upon to devote its surplus to the amount of $250,000,000 immediately among those who participated in the war of the rebellion and contracted disabilities. God be thanked for that! But as to the other question, the granting of service pensions to those who took part in the war of the rebellion—on the Union side, I mean to say, of course; I wish to guard myself in that particular—I do not understand that there is unanimity.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I only desire to say that I believe all that the Senator from New Hampshire predicted is likely to happen; the limitation on the arrears of pension will, I fear, be removed, and $250,000,000, may be double that sum, be given away under patriotic pretenses to pension agents and lobbyists, whereby the old soldiers will be more demoralized than benefited. I fear that many of the representatives of both parties are pandering to what they consider the soldier element of the country. They will find some day that it is really the pension agents and the other patriotic robbers who get the most of it. I agree with the Senator from Nebraska that a man will play a lone hand and a poor one at that when he votes against a pension bill. There seems to be a desire to vote for whatever will squander the most money and give it in such a way that a few pretended soldiers' friends who hang around Washington and call themselves special advocates of the soldier (who are really robbing him and at the same time are robbing the tax-payers of the country) are the principal beneficiaries. But I only rose for the purpose of saying that the bill referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] will be over here very soon, and when it does come I shall most earnestly endeavor to have an income tax imposed on all the incomes of the wealthy men and corporations of the country to meet these great appropriations for pensions, so that the wealth of the country shall in some way contribute to the burdens that are imposed to support the men who are said to have saved the property of the country which these men hold.

Mr. TELLER. But you want to pay the bonds off.

Mr. BECK. I suppose we must pay them off, and pay them off with any premium added that anybody who holds them sees fit to ask. It is because of the high taxation that you Republican gentlemen have imposed on us that it is necessary either to pay extravagant premiums or to lock the money up. So perhaps it is better to pay off the bonds at any premium. Of these two evils we must choose the lesser. Once a tax is imposed on incomes to pay pensions we will have a body of men out of which this money will be exacted, who will hold in check the so-called liberality of the political patriots in both Houses who think they are making capital with the soldier by the vast sums they make the tax-payers contribute for their own advancement. I propose to let them be met by demands for reasonable taxation by the men out of whose pockets the money will have to come when the income tax is imposed. The principle is right. The organized wealth of the country, the capital of the country, ought to pay the pensions that are so lavishly squandered under the pretense that the services were rendered to protect that wealth, which is now in great part exempt from taxation.

The more the proposition for an income tax is examined the more favor the proposition will meet at both ends of the Capitol. I hope when the great arrears bill comes that I can show good reasons why the money should be provided by an income tax sufficient to meet all these extraordinary expenditures, and to pay it out of the accumulated wealth of the men whose property was saved, if not created, and is protected by what is assumed to be the patriotism of the men who, together with their widows and children and relatives and everybody else connected with them, are to be supported hereafter by the people at large, whether they need it or not.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the tariff question on this bill, nor do I intend to discuss the question whether there shall be an income tax. When such a measure comes here it will be time enough to discuss it.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to what was the legislation when these liabilities on the part of the Government were incurred towards the soldier. In 1862, on the 14th of July, we enacted a law in these words:

> That if any officer or other person named in the first section of this act has died since the 4th day of March, 1861, or shall hereafter die, by reason of any wound received or disease contracted while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty, his widow, or, if there be no widow, his child or children under sixteen years of age, shall be entitled to receive the same pension as the husband or father would have been entitled to had he been totally disabled, to commence from the death of the husband or father, and to continue to the widow during her widowhood, or to the child or children until they severally attain to the age of sixteen years, and no longer.

That was a reiteration of the earliest act that ever passed, and was renacted in 1836 and in 1848. I do not mistake when I say that ever since we have had a pension law, that was the law up to 1879. At that time when the arrears-of-pension bill was pending here the rule was changed. I do not suppose that anybody at that time intended to change it in reference to widows. I doubt very much whether Congress intended to say that when a man entitled to a pension died and his widow succeeded him, there should be an interregnum of such time as she might be waiting to overcome her grief or to find out what her rights were before making her application. At the most it would be but a very brief period; and it can not be possible that anybody connected with national legislation was looking for a little saving of that kind.

Such was the policy of the Government; such was the law of the Government. It entered into the contract when a man went to the war that if he got hurt he should have a pension, and if he died from the effect of his injury his wife should have a pension, and that pension should commence at the date of his death; in other words, the pension should continue right along from the time the soldier got it till his widow died, if he died from the effects of service in the Army.

It does not seem to me that it is wise to attempt to make a little saving of the amount we should have to pay out in this interregnum between 1880 and 1888, which would be the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. I agree with him that there would be a manifest impropriety in allowing service-pension widows to come in, and that that would swell the amount so that it would be utterly impossible to make a calculation; but we know now exactly what we have to vote for when we adopt the committee's amendment. Shall we give to these widows $717,048, or shall we adopt a rule that all admit is invidious, unfair, and unjust to them for the purpose of saving that amount?

Mr. COCKRELL. Just one word, Mr. President. Having been engaged for twenty years in a fierce conflict with the Republican party in its political contests, I must now do justice to that party and vindicate it from the reflection cast upon it by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR]. In long past contests we learned to respect and honor each other, and now I can not let this reflection upon the Republican party that it has not done justice to the soldier go unrebuked.

The Republican party had unlimited control of the legislative branch of this Government from the 1st of January, 1866, until the 4th day of March, 1875, and during the administration of President Johnson they had a two-thirds majority in the Senate and House, and could pass any legislation they chose over the President's veto; and from the 4th of March, 1869, up to the 4th day of March, 1875, eight years, the Republican party was in the zenith of its power and glory, and it controlled the legislative and executive branches of the Government, and it had full power and authority to do equal and exact justice to the soldiers of our country, and I repudiate the idea that that great party refused to do justice and equity and fair dealing to the soldiers, their widows, and their orphans.

Mr. PADDOCK. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Republican party at that time received no applications from ex-soldiers for pensions. The ex-soldiers were living upon the memory of their glorious achievements, their patriotic services, and they sought no pensions. The widows and the orphans of the fallen were provided for by relatives and friends at home, as were the indigent wounded when they returned; but when the time of their need came the Republican party provided for them as best it could.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then you only do justice and equity and fair dealing when you are compelled to do so by the solicitations of the interested parties. I must reject that insinuation.

Mr. PADDOCK. We did it just as rapidly as our Democratic friends allowed us to do so.

Mr. COCKRELL. "Democratic friends allow you," when you had unlimited control and all power and authority from 1866 to 1875, and talk about the Democratic party permitting you to do it! Why did you not do it then? Why talk about the long hours and the weary years which the Republican party has passed struggling to do the soldier justice, and now there has been a light in another branch of the Government where there is a disposition to do them justice! I am astonished that my Republican friends will sit in their seats and hear the Senator from New Hampshire cast such aspersions and reflections upon their "grand old party."

I say, Mr. President, that it is not a political question that we are discussing here. I say the members of all parties in the United States will do justice and equity and liberality and magnanimity to the soldiers of our country and their widows and orphans. I say that by legislation enacted during the existence of Republican administrations and Democratic administrations, with a Republican Senate and a Republican House, with a Democratic Senate and a Democratic House, we have redeemed every pledge that we made to those gallant defenders of the integrity of the Union. There the law stands. We have done justice; we have done equity; we have done fairly. We have not only done that, but we have dealt liberally; we have dealt generously; we have dealt magnanimously.

Mr. President, I moved the pending amendment simply as a matter which I believed was just, was non-political, was calm and right. Since the expiration of the limitation on arrears we have passed the act that gives widows $12 per month instead of $8. We have increased their pensions by the act of March 19, 1886, 50 per cent. We have added to the pension $4 per month, when before it was only $8 per month; and I say that we have done all that equity and fair dealing, and justice and liberality, and magnanimity and generosity call for at our hands.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I have cast no aspersions on "the grand old party," as the Senator from Missouri seems to think. I am exceedingly glad at what he now has to say in the direction of the vindication of his party from the charge of any illiberality or hesitation in the past in doing what I call justice, generosity, and liberality to the soldiers of the Union in the war of the rebellion; but I think that if he will examine the records of the last ten or twelve years, since the Democratic party came again to have influence in the Government of the United States, after having absented itself as a body substantially from the affairs of the Government during the earlier part of the last quarter of a century, he will find that every advance in the direction of increased pensions in amount and in the classes included on the pension-roll that has been made has been made against the opposition of the Democratic party, and in recent years every bill that has liberalized or added anything to the pension-roll in money or in the classes which are to be benefited by the contributions of the Government to those who have preserved it has originated in the Republican branch of Congress—in every instance of any consequence at any rate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does not the Senator remember the arrears act?

Mr. BLAIR. I remember it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Where did it originate?

Mr. BLAIR. It originated with a Republican, and was pressed——

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no; a Democratic House passed the arrears-of-pension bill.

Mr. BLAIR. Yes; but it was not a Democratic measure. It was long pressed by Republicans in the Republican Senate, and passed under the pressure of political exigencies by a Democratic House. The Senator may make claim that the Democratic party is entitled to the credit or discredit of what is known as the arrears-of-pensions act. The Presiding Officer of the Senate can give his information in regard to that.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator, did not that act first pass the House of Representatives?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not undertake to say that it did not first pass the House.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is all.

Mr. BLAIR. But does the Senator know nothing except the mere surface of the outside of legislation? Does he not know the origin of the measure, how it was pressed persistently day after day, session after session, Congress after Congress, by Republican members of both branches of Congress, and finally was extorted from the Democratic party under the dread of political defeat, just exactly as it might be premised that some of its existing liberality so lately developed is attributable to the same class of motive?

Mr. President, I have but to refer to recent legislation to convict the Senator from Missouri, not of any intentional misrepresentation, but of a lapse of memory, which is very unusual with him. He will recollect that at the last Congress we sent to the House of Representatives a measure originating in the Senate designed to give relief to those who are in actual necessity, and many of them in the almshouses of the country, after having preserved their country's capacity to construct even almshouses by their sacrifices on the field of battle and in the vicissitudes of war. We sent that bill to a Democratic House of Representatives, and this same committee, or this same chairman of the committee of a Democratic House of Representatives, pared it down, exfoliated it, eliminated from it all its features of decent liberality even, and that bill went to the President of the United States, after having been concurred in by the Senate as the best that could be done under the circumstances, and it met the veto of a Democratic President.

During the present session of Congress we have passed another measure and sent it to the Democratic House, a measure somewhat less liberal than our legislation in the two last Congresses, and that so far has had no consideration. It has come to the surface, it seems, with an amendment designed for its extermination. So it has been for three Congresses in succession; the Senate of the United States and Republicans in the Senate of the United States (with some Democrats, I admit) have been doing their utmost to make some provision for those who are in the extremity of suffering and want, that extremity of suffering and want resulting from their efforts to preserve this great country—we have, I say, passed a measure of that kind and sent it to the Democratic House, and there it has been consigned to the gulf of oblivion.

The Senator from Missouri knows that, and he knows well that there is not on the pages of the statute-book of this country a single item of pension legislation of any consequence, unless it may be the Mexican war pension legislation lately enacted, that has not originated in the head and in the heart and in the motives of the Republican party. The Senator knows that he will hardly pick out a provision that has been placed on the statute-book but has been extorted and has simply been able to receive the sullen acquiescence of the Democratic party as a party. The Senator knows that, and the country knows it, and the soldiers of the country know it.

Now, Mr. President, I ask the Senator in charge of the bill that he shall modify the terms of this amendment, that he amend it to include the widows of the soldiers of the Mexican war whose husbands died from disability contracted in the service, so that the $700,000, or whatever amount be necessary, may be given to them; that the principle be applied as it ought to be, and thus uniformity and justice secured in our enactment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Missouri to amend the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it be read.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I wish to make a few remarks in reference to this amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow the amendment to be reported before he proceeds?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. COCKRELL.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I regret that the partisan feelings of the people of this country are appealed to whenever a pension measure comes before the Senate. It seems to be the purpose, the object, and the intention of some gentlemen who take part in the discussion of these bills always to bring in a partisan question touching the adoption or rejection of any pension bill presented to the Senate for its action. I do not know what is the purpose or object of this, unless it is to make political capital; but it does not occur to me in what action I deem proper on the floor of the Senate that my honest sentiments as to the propriety of passing any particular bill that may be proposed to the body for its action are to be influenced by such considerations. I look upon it, so far as parties are concerned, that both parties by their platforms, by their past political history, are pledged to do justice, full-handed justice, to those who died or were wounded or contracted disease in the defense of the Union; and, so far as I am concerned, both as a Senator on this floor and as a member of the Pensions Committee, I propose to meet that responsibility and carry out that pledge fully and completely.

But I have only risen now for the purpose of correcting what I conceive to be an erroneous remark made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK], who is a member of the Pensions Committee, and who, in speaking of the dependent-pension bill reported by that committee, alluded to the fact that it was not as liberal as the committee deemed proper for certain reasons which he indicated.

The remarks of the Senator may be correct and just as to the action of the committee with regard to the second section of the bill, but I do not concur with him that that is a correct representation of the opinion or action of the committee as to the third section of that bill, which embodies the very principle that is embodied in the amendment of the Senate Committee on Appropriations to the bill making appropriations for the payment of pensions for the succeeding fiscal year. That action of the Committee on Pensions, if I understood aright, was the deliberate, considerate judgment of that committee; and so far as an amendment was put on that bill fixing the commencement of the pension at the date of the death of the soldier instead of at the date of the application filed, it was made under the recommendation, as stated by the chairman of the committee, of the Commissioner of Pensions, and it was prospective in its character and not retroactive, as is the present amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PADDOCK. The Senator will allow me to say that I did not intend, in what I said about the sentiment of the committee as to a stronger measure than that presented, to convey the impression that he—the Senator from West Virginia—entertained that desire. I meant only to refer to the fact that every Republican member of the Committee on Pensions on the floor of the Senate when that bill was under consideration made expressions as to his desire to have done more, but did only what could be done under the circumstances, and they being a majority of the committee reflected the views of the committee as such. I did not mean to speak for or of my friend from West Virginia, nor of the sentiments expressed by any member of the committee when the bill was being considered in the committee-room, but as to the real wishes of the majority as expressed here. I do not in this intend the slightest reflection on the Senator; on the contrary I wish to bear testimony to his perfect fairness, his uniform kindness, liberality, and generosity as a member of that committee in respect to all questions and cases of general as well as special character that have come before it.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska seems to have misunderstood the extent and scope of my remarks. I do not question the fact that the general scope of that bill affecting dependent pensions was not as liberal as a majority of that committee desired; but I do mean to say that this clause of that bill in the third section was the deliberate judgment of the committee, so far as I know without a dissenting vote:

> All pensions granted to widows under this or any other general law shall take effect from the date of the death of the husbands of such widows, respectively, but not dating back of the passage of this act.

That clause in the third section of the dependent pension bill, as it is known, as I understood, was the deliberate judgment of the committee. There was a reason outside of the merits of the case why the committee desired to make that limitation. The committee in reporting the bill was looking to taking care of a certain class of persons who had served in the Army and had dependent relatives, meeting an immediate want in order to pass some bill here; but when they found that they had other bills before that committee involving the whole subject of arrears, it was not the purpose of the Committee on Pensions to separate each one of this class and put them in separate bills, but to consider the entire question of arrearages as a whole, and either pass or reject the proposition to remove the bar of the limitation, not only as to widows, but also as to the soldiers themselves. Those matters are now pending before the Pension Committee, and yet before action by the Pensions Committee, before under the rules of the Senate the committee which has jurisdiction of the subject has acted on a question coming expressly within its jurisdiction, we find that another committee, the Appropriations Committee, by reason of some legislation put upon this appropriation bill by the House of Representatives, in violation of its own rules, and, as I conceive, in violation of the rules of the Senate, has taken up this subject (which is peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the Pensions Committee, who have bills now before them involving identically this question) and brought in an amendment, passing upon it without any action of the Pensions Committee.

It strikes me, Mr. President, that that is a mistake on the part of the Appropriations Committee, and it is a mistake on the part of the Senate to consider it and to take action upon it based upon the action of the Appropriations Committee. This subject ought to be remanded where it belongs, to the Pensions Committee, and if the provision is to be brought in it should apply not only to the widows, but certainly the soldiers have the same right to the removal of the bar of the statute of limitations.

It can not be said by any member on this floor, and especially by any upon the other side, who have a majority upon the Committee on Pensions, that he has not confidence sufficient in that committee to trust this matter to their consideration and to their action. That being the case, I claim that this question should not be considered by the Senate on this bill, but the whole amendment should be voted down and the clause of the House bill stricken out, and then let the Pensions Committee consider a widows' bill that shall cover the entire subject, and not be bringing in an amendment only for one particular class. That is the objection which I have to the amendment of the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

I do not commit myself on the question of arrearages of pensions. I have not satisfied my own mind that it is a wise policy in the Government now to remove the bar of the statute which is applied to arrearages of pensions, either as to the soldiers or their widows. Until that bar is removed as to the soldiers, I do not think the widows' claim should be considered, for I do not think the widow of a soldier stands upon a higher or loftier plane than does the man who bared his breast to the storm of bullets and in that way saved the Union.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] in the discussion of this question was mistaken in another respect, and so was the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. They say this involves $717,000 to be expended if this bill passes in addition to the other sum that was mentioned. That is not the end of this question. That amount is very small, inconsiderable compared to what will grow out of the passage of this bill in this form. That would only be the amount to which the widows would be entitled who have received pensions since 1889 up to the present time. But, Senators, if you pass this bill with this clause in it, you will find the same result that followed the passage of the arrearage-of-pension bill, that the annual increase of applications for pensions after the passage of the bill will double and treble. That was the case in regard to the arrearage-of-pensions bill. After its adoption by Congress the applications more than doubled yearly, and so will it be in this case. There are applications now pending in the Pension Bureau for widows' pensions where the husband died fifteen years ago, and there will be a great number of that class induced by the large sum that will come in in the aggregate by this bill who will file applications who otherwise would not have paid any attention to the monthly stipend that is given by the ordinary pension law.

But that is not the question. I say frankly and without any hesitation, that where the obligation is just, where the provision is right in itself, the amount to be expended, unless it should go far beyond the bounds of reason and the resources of this Government to meet it, should not weigh with me in the consideration of the question; but now we are asked to remove the bar of the statute which has resulted from the fact that parties did not avail themselves of their legal rights, and are therefore simply appealing to the equity of Congress to come in and remove the entire bar so that they can do what they neglected to do when they had the power. I understand that in almost all the cases when the bar applied the parties filed their applications within a short period, and have been drawing pensions since, the amount not being very large to any individual one. But this is simply a question of asking for the removal of that bar for the widows, and I say before we take that up we ought to take up the question of whether we shall remove the bar from the soldier himself, and until that is decided we ought not on an appropriation bill to pass this legislation and change the law as it exists to-day in regard to widows.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, of course we all know the power of the Committee on Appropriations, and we sometimes think we realize the extent of that power in a manner inimical to the interests of other committees; but in our struggles before the Senate we find the Committee on Appropriations generally right if success is the true criterion of what is right and wrong in human affairs. But however that may sometimes be, however poor we may sometimes think the legislation proposed by that committee, nevertheless we have often witnessed the fact on this floor that it is impossible to obtain much of the legislation most essential in this country except through the exercise of the functions of that committee; and when the Committee on Appropriations, either in the House or the Senate, takes up the condition of the soldiers of the country or the widows of the soldiers and their dependent parents, and by reason of a great power in the control of the revenue legislation of the country, or rather the great power which is behind that committee in the necessity that such legislation does bring it to the front when all other committees and all other agencies have failed to put that form of legislation to the front, and by reason of the universal necessity of the country that its bills do secure consideration for legislation of this character, I think the committee in both branches of Congress entitled to the thanks and not to the censure of the House and Senate. So here in this case the Committee on Appropriations has given us the opportunity, probably the only opportunity on this or any other appropriation bill, of doing anything whatever that is practically anything which goes beyond mere talk for the benefit of the soldiers and of their dependents during the present Congress, or, at all events, during the present session.

So I am not inclined to complain of an alleged usurpation which is for the public good or a grasping of jurisdiction by the Committee on Appropriations. I hope that the committee will take advantage of its opportunities and its other opportunities, if it has them during the session, to give us further and more liberal legislation or stop the wheels of government until we can get consideration for these claims.

I want to say just one word further. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], when he first rose, I thought, spoke in a way that suggested a feeling that some one had remotely censured his own conduct as a member of the Committee on Pensions. I do not know that he meant that, but I desire to say that in anything I may have observed I had no reference to that Senator. I believe that the soldiers of this country get no fairer, no more just, liberal, and careful consideration of their claims from any Senator of any party than from the Senator from West Virginia. It is unnecessary to say that, unless I was misapprehended in what I said first.

But now in regard to the matter of the arrears of pension on which much is said on the floor of the Senate and which is dealt with as though it were a proposition either of a moon-struck fool or a demagogue, I desire to say that that proposition, as I think, is one based simply upon the most naked form of justice. There is no reply to the argument based upon simple, naked justice in favor of the demand of these petitioners for the removal of the limitation. What is it? It is a proposition, after the lapse of twenty-five years, to pay to those men who during those twenty-five years have suffered under pensionable disabilities contracted in the service of their country, men who would have been entitled to pensions had they applied for them twenty-five years ago, who would have been drawing those pensions continuously since and whose payment would have taxed the Treasury of the United States not alone the amount of the original sum paid but, in the interest that would have accrued upon those payments made from time to time four times yearly down to the present, which would in the interest have amounted to vastly more than the first cost.

These men have withheld their applications, some of them from ignorance of their rights, and some of them from other motives; some of them largely from the same patriotic motives which impelled them to enlist in the service of the country originally, from motives of the highest patriotism, and from a sense of independence and a desire that the rendering of their service should be based and allowed to stand simply on the basis of a pure patriotism. They wished to sustain themselves as long as they were able to do so; but after the lapse of many years, dependence coming upon them, failure of health, failure of fortune, and the approaching night of old age, they are induced to prefer their claims under the law after all these years of suspension and of waiver, which have inured wholly to the advantage and not to the disadvantage of the country; which have given to the country, as I said before, in the form of withheld interest, vastly more than the original principal itself. These men under these circumstances, at this late day, after in three instances we have done the same thing, ask for the removal of the limitation so far as they are concerned. Now I say the equities are all on their side. They ask and they have a fair right to a service pension after the lapse of all these years.

If, after this lapse of time, notwithstanding the failure of memory and all those influences which go to make litigation doubtful and expensive and uncertain, they are able to establish their claim and to get a verdict from the Government itself against itself and to get their names placed on the pension-roll, then arises this secondary question, when ought that pension to commence? Ought it not to commence from the date of the disability in such a case as this? What reply can be made to this proposition? What reply ever has been made or attempted to be made on the part of anybody, except to say that it involves considerable money? If the claim had been preferred when it might have been, and when one would think from the nature of the response now made it ought to have been, the draft on the Treasury would have been perhaps treble what it now is. So the Government is in no situation whatever to bring forward this as a defense. The Government is careful to say and to claim that no limitation ever runs against the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and as the Chair understands the parliamentary state of the business the unfinished business is the bill (H. R. 8560) to establish a department of labor.

Mr. HARRIS. Under the agreement reached by unanimous consent yesterday that bill is postponed, remaining the unfinished business until after yesterday, and the two successive legislative days have been devoted to the consideration of the Calendar, when the Chair announced that that bill should be laid before the Senate as the unfinished business having the right of way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands, and will state that the unfinished business will be laid aside for the consideration of the appropriation bill that now has the right of way, and at the conclusion of the appropriation bill the Calendar will be in order under Rule VIII, the Calendar displacing unfinished business.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope we shall come to a vote on this bill as early as possible, so that we may proceed with the Calendar.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether there is any necessity for pressing this bill now. I was absent from the committee during its consideration. Of course, that was my own fault; but the question of new legislation discussed by the Senator from West Virginia is an important one. I want to look into it, and perhaps the committee may want to look further into it. I am not quite sure of the policy here proposed. I should like very much to have the bill go over until Monday morning.

Mr. HARRIS. Say Tuesday. Monday is to be devoted to the Calendar.

Mr. BECK. If there is any embarrassment to arise from it, I do not wish to press the request I have made.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course it is no embarrassment to me. The Senator knows the condition of the appropriation bills. The whole question of legislation has been very fully considered by the committee and has been debated in the Senate. In addition to that, it was claimed in the House—I think I may state that from reading the RECORD—that this provision was merely a declaration of the existing law, rather in analogy to that provision we had in another bill about the Public Printing Office, and the then chairman of the Committee of the Whole in the House of Representatives decided that this provision did not change existing law. But when the Senate Committee on Appropriations came to look into it, it appeared very clear to us that if the provision passed as it passed the House it would change existing law so as to draw in service pensions and the widows of service pensioners. If it is convenient to the Senator from Kentucky to have this bill go over until Monday, and if that will interfere with nothing else, I do not know how to object; but my impression is that Monday has been set apart for another matter.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that the agreement reached by unanimous consent yesterday devotes both to-day and Monday to the consideration of the Calendar, and I prefer that he should designate Tuesday.

Mr. ALLISON. What will become of another matter, I ask the Senator, fixed for Monday, which perhaps would require us to go into executive session at an early hour on that day? I shall be constrained to move to reconsider the vote by which we agreed to adjourn over to Monday unless I can have a thorough understanding that this bill shall be taken up Monday to the exclusion of everything else.

Mr. HARRIS. I prefer that the Senator should move to reconsider, for I can not consent to vacate the agreement made yesterday by unanimous consent.

Mr. BECK. I do not care to press any suggestion of mine, if it embarrasses going on with the bill now; but I was very much impressed with the importance of the measure as suggested by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the Senator from West Virginia is unjust to the Committee on Appropriations, in the sense that he suggested that we have undertaken to interfere with the proper business of any other committee of this body. We found this provision on the bill, and we found that it went further and much further than the House seemed to believe when it passed upon it, and therefore we concluded to amend it in such a way as to confine it to what we fairly thought it should be, both as to the past and to the future, meaning thereby simply to exclude the idea of service pensions and long arrearages, and only giving arrears in the cases where it was manifest that the law, certainly since 1880, intended that the pension should date from the death of the husband.

Now, I think this bill can be voted on to-day; but if the Senator from Kentucky desires a postponement especially I will consent to the bill going over to Monday.

Mr. BECK. No; I shall not press my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. I have but a few more words to say. I was only calling attention to the somewhat cavalier manner in which the claims for the removal of the limitation on the arrears-of-pensions act had been treated. I am hardly out of the way in saying, particularly to our friends on the Democratic side of the Chamber, that they seem to think that with the changes going on any one who favors the arrears-of-pension bill, as it is called, necessarily intends to enter upon an unjustifiable raid on the Treasury. With a view to that I was making the suggestions which seemed to me pertinent to the fact that those claims are more just than any other in the direction of pensions that are preferred against the Government.

It would be more just for us to strike from the pension-roll every name which is now upon it of a disabled soldier who has preferred his claim and been drawing pension these past years, and who has to that extent been benefited by the Government—I say it would be more nearly an act of justice to strike every name now on the roll from the roll than to withhold arrears from this class of men when under the difficulties to which I have alluded they now finally do establish their claim. And upon that proposition I am willing to stand, and I should be glad to hear any one controvert that proposition.

Why is this so? First, the man who at the present time establishes his claim must have had a stronger claim than the most of those already on the roll, because he secures in the end a verdict, as I said before, oftentimes from an unwilling tribunal, always from a tribunal interested for the Government rather than for the soldier, against the Government, and after all these years and under all these difficulties and circumstances the order is made by the Government to write that man's name on the pension-roll; that is to say, his claim for a pension is as just as that of the very first applicant—the man who has been drawing a pension for a quarter of a century. That man during all this period of time was kept out of his just dues and the Government in its extremity has had the use of his money. The Government had the money when the Government was paying 6 per cent. and 5 per cent. and 4 per cent. The Government had the money in the distresses and exigencies of the war when it was difficult to maintain the public credit under any circumstances. These men went without their pensions; they waived their claim; their money was in the Treasury and it was used in prosecuting the war and in maintaining the existence of the Government for the time being, and it was applied upon the public debt. They gave a part of the reward of the bondholders of whom we hear so much. It went to improve the rivers and harbors of the country; it paid the salaries of Government officials; it sustained our foreign relations; it was the money of these soldiers, these men with just claims against the Government, waived for the time being and loaned to the Government, in the highest conceivable moral sense, that enabled the Government to go on.

Now they come before us at this late period, late in life, approaching death, and they ask us (with the admission of the Government that they should all the time have had their pensions) for the removal of this limitation, and they only ask what Congress in three instances has already done, that is to say, that they shall have the principal of their claims from the beginning, waiving all the matter of interest which would have been theirs by virtue of their having been entitled to the money long ago.

Mr. President, I say that as a matter of justice and of equity between man and man, between the Government and these men, between the Government and the men who have been drawing pensions all this time, it is clearer justice and equity to strike from the pension-roll every name now upon it than it is to deny arrears to those who are pensioned at this late day, being adjudged entitled to what belonged to them all the time. Of course, to strike from the roll the names now upon it would be a crime; nobody has suggested it in the highest flight of imagination of bad men even. No one could think of such a thought as that, and I suggest it only by way of illustration, and I appeal to the Senator from Missouri and to any Senator in this Chamber and anybody in this country if the point which I have stated is not incontestably true, that it is nearer to justice to purge the roll as it stands than to deny arrears to those who from henceforward establish their claims, if it is not nearer justice to do the former than to refuse to do the latter.

It will cost something, it is true; perhaps several millions of dollars, perhaps one-fortieth part of the existing public debt drawing interest; not more than that. We have a surplus fund that will pay a very large portion of it already. We have the means of raising whatever is necessary further. If the tariff legislation proposed in the other end of the Capitol should be enacted into law it is not at all sure that the revenue will be reduced. It is, on the other hand, quite probable that the revenues of the Government will be increased with the incoming tide of foreign commodites which will pay duties, and, although at a lower rate, nevertheless increasing amounts, by reason of increased importations, will pile into the Treasury more money than we are getting today. That will continue until such time as the demoralization of American business shall have destroyed the power of the American consuming public to purchase foreign commodities, and you will get no reduction of the revenues until it comes as a natural consequence of the ruin of the business of the people at home, the destruction of their purchasing power. So we are likely to continue the possession of our present revenue, or for the time being of increased revenue, and I ask you, Mr. President, if that be so, whether we may not safely and justly act in the direction of the removal of this limitation? I think so, and I hope if this matter is to be continued, if it is to go over to receive further consideration from the Committee on Appropriations, that they will take advantage of these little opportunities which come to us as a godsend from the House, and instead of restricting its provisions enlarge them and attach to this bill a recommendation of an amendment removing the limitation on arrears and also providing pensions for the needy soldiers of the war of the rebellion without reference to the origin or the nature of their disability.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] to amend the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TELLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PAYNE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES].

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BROWN. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. I voted under a misapprehension. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BUTLER. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. COKE] is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. My colleague is absent, attending the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] announced a pair with the colleague of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. ALDRICH. My colleague [Mr. CHACE] is absent, paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT].

Mr. TELLER. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], but I understand my colleague [Mr. BOWEN] is not paired, and I therefore transfer the pair to my colleague and I shall vote.

Mr. EVARTS. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and therefore can not vote.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am requested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE] to announce their pair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The occupant of the chair announces that he is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If the Senator from Kentucky were present the occupant of the chair would vote "nay."

Mr. BECK. I am paired generally with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is absent from the Senate Chamber at the moment. I have sent for him. I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] and let my vote stand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have heard it stated that somebody is paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] announced the pair of his colleague [Mr. COKE] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] announced the same pair, and thereafter it leaves the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] without a pair, and being paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] I was requested by his colleague to make the announcement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to state—perhaps it is now unnecessary—that my colleague [Mr. MORRILL] is absent from the Chamber on account of ill-health and is paired with some gentleman; I do not know who it is at this moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] to the fact that the Chair understood the Senator from Ohio to announce a pair with the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

Mr. PAYNE. No, sir; with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES].

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bate,	Faulkner,	Pugh,	Vest,
Beck,	George,	Ransom,	Walthall.
Berry,	Hampton,	Reagan,

Colquitt,	Hearst,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Daniel,	Hiscock,	Paddock,	Wilson of Iowa,
Davis,	Hoar,	Payne,	Wilson of Md.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a quorum voting. The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Manderson,	Saulsbury,
Allison,	Dolph,	Mitchell,	Sawyer,
Bate,	Edmunds,	Morgan,	Sherman,
Beck,	Evarts,	Paddock,	Spooner,
Berry,	Faulkner,	Pasco,	Stewart,

Chandler,	Hawley,	Ransom,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Reagan,	Walthall,
Cullom,	Jones of Arkansas,	Sabin,	Wilson of Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators having responded to their names, a quorum is present. The Secretary will call the roll for the yea-and-nay vote on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HISCOCK]. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. By an agreement we have arranged to transfer the pair of Mr. HISCOCK and Mr. BLACKBURN, so that the Senator from Nebraska and I can vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). On account of the transfer of the pair I vote "nay."

Mr. PADDOCK (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. EUSTIS].

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. SABIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], but I have transferred that pair to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], and vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], but have transferred the pair to my colleague [Mr. BOWEN]. Therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. TURPIE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. Upon a former occasion a few minutes ago, forgetting it, I voted on the yea-and-nay vote when there was no quorum. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] was paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] a few minutes ago; but the Senator from Maine is now present, and I will transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont to the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] and let my vote stand.

Mr. REAGAN. My colleague [Mr. COKE] is absent on business of the Committee on Commerce, and paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. If here, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—20.

Bate,	Cockrell,	Jones of Arkansas,	Reagan,
Beck,	Faulkner,	Morgan,	Saulsbury,
Berry,	George,	Pasco,	Vance,
Brown,	Hampton,	Pugh,	Vest,
Call,	Harris,	Ransom,	Walthall.

NAYS—23.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Hoar,	Sherman,
Allison,	Edmunds,	Ingalls,	Spooner,
Blair,	Evarts,	Manderson,	Stewart,
Blodgett,	Frye,	Mitchell,	Stockbridge,
Chandler,	Hale,	Sabin,	Teller.
Cullom,	Hawley,	Sawyer,

ABSENT—33.

Blackburn,	Cameron,	Colquitt,	Dawes,
Bowen,	Chace,	Daniel,	Eustis,
Butler,	Coke,	Davis,	Farwell,
Gibson,	Kenna,	Payne,	Stanford,
Gorman,	McPherson,	Platt,	Turpie,
Gray,	Morrill,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Hearst,	Paddock,	Quay,	Wilson of Iowa,
Hiscock,	Palmer,	Riddleberger,	Wilson of Md.
Jones of Nevada,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations to strike out and insert.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, was in line 54, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "eighteen;" so as to make the clause read:

For stationery and other necessary expenses, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, $18,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 57, after the word "Treasury," to insert "where practicable;" so as to read:

For rents, $18,200. And the Secretary of the Treasury, where practicable, shall cause suitable rooms to be set apart in the public buildings under his control in cities where pension agencies are located, which shall be acceptable to the Secretary of the Interior, for the use and occupancy of said agencies, respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 61, after the word "respectively," to strike out the following clause:

And the Secretary of the Interior shall designate and provide suitable rooms in the Pension building for the use and occupation of the pension agent at Washington, D. C., and the office of said agent shall be removed therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be concurred in in gross, unless there be objection. Shall the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole be concurred in in the Senate?

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 1645) to limit the hours that letter-carriers in cities shall be employed per day;

A bill (H. R. 2928) granting a pension to William Lemons;

A bill (S. 1795) for the relief of the First National Bank of Marion, Iowa; and

A bill (S. 2419) granting a pension to Lemuel R. Rea.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. EVARTS, Mr. PADDOCK, and Mr. MITCHELL submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the river and harbor appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SWORD OF WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order of the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII will now be proceeded with; and the Secretary will report the first order of business under Rule VIII.

The bill (S. 2564) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to purchase from Miss Virginia Tayloe Lewis a sword of Washington was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over under objection, without prejudice.

FLORIDA LAND TITLES.

The resolution submitted by Mr. CALL March 31, 1888, authorizing a special committee of five Senators to investigate in Florida the question of fraudulent land patents, etc., was announced as the next business in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The resolution submitted by Mr. SHERMAN April 3, 1888, relating to the order of business, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. That may be indefinitely postponed. The occasion has passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection.

DISPOSAL OF THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The bill (S. 2511) to withdraw the public lands of the United States in Mississippi from sale at ordinary private entry and to restrict disposals thereof under general statutes to homestead settlers was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have passed a bill providing for that subject already, I am advised.

Mr. WALTHALL. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In another shape, but covering the same ground?

Mr. WALTHALL. We passed a joint resolution for the temporary disposal of public lands in Mississippi and other States. This is for the purpose of continuing that legislation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can not hear.

Mr. WALTHALL. I will state for the information of the Senator from Vermont that this bill has not been acted on, but a joint resolution has been passed temporarily withdrawing these lands from sale until the pending legislation on the subject can be disposed of. This is the pending legislation. There is also a bill looking to the same end pending in the other House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was that joint resolution passed at this session of Congress?

Mr. WALTHALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the Senator a copy of it at his desk?

Mr. WALTHALL. I have not, but I think I can state the substance of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the bill read, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, which was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments, in line 4, after the words "United States," to strike out the words "in the State of Mississippi shall cease to be subject to disposal by sale at ordinary private entry, and" and insert "now subject to private entry;" in line 6, after the words "disposed of," to strike out "under general statutes in no other manner than" and insert "under and"; and, in line 8, after the word "laws," to insert the word "only;" so as to make the bill read:

That from and after the passage of this act the public lands of the United States now subject to private entry shall be disposed of under and according to the provisions of the homestead laws only.

Mr. STEWART. Is that a general bill now? What is the extent of it?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will explain it in a moment.

Mr. STEWART. Explain its extent.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill as first introduced restricted its operations to the State of Mississippi. It has been proposed to be amended as reported by the Committee on Public Lands so as to make it a general law applicable to all the States and Territories of the United States. I rose for the purpose of offering an amendment. After the words "that from and after the passage of this act the public lands of the United States," I move to insert "except those situate in the State of Missouri."

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I do not think that the Committee on Public Lands are familiar with the subject about which they are proposing to legislate if they have reported such a bill. If it is to be applicable to all the public lands in the United States, it is a prohibition against the use of four-fifths of the public lands under any circumstances. If nothing but the homestead law is to be enforced; if under that law alone titles to public lands are to be acquired, you exclude from settlers the great mass of the public lands of the United States. Four-fifths at least, and perhaps a larger portion, of the public lands require irrigation before they can be settled on. The homestead settlers can not go upon them at all; they can not remain upon them until the preliminary work is done. The result will be that you will stop settlement throughout a vast region of country where settlement can go, and it can go nowhere else.

By this proposed act you would do another thing; you would exclude the miners and the people living in the mountainous region from obtaining any timber or fuel for any purpose—the timber and fuel in the mountains throughout the entire Western country, in the Rocky Mountains, the Sierra Nevada Mountains, the Wahsatch Mountains, and other vast ranges of mountains. The timber is up in those mountains. You can not acquire title to that land by homestead, because it can not be settled on. There is very little timber land in the United States left that is susceptible of habitation at all. It is in the rough, high mountains, where you can not take the land under the homestead law.

Is Congress going to pass a law providing that the timber of the country can not be used under any circumstances, and a law that is entirely inapplicable to all the remaining public lands? It might do in Mississippi. I have no objection to it as a local bill, but when you talk about passing a general bill of this kind, it shows that there has been no investigation whatever of the subject; that there has been no intelligent consideration of this great subject, which demands attention.

We have an empire of land requiring irrigation, and some system ought to be devised whereby it can be occupied by settlers, and by settlers alone. It is a great subject. A resolution has been passed calling upon the Interior Department to make an investigation and report what can be done to promote irrigation, to set aside reservoirs, and what can be done with the waters to fertilize that vast region and make it habitable. But is it proposed that Congress shall stop there and exclude everybody from going upon the land, and that it will not undertake to meet the question?

In the valley lands of the whole country, like the Mississippi Valley, we know now that the homestead law was the only law applicable. All such land ought to have been disposed of under the homestead law. The pre-emption law has been practically a fraud. It was better than what preceded it. What preceded it from the foundation of the Government to 1841 was the surveying of lands in large quantities and offering them at auction, and the middlemen fattened on the purchase of them by again selling them at a vast advance. From 1841 to the present time we have had the pre-emption law in operation. The pre-emption law was better than what preceded it to 1862. In 1862 we passed the homestead law, which was the best law ever passed. The pre-emption law would have been nearly as good as the homestead law (except that it was an unnecessary tax upon the settler to charge him a dollar and a quarter an acre) if it had not been for carrying along with it a part of the old system which provided that after the land had been surveyed for a certain length of time it should be offered at auction and sold at private entry, thus allowing people to buy in advance of settlement.

Under the pre-emption law there were about 90,000,000 acres taken by private entry in advance of settlement. The pre-emption law since 1862 has been an obstruction——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada has spoken five minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will be allowed to go on.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think this is too important a bill, involving the whole land policy of the country, to be passed under the five-minute rule, and I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not desire to interpose if the Senator from Nevada wishes to speak further; but I shall object to the further consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. STEWART subsequently said: On examining the land bill I find that it only applies to lands that have been offered and are subject to private entry, being none of those in the region of which I spoke. My speech had no application to the terms of the bill, and I withdraw it so far as the bill is concerned, but I want to make it more emphatic as far as the subject-matter is concerned. I understand the Senator from Ohio will withdraw his objection and the bill may be passed. I think there is no objection to it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand the Senator from Nevada to say that the bill only applies to offered land?

Mr. STEWART. Subject to private entry.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think so.

Mr. STEWART. Read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has passed from the consideration of the Senate, and is no longer before the body except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said I would withdraw my objection, which I made because the Senator from Nevada objected so strenuously to it, but when he told me that it did not contain the provision which he thought it did I was willing to waive my objection.

Mr. ALLISON. It might be well to pass it over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa objects to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it go over.

Mr. MITCHELL. The bill repeals the pre-emption law and applies to all lands——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over.

B. F. ROCKEFELLOW.

The bill (S. 686) for the relief of B. F. Rockefellow was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay $614.11 to B. F. Rockefellow, on his account as postmaster at Cañon City, Colo., or so much of that amount as shall appear to the proper accounting officer of the Government to have been paid by him for necessary clerk-hire in the Cañon City post-office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. BOWEN April 4, 1888.

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 686) for the relief of B. F. Rockefellow, have had the same under consideration, and make the following report:

That the claimant, B. F. Rockefellow, was postmaster at Cañon City, Colo., during the years 1877 and 1878, and a portion of the year 1879. At the time of his appointment the office was small and unimportant. On February 24, 1877, it was made a separating office, and a sum of $150 was allowed as clerk hire, commencing on the 1st day of January, 1877. The business of the office increased rapidly, and Mr. Rockefellow was compelled to employ additional clerical assistance. The discovery of the wonderful rich mines of silver at Leadville, Silver Cliff, and other points in Colorado, occasioned a great increase of mail at Cañon City post-office, as all the mail that went to Silver Cliff and Rosita, as well as much of the Leadville mail, was separated at the Cañon City office.

The Leadville mail left Cañon City between 11 and 12 o'clock at night; the Rosita and Silver Cliff, towards morning; and the large amount received and discharged for other places made it necessary for the post-office to be kept open most of the time night and day. The salary of the postmaster was $100 per month, with the addition of $150 for clerk hire; out of this the postmaster was compelled to pay his rent and employ his clerks.

For the quarter ending June 30, 1878, the postmaster paid in excess of what he was allowed	$87.50
For quarter ending September 30, 1878	112.50
For quarter ending December 31, 1878	156.83
For the quarter ending March 31, 1879	257.28
Making a total excess of	614.11

These accounts were all transmitted to the Post-Office Department, with proper vouchers, but not allowed for want of available funds, as it was alleged.

The gross receipts of the office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, were	$2,205.90
For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, were	6,698.42
Total during 1878 and 1879	8,874.32

This leaves a net sum of $7,174.32 for the two years. The amount of labor imposed on the postmaster may be seen from the receipts of the office; but in addition to the duties of postmaster for a large and rapidly growing town, he was compelled to distribute large mails for other points, which did not swell the receipts of the office, but did require great labor. The following newspaper items, cut from a Cañon City paper of about the 1st of April, 1879, will in part explain the amount of work performed at that office:

"Sunday morning's mail for Leadville and upper Arkansas points contained nineteen bags and pouches of mail, not less than 1,500 pounds in weight, being 10,000 letters. Our own mail was immense, and Silver Cliff, Rosita, and Ula a full express-wagon load. It was midnight before the mails were distributed and made up for the West. We thought printers did more work for nothing than other mortals, but under the present reign of "economy" we will except postmasters, and shall crow over Postmaster Rockefellow while we have a chance, and, like everybody else, pitch into him for not keeping the office open all hours of the day and night, not giving us a large room with magnificent office furniture and equipments to correspond with the increased importance our town demands. To be sure he is paying every dollar of his $100 per month salary for clerk hire, $40 per month for one assistant and $60 per month to the other, and getting the $12.50 for himself. He and they are continually overworked to get the mails off—which must go—and perform the other duties of the office.

"It should be added to the above that the surplus money over and above the amount paid out on money-orders, remitted weekly from this office, amounts to from $1,500 to $2,000, and there are thirty to sixty-five registered packages daily in transit. When complained to, the Post-Office Department replies that, 'owing to the limited appropriations allowed by Congress, no changes looking to the enlargement of the mail facilities of Cañon City and other places similarly situated can be made.' Congress should make a tour in a body to Colorado this summer and learn something."

In March Mr. Rockefellow, after various efforts to secure an increased allowance for clerk hire, received the following from the Post-Office Department:

"POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
"OFFICE OF THE FIRST ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
"Washington, D. C., March 22, 1879.

"SIR: In reply to your letter of the 14th instant, referred to this office and recommended by Senator TELLER, I have to say that, owing to the limited appropriation for clerical services in post-offices, it is deemed inadvisable at present to grant any additional allowance for clerical assistance in your office. Your application has been placed upon the files of the Department, and will be further considered as soon as funds will warrant it.

"Very respectfully,

"JAMES H. MARR,
"For First Assistant Postmaster-General.

"POSTMASTER, Cañon City, Fremont County, Colorado."

He soon after sent in his resignation, feeling that he could not afford to work night and day and pay his entire salary to his clerks. After the 1st of April, 1879, the Department ordered an additional amount of $750 for clerk hire, making the total amount allowed for clerk hire $900.

During the time Mr. Rockefellow was paying his salary out for clerk hire, he gave his entire time to the business of the office. He applied, through the Senators from Colorado, for an increased allowance for clerk hire; the Senators endeavored to secure such allowance, but were always met with the same statement, that the Department had not the money that could be used in that way. The whole case is presented in the affidavit of Mr. Rockefellow, except as to efforts made by the Senators at Washington for his relief, which affidavit is as follows:

"STATE OF COLORADO, County of Fremont, ss:

"B. F. Rockefellow, postmaster at Cañon City, Colo., for about ten years ending May 15, 1879, being duly sworn, deposeth and says that he paid for clerical services in the Cañon City, Colo., post-office, which was absolutely necessary to properly separate and forward the mails, as follows:

April 1 to June 30, 1878	$125.00
July 1 to September 30, 1878	150.00
October to December 31, 1878	194.33
January 1 to March 31, 1879	284.78
	754.11

and that vouchers for amounts so paid accompanied the several quarterly returns to the Post-Office Department; that the Department only allowed for the year $150, leaving a deficiency as above of $614.11; that Cañon City during that time was center of great influx of population, owing to the Grand Cañon war and railroad building; that it was the terminus of the Denver and Rio Grande Railway for that time, and head of daily stage lines to Leadville and other Western points, as also stage lines to Silver Cliff, Rosita, and several other points; that the separating business of this post-office increased so rapidly that towards the last he was obliged to pay the full salary of the office for clerical service, which fact he represented to the Post-Office Department, and received reply that the allowance could not be raised owing to lack of appropriations necessary to meet the expenditure.

"That he was unable to longer carry on the office at such a loss, being obliged, besides, to work most of the time eighteen to twenty-two hours daily in the post-office to get the mails off in time, and that he was forced to resign in consequence, and that immediately afterwards, and based upon the business done in said post-office by him, the salary of the office was raised from $1,200 to $1,800 per year, and clerk-hire allowance from $150 to $900 per annum; and said deponent, from his intimate acquaintance with mail service in Colorado, verily believes that his office was obliged to perform more distributing service for the period mentioned than any other post-office in the State, except Denver, and that the payment of the deficiency of $614.11 aforementioned is justly due him and unpaid. Further deponent saith not.

"B. F. ROCKEFELLOW,
"Late Postmaster, Cañon City, Colo.

"Sworn and subscribed to before John Wilson, clerk of district court, this 26th day of December, A. D. 1880.

"JNO. WILSON, Clerk."

The postmaster was compelled to pay the rent of the building used for the post-office, as no allowance was made by the Department for that purpose; and as rent is high in Colorado, the rent and clerk hire very nearly consumed the salary of the postmaster.

The case is an exceptional one. The rapid increase in business is shown by the receipts of the office for 1878–'79. The claimant had given bond for the faithful discharge of his duties as postmaster; the interests of the people and the Government demanded the services rendered, and no good reason can be given why the money advanced for the purpose of paying the employés for labor absolutely indispensable ought not to be refunded. Congress has made appropriations for money paid out by land officials without authority of law whenever it has appeared such payments were necessary and have been beneficial to the Government. In this case the Government was the gainer, having made a large sum of money out of the office, and the claimant worked for a nominal sum, and then paid out nearly every dollar he received for rent and other expenses. Therefore your committee think that the claimant is entitled to receive the money he paid out for clerk-hire, and not allowed, and therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES GALLAGHER.

The bill (S. 1706) for the relief of Charles Gallagher, of New York, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that that bill may be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask leave to make a report from the Committee on Printing in regard to the printing of a matter that is important to be ordered to-day. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably with an amendment a Senate resolution, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. SHERMAN May 16, 1888, as follows:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations (Miscellaneous Document No. 109, first session Fiftieth Congress), being the report relating to the fisheries treaty, together with the views of the minority, be printed for the use of the Senate in connection with the message of the President, dated February 20, 1888, and the proposed treaty with Great Britain, and the map of the fishing limits prepared at the Hydrographic Office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Committee on Printing will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6, after the words "Great Britain," strike out the words:

And the map of the fishing limits prepared at the Hydrographic Office.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no objection to the present consideration of the resolution, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the Senator from Nebraska explain why it is not proper that this little map should be printed?

Mr. MANDERSON. We find it to be the fact that the cost of printing additional copies of these reports with the message of the President and the treaty will be but $288 for the 5,000, the matter being already in type. The printing of the map (which we think has already been printed in quite sufficient numbers for the use of the Senate) would increase the cost of printing beyond the $500 limit allowed by the law, and therefore it would make it necessary that the resolution should pass both Houses of Congress.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it had better pass both Houses then, because to the proper understanding of the subject among our citizens, for whom this extra printing is done, the desirability of seeing those shores, and the delimitations, and the whole situation, is quite important. I should hope, therefore, that if it is necessary to send a concurrent resolution to the other House, this will be turned into a concurrent resolution and let us ask the other House to agree to it, as I should suppose they doubtless would, rather than to cut out of the document a little map that is extremely necessary and useful to understanding the subject.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think myself that the printing of the map would probably be desirable, and the cost would not be very great. It would, however, extend the cost beyond the limit fixed by the law which one House alone may order. But it seemed to the committee that this document should be immediately printed for the use of the Senate; and fearing the delay which might be incident to making it a concurrent resolution and sending it to the other House, the committee thought it best to present the resolution in the amended form. I feel, however, like being guided very largely by the views of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Nebraska stated to me another consideration which caused me to think that the report of the committee is right. The map belongs to the Hydrographic Office and would have to be printed in a different form. It would have to be printed in colors and that would create some considerable delay. As a matter of course, the printing would have to be done in a different way; it would have to be done on wood, I presume.

Mr. MANDERSON. No, on stone.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a lithographed map. It is already printed. It will only be necessary to reproduce a certain number, 5,000 copies.

Mr. MANDERSON. Still the lithographer's stone is not owned by the Government, but it is owned by the lithographer who reduced the map and printed the several hundred copies already ordered. I certainly have no objection to making this a concurrent resolution if the Senate can wait.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps the better way would be to diminish the number to 3,000. That would bring the cost within $500, would it not?

Mr. MANDERSON. I should doubt it. I can have the calculation made.

Mr. HOAR. If we pass it to-day in the form of a concurrent resolution the Committee on Printing can report it at any time in the other House. They are a privileged committee.

Mr. MANDERSON. It does not seem that much privilege attaches to the committee in the other House. I know a great many matters which have been delayed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we had better try it, because it is a matter so useful to the understanding of the treaty and of the reports that this little map ought to go with it, even if it takes a week or two of waiting. I appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Printing not to insist on the amendment, but to turn the resolution into a concurrent one.

Mr. MANDERSON. I certainly have no objection to that course if it is the desire of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Committee on Printing.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 6, after the words "Great Britain," strike out the words—

And the map of the fishing limits prepared at the Hydrographic Office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANDERSON. I now ask that the Secretary be instructed to change the form of the resolution to that of a concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be understood as reporting the resolution in the form of a concurrent resolution, and the clerical work will be done by the Secretary. As thus amended will the Senate agree to the same?

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MARY E. HOPKINS.

The bill (S. 1914) for the relief of Mary E. Hopkins was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Mary E. Hopkins, widow of Alfred Hopkins, late captain in the Navy, $5,156.64, being for the salary of Hopkins, on leave pay, from the 21st of November, 1882, to the 24th of September, 1884.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to amend the bill in line 3, by adding, after the word "Secretary," the words "of the Treasury;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to hear the report read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the report submitted by Mr. BLACKBURN April 4, 1888——

Mr. COCKRELL. That is quite a long report, and the bill involves practically the amendment of the proceedings of a naval court-martial of an officer——

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I suspected.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does so by ignoring the sentence of the court-martial and paying the widow the salary from the date of dismissal to the date of death.

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest to the Senator, if opposition arises to the bill, that it go over, retaining its place.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], who has charge of the bill, is not present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; that is fair. Let it go over, retaining its place.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION

The bill (S. 2110) granting the right of way for the construction of a railroad through the Hot Springs reservation, State of Arkansas, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill being objected to, it will go over.

Mr. BERRY. I hope the Senator will withdraw the objection. It is not a very long bill. It has been pending here quite a while, and I have been watching it a good deal.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator desire me to withdraw my objection, for an explanation of the bill?

Mr. BERRY. I can not hear the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator if he desires to have me withdraw my objection, for an explanation of the bill? I had an idea that this was one of those bills in the interest of railroad corporations and rather against the rights of the people.

Mr. BERRY. I will state to the Senator that the city council of Hot Springs, Ark., together with a large number of citizens there have petitioned for it. The matter was referred to the Secretary of the Interior, referred by him to the superintendent of the reservation, a report made, and the bill was drawn according to the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior. The people at Hot Springs, so far as I know, have no objection to it. They think the proposed railway would be a convenience to visitors. I do not understand to what the Senator from Massachusetts refers—I could not hear him very distinctly—in regard to its being contrary to the interests of the people. If there is anything of that character in the bill and he will suggest it, I shall be glad to have him do so.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Arkansas inform the Senate what is the extent of the public reservation at Hot Springs? How large is it and what is the necessity for a railway passing through the reservation, which my recollection leads me to believe is very small? It is not a large reservation. It does not stand in the way of any railroad.

Mr. BERRY. I will state, in answer to the Senator from Maine, that I think there are 261 acres in the reservation.

Mr. HALE. A little more than a half mile square.

Mr. BERRY. The object and purpose of the parties there is to build, not a general railway, but simply a mountain railway, with a view of transporting passengers around the city and over those mountains to visit the places of interest. It is local in its character and not to be a general railway at all, as will be seen by the bill. The bill also provides that the railway company shall erect observatories and eligible locations. It is intended only for a local railway running around the city and crossing part of the reservation. That is the purpose of the bill. I know nothing whatever about it except that a large number of citizens there petitioned for it and the city council of the city of Hot Springs passed a resolution indorsing the proposition. The matter was referred to the Secretary of the Interior, and by him referred to the superintendent. The superintendent made a report recommending various amendments, which have been incorporated in the bill recommended by the Committee on Public Lands. That is all the knowledge I have in reference to the subject. There has been no objection from any source to the bill so far as my knowledge extends. If any persons there, either visitors or residents, object to it, I know nothing about it. I know nothing about the proposed legislation except that it was sent here and took the course I have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts insist upon his objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. I will withdraw it so far as to allow the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

Mr. HALE. I think the bill had better go over for to-day. I should like to examine it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine objects.

Mr. HALE. Let it retain its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will retain its place on the Calendar.

INDIAN GRAZING LANDS.

The bill (H. R. 8393) to protect lands belonging to Indians from unlawful grazing, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 7, after the word "tribe," to insert "or occupied by any Indian or tribe of Indians under authority of the United States;" and in line 9, after the word "tribe," to insert "or Indian;" so as to read:

That section 2117 of the United States Statutes at Large be so amended as to read as follows:

"Every person who drives, or otherwise conveys, any stock of horses, mules, or cattle to range, and feed on any land belonging to any Indian or Indian tribe, or occupied by any Indian or tribe of Indians under authority of the United States, without the consent of such tribe or Indian, is liable to a penalty of $1 for each animal of such stock; such penalty to be recovered by civil suit as provided in section 2124 of the said Statutes at Large."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, line 24, after the words "by the," to strike out "nation or tribe" and insert "Secretary of the Interior;" so as to read:

If a nation or tribe of Indians has no treasurer, then the amount of the penalty shall be paid by said clerk to such person as may be selected by the Secretary of the Interior to receive it, all said payments to be made under orders of court previously made and entered of record.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAWES subsequently said: During my absence I understand that the bill (H. R. 8393) to protect lands belonging to Indians from unlawful grazing, and for other purposes, was passed. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and myself have been engaged in the Committee on Appropriations. He had an amendment which he was anxious to propose to the bill. I therefore move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and will let the motion to reconsider lie until he comes in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider will be received and entered.

TIMBER DEPREDATIONS.

The bill (H. R. 8006) to amend section 5388 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to timber depredations, was announced as next in order.

Mr. STEWART. I think the bill may as well lie over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Nevada to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. STEWART. I object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

Mr. STEWART subsequently said: I objected to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8006) to amend section 5388 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to timber depredations. I have since compared it with the statute and I find that the only change it makes is to include Indian reservations. Consequently I have no objection to the bill, and I should like to withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada withdraws his objection to the bill, and its consideration will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 5388 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to read:

Every person who unlawfully cuts, or aids or is employed in unlawfully cutting, or wantonly destroys or procures to be wantonly destroyed, any timber standing upon the lands of the United States which, in pursuance of law, may be reserved or purchased for military or other purposes, or upon any Indian reservation, or lands belonging to or occupied by any tribe of Indians under authority of the United States, shall pay a fine of not more than $500 or be imprisoned not more than twelve months, or both, in the discretion of the court.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT MILITIA.

The bill (S. 657) to amend the act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia," passed March 3, 1803, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is an adverse report.

Mr. COCKRELL. That may be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next order of business is the bill (S. 2432) concerning the militia of the District of Columbia, which is also adversely reported.

Mr. HAWLEY. The substituted bill, though it does not appear technically as a substitute, is Senate bill 2602, the succeeding Order of Business.

The bill (S. 2602) concerning the militia of the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. In section 32, line 4, I move to strike out the word "all" and insert "the six;" and in line 5, after the words "days of," to strike out "any parade or;" so as to read:

That all officers and employés of the United States and of the District of Columbia who are members of the National Guard shall be entitled to leave of absence from their respective duties, without loss of pay or time, on the six days of encampment ordered or authorized under the provisions of this act.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is no objection to that amendment on the part of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is customary to place at the end of such acts the clause, "All acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed." I suggest that in this case, because there are upon the statute-book now eleven solid pages of these heavy statutes concerning the militia of the District of Columbia, and of course the greater part of it is antiquated. It is the law of 1803, which has been forgotten long ago, like the general statutes of the United States concerning the militia of the States. This proposed act is much shorter, and substantially takes the place of all of them.

Mr. HARRIS. A repealing clause can certainly do no harm.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 42. All acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know how the title appearing on the Calendar came to be there. The proper title of the bill is, "A bill concerning the militia of the District of Columbia." The Calendar says, "A bill to amend sections," etc. I call the attention of the clerks to be sure to give the correct title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut move an amendment to the title?

Mr. HAWLEY. The title is correctly printed in the bill. It is wrong on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The correct title will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill concerning the militia of the District of Columbia."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to know whether it is the desire of the Senate that the bill (S. 657) to amend the act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the organization of the militia of the District of Columbia," passed March 3, 1803, and the bill (S. 2432) concerning the militia of the District of Columbia shall be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let them be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The two bills will be indefinitely postponed.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

The bill (S. 2615) to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to acquire and use real estate for railway purposes in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that that bill be passed over.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; let that lie over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

ESTATE OF C. M. BRIGGS.

The bill (H. R. 4909) for the relief of the estate of C. M. Briggs, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to give the Court of Claims like jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim of the legal representatives of C. M. Briggs, deceased, for the proceeds of 455 bales of cotton, now in the Treasury of the United States, alleged to have been owned, in whole or in part, by Briggs, as is given to that court by the acts of March 12, 1863, and July 2, 1864, upon petition to be filed in the court at any time within two years, any statute of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN C. WEAVER.

The bill (H. R. 108) for the relief of John C. Weaver was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to John C. Weaver, of Dennison, Clark County, Illinois, $600, as compensation for a substitute furnished the Union Army during the war.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN HINSMANN.

The bill (S. 304) to correct the military record of John Hinsmann, late of Company G, Eleventh Regiment Kentucky Cavalry, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to so correct the military record of John Hinsmann, late private in Company G, Eleventh Regiment Kentucky Cavalry Volunteers, as to make it read that Hinsmann died March 5, 1864, from services performed while in the line of his duty.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASHER W. FOSTER.

The bill (S. 586) for the relief of Asher W. Foster, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to remove from the records of the War Department the charge of desertion now standing thereon against the name of Asher W. Foster, late quartermaster-sergeant of Company G, of the Fourteenth Indiana Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS MILLER.

The bill (S. 66) giving a military record to Thomas Miller was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to enter on the rolls of Company M, Eighth Regiment Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers, the name of Thomas Miller, as duly mustered into the United States service on the 27th of August, 1863, and to complete his military record, as follows: "Killed by the enemy November 25, 1863, while in the line of duty."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHRISTIAN FREDERICKSEN.

The bill (S. 587) for the relief of Christian Fredericksen was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to issue to Christian Fredericksen, who served under the name of N. T. Wisborg as a private in Company G, Ninth Kansas Volunteers, an honorable discharge from the service of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to add to the bill:

Upon the surrender of the discharge issued to Neil T. Wisborg, or of satisfactory proof of its loss, and upon evidence satisfactory to the War Department of the identity of Christian Fredericksen with the said Wisborg.

That amendment is recommended in the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, but by some means it was not inserted in the face of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC PARK IN SAGUACHE COUNTY, COLORADO.

The bill (S. 2427) to establish a public park to be called and known as the Royal Arch Park was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, to add as an additional section:

SEC. 2. In case there exists any valid claim to any of the lands described in section 1 of this act, under the homestead, pre-emption, timber-culture, or mineral laws of the United States, then such lands so claimed are exempted from the provisions of this act: Provided, however, That if any or all of such claims have been, or shall be, relinquished or abandoned, or shall lapse, then all parts or parcels of said lands to which such claims had attached shall be considered as included in the grant made by the first section of this act, the same as if no such claim had ever attached.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JESSE A. CORN.

The bill (S. 2316) restoring the right of pre-emption to Jesse A. Corn was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize Jesse A. Corn to pre-empt the land now claimed by him on making the proofs required by the provisions of the pre-emption law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report of the committee will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. TELLER April 9, 1888:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2316) restoring the right of pre-emption to Jesse A. Corn, having had the same under consideration, report:

The bill having been submitted to the Secretary of the Interior for a report thereon, he sends to the committee the following letter:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, April 4, 1888.

"SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 30th ultimo, transmitting copy of Senate bill 2316, requesting the views of this Department thereon.

"Said case is now pending before the Department on the appeal of Jesse A. Corn from the decision of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, rejecting his right of pre-emption to the northeast quarter of northeast quarter and northeast quarter of northwest quarter section 30, and southeast quarter of southwest quarter and southwest quarter of southeast quarter section 19, township 51 north, range 10 west, Gunnison, Colo., upon the ground that said claimant had exhausted his pre-emption right.

"It appears from the record that Corn made the prior filing referred to, but pleads by way of excuse the following: That he settled upon and improved 40 acres of land on the Arkansas River, in Fremont County, Colorado, about 12 miles below Cañon City (the tract last above described), in April, 1874, there being no other vacant land then adjoining said tract; that he proceeded to build a ditch for the irrigation of said land to the value of $800, a log house for residence purposes valued at $100, a barn valued at $50, a smoke-house valued at $100, fencing valued at $200, and also did clearing on said land to the value of $300, the total value of said improvements amounting to $1,550; that afterwards, to wit, in July and September, of 1875, the Arkansas River completely flooded said tract of land, covering the same in places to a depth of from 6 inches to 3 feet; that his crop was completely ruined thereby, and his house was in great danger of being washed away, thereby endangering the lives of himself and family; that having been advised by several of his neighbors to remove from said land on account of said overflow, and because of the danger attendant to his living there, on or about January, 1876, he relinquished his pre-emption filing to said tract, and sold his improvements at a great sacrifice.

"Believing, as he states, that he had a right to make a second filing, inasmuch as he had never proved up on the first tract, he filed for his present claim November 6, 1884, alleging settlement May 1, and offered final proof on the same February 12, 1887, showing a continuous residence on the part of his family. He himself lived on the land continuously from date of settlement, with the exception of absences of three months during the thrashing season of each of the years 1884, 1885, and 1886, but returned to his family nearly every week, who continued to reside on the tract.

"The claimant has made valuable improvements on this land, amounting in value to about $2,500, including the buildings, fencing, ditching, leveling, and clearing the land, and has evidently acted in good faith, but in ignorance of the law.

"As the claimant exhausted his pre-emption right under section 2261, Revised Statutes, with his filing in 1874, the Department is powerless to relieve this pre-emptor, but as the equities are so strong in his favor I am of the opinion that the bill should be passed for his relief.

"Action upon this claim will be suspended until Congress disposes of the bill.

"Very respectfully,

"WM. F. VILAS, Secretary.

"Hon. P. B. PLUMB,
"Chairman Committee Public Lands, United States Senate."

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask unanimous consent that, without interfering with the regular order of business, the Senate proceed to consider the unobjected private pension cases on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of private pension bills on the Calendar that are unobjected to, the Senate now proceeding, under its former unanimous consent, with the Calendar in its order.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will withdraw that request, because he will have no trouble at any hour of any day in securing the consideration of pension bills.

Mr. BLAIR. That is not the point. I only wanted to see some business done.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will not interfere with the standing order we can go on with the Calendar.

Mr. BLAIR. I withdraw my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next case on the Calendar under Rule VIII will be reported.

CLOSING OF ALLEYS IN WASHINGTON.

The bill (S. 1612) to provide for the closing of parts of two alleys in square 132, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, and for the relief of Charles Early and Corbin Warwick, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OFFICERS OF MARINE CORPS.

The bill (S. 2049) to equalize the grades of the Marine Corps was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

HEIRS OF A. GATES LEE AND B. P. LEE.

The bill (H. R. 4908) for the relief of the heirs of A. Gates Lee and heirs of B. P. Lee, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for paying to the heirs of A. Gates Lee, deceased, of McCracken County, Kentucky, and the heirs of B. P. Lee, deceased, $675, for use and occupation of their mill property by United States troops during the late war.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DECORATION TO BRIG. GEN. ABSALOM BAIRD.

The joint resolution (S. R. 59) authorizing Brig. Gen. Absalom Baird, United States Army, to accept from the President of the French Republic a diploma conferring the decoration of Commander of the National Order of the Legion of Honor was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMMANDER JOHN W. PHILIP.

The bill (H. R. 639) to authorize Commander John W. Philip, United States Navy, to accept a silver pitcher from the Government of the United States of Colombia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BAYOU D'ARBONNE BRIDGE, IN LOUISIANA.

The bill (S. 2199) authorizing the Little Rock and Alexandria Railway Company to maintain and construct a bridge across Bayon D'Arbonne, in Louisiana, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 4, line 12, before the word "court," to strike out "district" and insert "circuit;" and in line 13, after the words "Louisiana in," to strike out "which" and insert "whose jurisdiction;" so as to read:

And in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of said river, caused or alleged to be caused by said bridge, the case may be brought in the circuit court of the United States of the State of Louisiana in whose jurisdiction any portion of said obstruction or bridge may be located.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to section 5:

And if the rate of compensation can not be agreed upon by the parties, the same shall be fixed by the Secretary of War.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That all railroad companies desiring the use of said bridge shall have and be entitled to equal rights and privileges relative to the passage of railway trains over the same, and over the approaches thereto, upon payment of a reasonable compensation for such use. And if the rate of compensation can not be agreed upon by the parties, the same shall be fixed by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, line 17, after the words "not be," to insert "commenced or;" so as to read:

And until the said plan and location of the bridge are approved by the Secretary of War, the bridge shall not be commenced or built, and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, and said structure shall be changed, at the cost and expense of the owners thereof, from time to time, as Congress may direct, so as to preserve the free and convenient navigation of said bayou.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 7. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of this act being approved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOB BARNARD.

The bill (H. R. 5683) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to complete a contract for the sale of certain real estate to Job Barnard was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the commissioners of the District of Columbia to carry out and complete the contract of sale made by W. Dennison, J. H. Ketcham, and S. L. Phelps, former commissioners, with Job Barnard, dated June 12, 1877, duly acknowledged and recorded in liber 858, at folio 221 of the land records of the District, and on payment by the purchaser of the money therein agreed to be paid the commissioners are to execute and deliver a deed to the purchaser, his heirs or assigns, conveying thereby the title of the District to the real estate described in the contract.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMERICAN GROCER ASSOCIATION.

The bill (S. 577) for the relief of the American Grocer Association of the city of New York was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, upon the order of the Postmaster-General to the American Grocer Association of the city of New York, $486, or so much thereof as may be found equitably due, for postage erroneously paid by the association.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TEXAS JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

The bill (H. R. 1874) to change the eastern and northern judicial districts of Texas, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

PROTECTION OF OFFICERS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The bill (H. R. 4920) for the protection of the officials of the United States in the Indian Territory was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, after the word "murder," at the end of line 11, to insert:

Assault, or assault and battery, or who shall in any manner obstruct by threats or violence any person who is engaged in the service of the United States in the discharge of any of his duties as agent, policeman, or other officer aforesaid.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That any Indian hereafter committing against the person of any Indian agent or policeman appointed under the laws of the United States, or against any Indian United States deputy marshal, posse comitatus, or guard, while lawfully engaged in the execution of any United States process, or lawfully engaged in any other duty imposed upon such agent, policeman, deputy marshal, posse comitatus, or guard by the laws of the United States, any of the following crimes, namely, murder, manslaughter, or assault with intent to murder, assault or assault and battery, or who shall in any manner obstruct by threats or violence any person who is engaged in the service of the United States in the discharge of any of his duties as agent, policeman, or other officer aforesaid, within the Indian Territory, or who shall hereafter commit either of the crimes aforesaid, in said Indian Territory, against any person who, at the time of the commission of said crime, or at any time previous thereto, belonged to either of the classes of officials hereinbefore named, shall be subject to the laws of the United States relating to such crimes, and shall be tried by the district court of the United States exercising criminal jurisdiction where such offense was committed, and shall be subject to the same penalties as are all other persons charged with the commission of said crimes, respectively, and the said courts are hereby given jurisdiction in all such cases.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment and that a committee of conference be appointed.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. DAWES, Mr. JONES of Arkansas, and Mr. STOCKBRIDGE were appointed.

ARRESTS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

The bill (H. R. 8394) to authorize United States marshals to arrest offenders and fugitives from justice in Indian Territory was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Indian Affairs reported amendments, in line 5, after the word "process," to insert "connected with any criminal proceeding," and in line 10, after the word "execute," to insert "like;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That after the passage of this act any United States marshal is hereby authorized and required, when necessary to execute any process connected with any criminal proceeding issued out of the circuit or district court of the United States for the district of which he is marshal, or by any commissioner of either of said courts, to enter the Indian Territory, and to execute the same therein in the same manner that he is now required by law to execute like processes in his own district.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAWES. I make the same motion in this case, to insist on the amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. DAWES, Mr. JONES of Arkansas, and Mr. STOCKBRIDGE were appointed.

JOHN M'BEAN.

The bill (S. 2213) for the relief of John McBean, of Umatilla County, Oregon, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments. The first amendment was, in line 4, after the name "John McBean," to strike out "long" and insert "for a long time an;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to allot to John McBean, for a long time an interpreter at the Umatilla Indian reservation, in the State of Oregon, a tract of land, not exceeding in amount 160 acres, out of the lands in the Umatilla reservation, which lands, when so selected by the Secretary of the Interior, shall be patented to the said John McBean on the same terms and conditions as patents are issued to the Indians selecting lands on such reservation in pursuance of existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That the consent of the Umatilla Indians upon said reservation to such allotment shall be first obtained in manner and form satisfactory to the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SEWELL COULSON AND OTHERS.

The bill (S. 1031) for the payment of Sewell Coulson, and Porter, Harrison and Fishback for legal services was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Sewell Coulson $3,950, and to Porter, Harrison and Fishback $2,500, for legal services rendered by them (as recommended and approved by the Judge-Advocate-General and Secretary of War) in defending ex-officers and ex-soldiers for acts done by them in obedience to the orders of a superior officer of the United States Army, in Indiana, during the late war.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. S. B. DUVALL.

The bill (S. 1503) for the relief of Mrs. S. B. Duvall, widow of the late Rev. W. P. Duvall, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, in line 7, to strike out "otherwise" and insert "any other funds belonging to them in the Treasury;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That Mrs. S. B. Duvall, widow of the late Rev. W. P. Duvall, late principal in charge of the Indian boarding-school for the Sac and Fox Indians of Kansas, be allowed and paid, out of any moneys accruing from the sale of their lands, or any other funds belonging to them in the Treasury, the sum of $757, a sum due for the boarding, clothing, and care of the Indian children belonging to that tribe for the years 1863, 1864, and 1865, and this shall be received in full payment of the claim.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INAUGURATION DAY IN THE DISTRICT.

The bill (S. 2551) to amend section 993 of the Revised Statutes of the United States for the District of Columbia so as to make Inauguration Day a holiday within said District was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLEMENT A. LOUNSBERRY.

The bill (S. 326) for the relief of Clement A. Lounsberry was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Clement A. Lounsberry, postmaster at Bismarck, Dak., the sum of $750, that being the amount expended by said Lounsberry in the payment of clerks necessarily employed in said office from April 1, 1881, to June 30, 1882, and which amount was disallowed in the settlement of his accounts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEIRS OF MAURICE GRIVOT.

The bill (S. 204) for the relief of the heirs of Maurice Grivot was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the payment to Marie Emma Nicholas and Anne Elodie Jaques, heirs of Maurice Grivot, late of New Orleans, La., of $962.85, in satisfaction of money and property taken by the Government, and in full payment of their claim.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The last section of the bill will be stricken out, if there be no objection. The words are "Sec. 2. That this act take effect from and after its passage."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNITED STATES NAVAL HOMES.

The bill (S. 128) for the relief of sailors and marines in the United States naval homes was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the naval asylum located at Philadelphia, Pa., shall hereafter be designated and known as the United States Naval Home.

SEC. 2. That any inmate of the United States Naval Home who is entitled to receive from the Government an invalid pension, or a pension for service in the Mexican war, and who has a child, wife, or parent living, shall, by filing with the proper pension agent a written direction to that effect, approved by the governor of the home, have his pension, or any part of it, paid to such child, wife, or parent. The pensions of all who now are or shall hereafter become inmates of the home, except such as shall be assigned as aforesaid, shall be paid to the pay-officer of the home. The money thus derived shall be held by such pay-officer in trust for the pensioner to whom it would otherwise have been paid, and such part of it as shall not sooner have been paid to him shall be paid to him on his final discharge from the institution. The governor of the home may, from time to time, direct the payment to any inmate of such part of his pension money as he may think best for his interest and consistent with the discipline and good order of the home, but such pensioner shall not be entitled to demand or have the same so long as he remains an inmate of the home. In case of the death of any pensioner, any pension money due him and remaining in the hands of the pay-officer of the home shall be paid to his legal representatives, if demand is made within three years; otherwise the same shall belong to the home.

SEC. 3. That transportation at Government expense may, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, be furnished to such persons authorized to enter the Naval Home as beneficiaries as shall be unable to pay for their transportation to the same.

SEC. 4. That all laws and parts of laws relating to the United States Naval Asylum now in force and not inconsistent with this act are continued in force, and such as are inconsistent herewith are to that extent repealed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to call attention to the third section, which authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to pay transportation expenses. I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut or some other Senator—I believe the Senator from Connecticut has been a manager of a soldiers' home—do we pay the expenses of transporting our soldiers to the volunteer soldiers' homes?

Mr. HAWLEY. My impression is that we do on their first being sent there. I think they get through the proper officer transportation. I know sometimes when they go away, or go off on long furloughs, they pay their own bills; but I think when they are originally sent there they are furnished transportation.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not so understand the regulations. There is a soldiers' home at Leavenworth, Kans. If a soldier in Missouri wants to go to that home I do not understand that the Government pays his expenses from his home to the institution at Leavenworth.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think at least on his first application the Government pays his transportation. That is my impression, but I may be mistaken. A great many of them could not get there if you did not pay their transportation.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Missouri will notice that this payment is only to be made in a case where the sailor beneficiary is unable to pay.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that; but there ought to be an equality between the soldiers and sailors.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then the Senator wants the inmates of a naval home treated as well as the inmates of a soldiers' home.

Mr. COCKRELL. Unquestionably, if the inmates of a soldiers' home get it; but if the inmates of a soldiers' home do not get transportation, then the sailors themselves ought not to get it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am sure I am right about our paying the fare to the soldiers' homes when men first go there.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the clause be read again.

The Chief Clerk read section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. That transportation at Government expense may, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, be furnished to such persons authorized to enter the Naval Home as beneficiaries as shall be unable to pay for their transportation to the same.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator from Missouri object to that as it stands?

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator has withdrawn the objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have never objected to anything. I stated that if the law governing our soldiers' homes did not authorize the payment of expenses of transporting the soldiers applying for admission to the homes from their residences to the homes, then this ought not to be passed. They say it does. Then this ought to pass in order that they shall be on an equality.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the inmates of the United States Naval Home."

EXTRA-TIME PAY TO CHICAGO CUSTOM-HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

The bill (H. R. 2068) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay certain citizens of Chicago, employés of the custom-house, for extra-time service, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES E. WALTER.

The bill (S. 773) for the relief of James E. Walter was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to James E. Walter, late contractor for dredging the harbor of Brunswick, Ga., 23 cents per cubic yard for 12,000 cubic yards of hard excavation, less 13½ cents per cubic yard already paid, amounting to $1,095, the additional payment having been recommended by the Secretary of War as a fair and just compensation for the work.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN C. FRÉMONT.

The bill (S. 2395) authorizing the President to appoint and retire John C. Frémont as a major-general in the United States Army was announced as next in order.

Mr. REAGAN. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas objects to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. REAGAN. I will state to the Senator that I have called for some information which I want to use in the consideration of the bill. When I receive the information from the Department, I shall not object to the consideration of the bill. Let it go over without prejudice.

Mr. HALE. The bill has gone over once on the objection of the Senator from Texas. I do not say there was any positive agreement that it would not be objected to again——

Mr. COCKRELL. It was not called up in regular order before.

Mr. HALE. Still I understood that when it came up we should have a vote upon it.

Mr. COCKRELL. It has not, however, been reached on the Calendar in its regular order before. We have never heretofore been this far on the Calendar. The Senator once moved to take it up. The bill will lead to discussion, and we can not possibly pass it this evening. It would simply be a waste of time to take it up without accomplishing anything.

Mr. HALE. I give notice, then, that at some very early day I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, and I hope then it will be disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar without prejudice.

MILITARY HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

The bill (S. 2461) appropriating $150,000 for quarters and barracks at the branches of the National Military Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Military Affairs reported an amendment in line 3, after the word "dollars," to insert "the same to be immediately available;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $150,000, the same to be immediately available, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the board of managers in the construction and equipment of additional quarters and barracks for disabled veterans at the southern, northwestern, and western branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, located at Hampton, Milwaukee, and Leavenworth, respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT-SHIP AT BUSH'S BLUFF SHOAL.

The bill (S. 2517) for the establishment of a light-ship at Bush's Bluff Shoal, Elizabeth River, Virginia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POTEAU RIVER BRIDGE IN ARKANSAS.

The bill (S. 1948) to authorize the Fort Smith and Choctaw Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Poteau River, on the lands of Mrs. M. A. Bower, in the Choctaw Nation, near Fort Smith, Ark., was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SAN DIEGO, CAL.

The bill (S. 1864) to provide for the erection of a public building at San Diego, Cal., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported the bill with amendments, in line 4, after the word "procure," to insert "by purchase or condemnation proceedings;" and in line 9, after the word "dollars," to insert "which sum is hereby appropriated;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to procure by purchase or condemnation proceedings a site for, and cause to be erected thereon, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults therein, for the post-office, custom-house, internal-revenue office, and other Government offices, at the city of San Diego, Cal., the cost of which site and building shall not exceed $200,000, which sum is hereby appropriated: Provided, That the site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings, by an open space of not less than 40 feet, including streets and alleys; and no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended until a valid title to the site of said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of California shall have ceded exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the Government of the United States remains the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of the State and the service of civil process therein.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT IMPROVEMENT ASSESSMENTS.

The bill (S. 1092) for the relief of St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum, in the District of Columbia, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the provisions of section 1 of the act of the late Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia, entitled "An act regulating assessments for improvements," approved December 19, 1871, shall be construed to apply to all cases where the work was done after February 21, 1871, and that the commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby directed to make the necessary reductions in assessment for such work.

SEC. 2. That drawback certificates for the amount of such reductions, with interest thereon to the date of the passage of this act, shall be issued to the holders of the liens, the security for which is reduced by the operation of this act, and to such other persons as may be found to have paid in excess of one-third of the cost of such work drawback certificates shall be issued for the amount of such excessive payment. All such drawback certificates shall be receivable for arrears of general taxes due the District of Columbia and unpaid June 30, 1887.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of certain property in the District of Columbia."

POTEAU RIVER BRIDGE IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I objected to the consideration of Calendar number 1074, Senate bill 1948. I withdraw the objection now, as I understand that some amendments have been agreed to, on the adoption of which I am prepared to assent to the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being withdrawn, the bill will now be considered.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1948) to authorize the Fort Smith and Choctaw Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Poteau River, on the lands of Mrs. M. A. Bower, in the Choctaw Nation, near Fort Smith, Ark.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 2, line 2, after the words "less than," to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy;" in line 5, after the word "least," to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty;" and in line 9, after the word "point," to insert "and give a clear opening of 70 feet in width;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That if said bridge shall be made with unbroken and continuous span, the spans shall not be less than 70 feet in the clear, and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river. The lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge shall be at least 30 feet above extreme high water, as understood at the point of location: Provided, That if the same shall be constructed as a draw-bridge, the draw or pivot shall be over the main channel of the river at an accessible navigable point, and give a clear opening of 70 feet in width, and the spans shall not be less than 10 feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest part of the superstructure of said bridge: Provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal for the passing of boats.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the said company is authorized to have a right of way not exceeding the width of 100 feet for the approaches to said bridge on each side over the lands claimed by individual members of the Choctaw tribe, under the laws and usages of said tribe, and shall obtain the same by contract with said owners or claimants, or in case of a failure to obtain said right of way by contract, then the same may be condemned by proper proceeding in the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas, such proceedings to be governed by the laws of the State of Arkansas as now in force respecting the condemnation or right of way for railroads.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. As a substitute for section 3 I offer the following:

SEC. 3. That said corporation is authorized to take and use for all purposes of a bridgeway or approaches to said bridge, and for no other purpose, a right of way not exceeding 50 feet in width on each side of said Poteau River over the lands claimed by individuals under the laws and usages of said tribe of Choctaw Indians, and may contract for and obtain the same from such Indian or Indians by purchase: Provided, That no part of the lands herein authorized to be taken be leased or sold by the company, and they shall not be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said bridgeway; and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used, such portion shall revert to the individual Indian or Indians from which the same shall have been taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the committee is to strike out section 3. The motion of the Senator from Arkansas is to strike out the section and insert the words just read. The question is on the motion to strike out and insert.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I now submit what I send to the desk as an additional section to come in after section 3.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert after section 3 the following:

SEC. 4. That before said bridgeway shall be constructed through any lands held by individual occupants according to the laws, customs, and usages of the Choctaw Nation, full compensation shall be made to such occupants for all property to be taken or damage done by reason of the construction of such bridgeway. In case of failure to make amicable settlements with any occupant, such compensation shall be determined by the appraisement of three disinterested referees, to be appointed, one (who shall act as chairman) by the President, one by the chief of the nation to which said occupant belongs, and one by the said bridge company, who, before entering upon the duties of their appraisements, shall take and subscribe before a district judge, clerk of a district court, or United States commissioner an oath that they will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of their appraisement, which oath, duly certified, shall be returned with their award to and filed with the Secretary of the Interior within sixty days from the completion thereof; and a majority of said referees shall be competent to act, in case of the absence of a member, after due notice; and upon the failure of either party to make such appointment within thirty days after the appointment made by the President, the vacancy shall be filled by the district judge of the United States court held at Fort Smith, Ark., upon the application of the other party. The chairman of said board shall appoint the time and place of all hearings within the nation to which such occupant belongs. Each of said referees shall receive for his services the sum of $4 per day for each day they are engaged in the trial of any cause submitted to them under this act, with mileage at 5 cents per mile. Witnesses shall receive the usual fees allowed by the court of said nation. Costs, including compensation of said referees, shall be made a part of the award, and be paid by such railway company. In case the referees do not agree, then any two of them are authorized to make the award. Either party being dissatisfied with the finding of the referees shall have the right, within ninety days after the making of the award and notice of the same, to appeal by original petition to the district court held at Fort Smith, Ark., which court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the subject-matter of the petition, according to the laws of the State of Arkansas for determining the damage when property is taken for railroad purposes. If, upon the hearing of said appeal, the judgment of the court shall be for a larger sum than the award of the referees, the costs of said appeal shall be adjudged against the railroad company. If the judgment of the court shall be for the same or a less sum than the award made by the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the party claiming damages. When proceedings have been commenced in court the bridge company shall pay double the amount of the award into court to abide the judgment thereof, and then have the right to enter upon the property sought to be condemned and proceed with the construction of the railway.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to strike out section 6, as follows:

SEC. 6. That the district court of the United States for the western district of Arkansas, or such other court of the United States as may have jurisdiction over the Indian Territory in which said bridge is located, shall have jurisdiction over all controversies arising between the said Fort Smith and Choctaw Bridge Company and the Choctaw tribe of Indians; and said court shall have like jurisdiction, without reference to amount in controversy, over all controversies arising between the inhabitants of said nation or tribe of Indians and said bridge company, and also over all controversies which may arise between the stockholders and the company and among each other; and the civil jurisdiction is hereby extended within the limits of said Indian nation, without distinction of citizenship as to parties, so far as the same may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 6. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas. I think perhaps I was in error in one respect. This bill went to the Committee on Commerce and two sections were recommended to be stricken out by the committee. Subsequently the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] agreed that the sections stricken out might be allowed to retain their place in the bill, it being a local matter and not of very great consequence. The friends of the measure got together and prepared the amendments which I have submitted, which were thought to meet the objections the committee had to the bill and at the same time carry out the purpose the other side had, with the impression that there would be no objection to the bill thus amended. I stated when I got up that the amendments had been submitted to the Senator from Missouri, but I now understand they have not been. If the bill passes, however, and it does not meet with his entire approval, I shall be willing to have it reconsidered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Fort Smith and Choctaw Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Poteau River, in the Choctaw Nation, near Fort Smith, Ark.

Mr. TURPIE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 21, 1888, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 17, 1888.

The House met at 10 o'clock a. m.

The House was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN, who stated that the Speaker was unavoidably absent, and directed the reading of the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., May 17, 1888.

I hereby designate Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN to preside at the session of the House to-day.

JNO. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. JONES, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

Mr. CRISP, by unanimous consent, had his leave of absence extended for one week, on account of sickness in his family.

OHIO VALLEY CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk a privileged report, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9711) making an appropriation to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government and the Bureau of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the Centennial Exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, from July 4 to October 27, 1888, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 3 and 22.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19, 20, and 21, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"That there shall be appointed a committee of Congress, composed of ten members, five to be appointed by the President of the Senate and five by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Said committee is authorized and directed to visit said exposition and make such report to Congress in that behalf as they may deem needful and proper."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$147,750;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "For expenses of the committee of Congress, $2,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: After the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"Provided, That payment of the expense incurred by the committee of Congress shall be made on vouchers approved by the chairman of said committee."

And the Senate agree to the same.

D. B. HENDERSON,
J. C. CLEMENTS,
BENJ. BUTTERWORTH,
Managers on the part of the House.

W. B. ALLISON,
H. L. DAWES,
F. M. COCKRELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The following is the accompanying statement required by the rules:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9711) making an appropriation to enable the Departments of the Government to participate in the centennial exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, submit the following written statement in explanation of the action agreed upon by the conference on the amendments of the Senate:

The Senate made twenty-two amendments to the bill, all but five of which were of a verbal character or to perfect the punctuation in the bill. The conference committee recommend that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of this character.

The other amendments in controversy struck out the provision in the bill for the Congressional committee to constitute an advisory board to confer with the managers of said exposition and the heads of the Executive Departments in reference to the character, extent, and conduct of the Government exhibits and the appropriation of $5,000 for their expenses.

The conference committee recommend as a substitute that a committee of Congress, consisting of five Senators and five Representatives, be appointed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, respectively, with power to visit said exposition, and make such report to Congress as they may deem needful and proper, with an appropriation of $2,500 for their expenses.

D. B. HENDERSON,
J. C. CLEMENTS,
BENJ. BUTTERWORTH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I move that the report be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY SCHOOL AT FORT LEAVENWORTH, KANS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of War of an appropriation for expenses of an infantry and cavalry school at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., for the fiscal year 1889; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES CARPENTER, ADMINISTRATOR, VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of findings of fact in the case of Charles Carpenter, administrator, vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

T. N. ALLISON VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of findings of fact in the case of Thomas N. Allison vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

ANNIE E. DAVIS, ADMINISTRATRIX, VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of findings of fact in the case of Annie E. Davis, administratrix, vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

GEORGE MUNGA VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of fact in the case of George Munga vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

EASTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 7398) to subdivide the eastern judicial district of Louisiana, and to fix the time and place of holding court therein; and to put the same upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all processes from the circuit and district courts for the eastern district of Louisiana against defendants residing in the parishes of Pointe Coupée, West Baton Rouge, Iberville, Ascension, East Feliciana, West Feliciana, East Baton Rouge, St. Helena, Livingston, shall be returned to said courts at Baton Rouge, La., and all processes against defendants residing in the other parishes of the eastern district of Louisiana shall be returned to New Orleans.

SEC. 2. That the terms of court shall be held at New Orleans as now fixed by law. Terms of circuit and district courts shall be held at Baton Rouge semi-annually on the second Mondays of April and November.

SEC. 3. That if there be more than one defendant and they reside in different divisions of the district, the plaintiff may sue in either division, and send duplicate writ or writs to the other defendants; and the said writs, when executed and returned into the court from which they issued, shall constitute one suit and be proceeded in accordingly.

SEC. 4. That all causes triable in either of the courts of said eastern district shall be tried in the division to which the process is returnable under the provisions of this act, unless by consent of all parties the cause be removed to some other division of said district.

SEC. 5. That all prosecutions for crimes or offenses hereafter committed in either division shall be cognizable within such division: Provided, That all crimes and offenses heretofore committed within the divisions created by this act shall be prosecuted, tried, and determined in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been passed.

SEC. 6. That all grand and petit jurors summoned for service in each division shall be residents of such division.

SEC. 7. That a deputy clerk of the district court shall be appointed at each place in the two divisions of said eastern district where said court is required to be held, each of whom, in the absence of the clerk, may exercise all the official powers of clerk at the place and within the division for which he is appointed.

SEC. 8. That causes removed from any court of the State of Louisiana in the circuit court of the United States within said eastern district shall be removed to the circuit court in the division in which such State court is held.

The following amendments were recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary:

Section 1, line 7, insert the word "and" between "St. Helena" and "Livingston."

Section 5, line 2, after the word "either," strike out the words "of the."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JACOB G. BOSTATTER.

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5259) to relieve Jacob G. Bostatter from the charge of fraudulent enlistment, and that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to remove from the rolls and records of the War Department now in his office, or under his control, any and all charges of fraudulent enlistment now standing on said rolls against Jacob Y. Bostalter, late private in Company H, Thirty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and that said Jacob Y. Bostalter be restored to all rights lost or suspended by reason of any such charge.

There was no objection, and the motion was agreed to.

The committee recommended amendments changing the name, wherever it occurred in the bill, so as to read "Jacob G. Bostatter," and making a corresponding change in the title.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOOTHMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order, and I now move to dispense with the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen having reports to present may have leave to send them to the desk and have them duly referred.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FILING OF REPORTS.

The following reports were filed by being handed in at the Clerk's desk:

CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION.

Mr. HOOKER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back with amendments the bill (S. 2292) to provide for a celebration at the national capital in 1889 in honor of the centennial of the Constitution of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of a petition from citizens of the District of Columbia, protesting against interference with the liberty of the United States Marine band, and the same was referred to the Committee on Labor.

LYDIA CALHOUN.

Mr. YODER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 486) granting a restoration of pension to Lydia Calhoun; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHARLES CARPENTER.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. 10009) for the relief of Charles Carpenter, administrator of Celia A. Grove, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS UNDER BOWMAN ACT.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky, also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. 10010) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies taken and used by the United States Army, as reported by the Court of Claims, under the provisions of the Bowman act; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5052) equalizing the payment and doing justice to the officers, soldiers, and sailors of the United States in the late rebellion who were paid in currency commonly called greenbacks; and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of bills raising revenue.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, denunciation is a harbor of refuge for such oratorical hulks as have been dismasted in the tempest of the forum, or such as have gone to sea on the ocean of free trade without having fully equipped themselves for the voyage. [Laughter.] Any person can declare that protection is robbery. It does not require much genius or ability to make a mere assertion. Such declarations are seldom more than imitations—a parrot can do as much. A simpleton audience, composed of such human parrots, might be induced to believe such declarations, but American intelligence—never.

The man who asserts, that protection is robbery, displays either his ignorance or his demagogism, and perhaps both. I could with as much plausibility declare that free trade is rape. Remarkable as it may seem, during the progress of the debate on the Mills tariff bill in this House, we have time and time again been treated to the declaration, that protection was robbery, and have as often been treated to the twin declaration, that the Democratic party was opposed to free trade.

If the Democratic party is not for free trade, then it must be for protection; if it is for protection, and protection be robbery, then the Democratic party is in favor of robbery, and the only difference between it and its adversary is, that it believes in sectionalizing robbery, and hence supports the Mills tariff bill. If these positions be true, then this Democratic party goes upon the theory, that the manufacturers in New England have had the benefit of the robbery long enough, and determines to withdraw protection from them and let them compete with the manufacturer of British wares made by pauper labor, or close up; that New York, Michigan, and Kansas have had the benefits of the robbery long enough on salt, and hence salt must go on the free-list, and those engaged in its manufacture must compete with pauper labor, or close up; that Pennsylvania and Ohio have had the benefit of the robbery on coal and iron long enough; but because Virginia, West Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama, and Missouri have not had this benefit sufficiently long, the coal and iron interest may still continue to rob. Might it not be well to place the coal and iron of Pennsylvania and Ohio on the free-list, and continue those articles in West Virginia, Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama, and Missouri under the present tariff? And this kind of a compromise might relieve my friend from Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL] and my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] from the dilemma in which they are placed.

But to return. The agriculturist of the North and West have had the benefit of the robbery of protection long enough, and so the framers of the Mills bill put wool, linseed, garden seed, all oil-seed, hemp-seed, beans, peas, milk, poultry, hemp, beeswax, flax, and other products of the farmer on the free-list, but will continue to rob the farmer and all others for the benefit of some Southern States, on rice, sugar, cotton-ties, etc.

If protection is robbery, it is robbery West as well as South, and East as well as North. If it is robbery, why do you rob the bean and pea farmer of the Northwest for the benefit of the rice farmer of the Southeast? If it is robbery, why do you rob the hemp and flax farmer of the North for the benefit of the sugar-planter of the South? If it is robbery, why do you rob the wheat farmer by taxing him on the material out of which the band is made with which he binds his sheaves of wheat, and do not tax the cotton-planter for the band with which he binds his cotton bales?

Robbery, in law, is the forcible and felonious taking from the person of another any money or goods, putting him in fear, or by taking from his person any property by violence, or by menace or threats of death or bodily harm. In an enlarged or general sense it is plundering, pillaging, taking by violence, wrong, or oppression. If protection be robbery, then, to put it in its mildest form, it is plundering the people; it is pillaging from the people; it is taking their property by violence, by wrong, by oppression. If protection is robbery, and Democracy is not in favor of free trade, then every Democrat who supports protection is a robber, a pillager, a plunderer, a wrongdoer, an oppressor.

Every argument made in favor of the Mills bill, with one or two exceptions, has denounced protection, attributed to its baneful influence all the evils that have ever afflicted this country in a commercial or financial way. The agriculturist has been oppressed by it; the laboring man has been plundered by it; the mechanic has been pillaged through its influence; the baby in the cradle has cried because of its oppression, and none but the manufacturer has been the recipient of any of its favors. The manufacturer has been the beneficiary of this pillaging and plundering and wrongdoing and oppression. And yet, in the same speeches, almost in the same sentence, many times in the same declaration, have we heard praises and laudations in favor of the Mills tariff bill.

Who framed the Mills tariff bill? That is a conundrum which no one as yet has solved, to my knowledge. It was charged that many of its provisions were framed by "Parsee" Moore, an agent for large importing firms in New York. When the charge was made, there was a flush of righteous indignation hovering over the features of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE], and interrogation after interrogation from him followed fast and followed faster, but there was no denial. By all the rules of evidence, the solution of the conundrum might well be held to be that "Parsee" Moore framed the Mills tariff bill. It matters not, however, who framed it; we know who fathered it and brought it before the House—ROGER Q. MILLS, of Texas; BENTON MCMILLIN, of Tennessee; CLIFTON R. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas; W. C. P. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky; HENRY G. TURNER, of Georgia; WILLIAM L. WILSON, of West Virginia; WILLIAM L. SCOTT, of Pennsylvania, and WILLIAM D. BYNUM, of Indiana. These are the members on the majority side of the Ways and Means Committee by whose action this Mills bill was presented to this House and has been brought up for consideration.

If the Mills bill is not a free-trade bill, then it must be for protection, and if protection is robbery, then it must be for robbery; and if it is robbery, then these gentlemen whose names I have given, are robbers, and in this position must they pose before the American people by all the rules of logic and argument, if the Mills bill is not a free-trade bill. [Laughter.]

It is interesting to quote the language of some of these robbers. My friend from Texas [Mr. MILLS], in speaking on the tariff and in favor of the Mills bill, said:

> We have wool, flax, hemp; our country is full of coal and iron and lumber and yet with all these advantages over all others we have pursued a suicidal policy of protection which has closed the markets of the world against us. Not content with this, we have plundered the great body of our agricultural people out of a large part of their wealth.

And again, in speaking of protection and what is demanded of those who favor the Mills tariff bill, he says among other things:

> Freedom from taxation, levied for the purpose of enriching favored classes by the spoliation and plundering of the people.

He is the captain of this spoliation gang; he is the chief plunderer, by reason of his being at the head of the Ways and Means Committee, and by reason of the Mills tariff bill having been named after him. True, he says in substance, "I am a robber only for revenue. I am a plunderer for revenue only. I am a spoliator for revenue exclusively." [Laughter.] And yet he is for the Mills bill, because he says in closing his speech:

> I hope and trust that the bill which we have presented to you will receive a majority of your votes, a majority of the votes of the Senate, and become a law.

How remarkable that he can support a bill reeking with protection, reeking with robbery, reeking with plunder. The bill, in so far as it does recognize the doctrine of protection, according to the statements that he has made in this public speech, robs the people, is suicidal, is full of spoliation, plunders the laborer and the farmer; but yet, in the face of all this, he says, "I hope it will pass." This may seem like a severe conclusion, but if protection is robbery, and the Mills bill is for protection, how can the conclusion be escaped?

The next plunderer on the Committee on Ways and Means is my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN]. He is first lieutenant of the robber gang. He says in his speech, page 3592:

> Robbery of them—
>
> Meaning the people—
> under the forms of law has been perpetrated, and to-day they stand moneyless, the tax-gatherer staring them in the face, and demand relief at our hands.

Now, what does he propose to do about this robbery? Let us see how grand and magnanimous this first lieutenant of the company is. In his speech, in giving the amount of reduction on dutiable goods, he says:

> Present rate on dutiable goods, 47.10 per cent.

In other words, that is the size of the present robbery under the present robber tariff. Then he says:

> Proposed rate on dutiable goods, 40 per cent.

Meaning that the rate on dutiable goods in the Mills bill is only 40 per cent. He proposes to be generous and reduce the plundering, robbing, and fleecing just 7.10 per cent. He proposes to say to the toiling masses, the toilers on the farm, and at the forge, in the shop, "We have been robbing you on duitable goods at the rate of 47.10 per cent. We have heard your cry for relief; we will be magnanimous and relieve you to the extent of 7.10 per cent., but we must still continue to rob you to the tune of 40 per cent." [Laughter.]

Now, my friend from Tennessee is not one of these robbers for revenue exclusively, for revenue only, or only for revenue. He is one that believes in protection. I suppose that is why he can only stand a 7.10 per cent. reduction of the robbery. [Laughter.] I know many on this side of the House will be surprised to hear that he is a protectionist; but I tell you it is so. He admitted it himself. On the 28th day of April, in reply to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL], he said:

> Now, I propose we should collect, by a tariff for protection, sufficient money to carry on the Government and to protect American industries. That is what I propose. I propose nothing else.

Now, I submit that out of his own mouth he has established his right to promotion. My friend from Texas should resign, and my friend from Tennessee should be promoted to captain of the robber gang. The gentleman from Texas is a plunderer for revenue only, and the gentleman from Tennessee is more than this—he is a robber for sweet protection's sake.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I know the gentleman does not desire to misrepresent me. The remark he has just quoted was credited to me, but it was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL], and I corrected the RECORD next day.

Mr. PETERS. I took it from the RECORD. I had not noticed the correction. I understand, then, that the gentleman from Tennessee is not in favor of protecting American industries.

Mr. MCMILLIN. You will gather from my action and from my speech what I am in favor of.

Mr. PETERS. I must, then, proceed to say that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] at least should resign and allow my friend from Tennessee to assume the captaincy of the robber gang, for the gentleman from Texas declares he is only a robber for revenue; but my friend from Tennessee will not make that declaration. [Laughter.]

The second lieutenant of this spoliation combination is CLIFTON R. BRECKINRIDGE, the gentleman from Arkansas, a suave, genial, velvet-gloved, kind-hearted, courteous, and elegant bandit. [Laughter.] He has not spoken, so I can not comment on what he may say.

The orderly sergeant of this magnificently equipped combination is my old and distinguished friend, the gray man eloquent, from the classic shades which formerly resounded to the tread of "Harry of the West." Such is his magnificent command of the English language and the fervidness and fascination of his oratory that he can hold a man entranced while he is denouncing him as a rascal, a robber, and a plunderer. He is the one, however, who calls the roll, assigns the members their places in the ranks, and, by his fatherly supervision and parental use of the party birch, maintains decorum, order, and precision in the execution of the various maneuvers when the company is on dress-parade. [Laughter.] He has not yet spoken, so I spare him.

The second sergeant, or, as we might term him in military parlance, the first file-closer, is my distinguished friend, HENRY G. TURNER, from Georgia. I was sick, confined to my room when he spoke, and have not been able to get a copy of his speech; so I must pass it by without comment.

The third sergeant, or second file-closer, is my bright young friend from West Virginia, W. L. WILSON. His eloquence is "par excellence." It is of that plausible, insidious character, combining the force of reasoning with such beauty of expression that makes you regret all the while the falseness of his premises. In his speech he travels outside the beaten path. Robbery is too harsh a term and is not poetical enough; hence he says:

You have fastened your system of taxation (meaning protection) as a parasite upon that consumption which, for the wage-earner, means nine-tenths, and frequently ten-tenths of his earnings, until you have built up a tariff which is well entitled to say, "Whoever else escapes my exactions, the poor I have always with me.

Is not that elegant? No robbery declaration from him. No plundering denunciation from my learned and accomplished friend; but in a grander way—in a more Oriental style—he declares that protection is a parasite upon consumption. This parasite, according to the logic of the reasoning of my friend from Tennessee, consumes 47.10 per cent., and my friend WILSON, following in the line of his argument, proposes to extract some of its dragon teeth so that it will only consume 40 per cent. In substance, he cries out: "Oh, ye burdened masses, the parasite of protection is upon you; you are alive with it; it is sapping and mining the life out of you. My party's President is in the White House; my party controls the machinery of the House of Representatives; my party has eight of the thirteen members of the Ways and Means Committee. We will come to your relief; we can not kill the parasite, because that might lose us the coming election and the offices, but we will reduce the speed of his ponderous jaws from 47.10 per cent. to 40 per cent." [Laughter.]

The next file-closer, or fourth sergeant, is my unpretentious friend from Pennsylvania, W. L. SCOTT. A casual glance at his style of denunciation indicates that he has some trouble with that portion of the rank and file, marching in his immediate neighborhood. With his commission to the important office of file-closer, apparently, came some special instruction from the commander-in-chief at the other end of the avenue, communicated through the general commanding at this end of the avenue. Rumor has it, that some privates in the rank of the Democratic party in the House have not been keeping step; have failed to obey the command of Captain MILLS to dress up and toe the free-trade mark; have persistently refused to cast their eyes to the right across the water in the direction of British influence. Not only this, but one of the number, more daring than the rest, threw into the tent of the officers, a fire-brand named the Randall tariff bill. [Laughter.]

This and other acts of insubordination could not go unnoticed. They were called to the attention of the commander-in-chief. He began a course of discipline. He first reduced the rations of patronage to all of these malcontents. They were stiff-necked still. Then, as a further act of discipline, only rations of bread and water were ordered. This severe ordeal brought many recalcitrants to terms. A little bread they could stand, but water—never. [Great laughter.] A few of the more daring, with strong convictions, however, refused to bow the knee, even in response to this severe discipline. One of the number was then scourged with the cat-o'-nine-tails of the veto power. After all had failed, then the fourth sergeant was commanded to close up the ranks and compel obedience to the orders of his chief. The gallant namesake of the great Scott of former times, remembered who it was who cast the firebrand into the tent, but discretion, he knew, was the better part of valor, and so, with terrific, blood-curdling denunciation, in speaking of the Randall bill on May 11, he said:

From whatever point you look at it, it is a misbegotten, ill-shapen, pretentious monster, with no excuse for existence and no purpose in life but to obstruct the Democratic party and to delay the justice which the country demands.

The shock of this thunderbolt was terrific. The "beauty of the White House" fled from the galleries, and as soon as the applause on the Democratic side had subsided, the Randall bill continued its sweet repose in the room of the Committee on Ways and Means. [Laughter.]

The last file-closer is my tall and good-natured friend from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM]. His denunciation is of the combination order, combining declaration with implication, the whole being a prelude to a sort of a musical extravaganza. In his speech on the 26th of April he concentrated and combined the pillage, plunder, and robbery theory in the highest style of art. He says:

To show how American labor has been pillaged and plundered by this masked robber of protection, I have obtained, etc.

And then follow the dulcet notes of a table obtained from the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, showing our imports and exports of cotton and woolen goods for the last ten years. He then goes on to say, after a brief comment on this table of cotton and woolen exports and imports, that—

There is, however, a still more striking illustration of the effects of present duties upon American industries and American labor. We have not only burdened them—

That is, American industries and American labor—

in order to increase the production of materials where there is a deficiency in the home product, giving to European manufacturers and European labor cheaper materials to work up, but we have robbed them—

That is, American industries and American labor—

by placing a higher rate of duty upon that class of materials of which we produce a surplus, thereby giving the American producer a monopoly of the home market which he supplies at the foreign prices with the duty added, and then sells the surplus for exportation at free-trade price. Take copper ore. We have the finest quality and the largest supply of copper in the world.

His mind has become so imbued with the manner in which the masked robber of protection pillages and plunders American labor in the consumption of cotton and woolen goods, that he naturally concludes, that labor also consumes copper, and that the great copper trust of the world is robbing the horny-handed son of toil, because we have more American copper than can be consumed by Americans.

This robbery of labor in the copper business led me to examine how much the Mills bill proposed to reduce the robbery. Investigation discloses the fact that the plundering business was to be reduced from 2½ cents per pound to 2 cents per pound on certain kinds of copper ore and upon certain other kinds from 35 per cent. ad valorem to 30 per cent. ad valorem. My friend from Indiana is therefore willing, to be consistent with his great protestations in behalf of American industry and American labor, to reduce the robbery 5 mills per pound on certain copper materials and 5 per cent. ad valorem on certain other copper materials. How thankful and grateful American labor will be for this magnificent concession. How much more easily will it be for the toiling massess to stand the wear and tear upon their cotton and woolen consumption, with the robbery and plundering upon copper reduced in these magnificent proportions. [Laughter.]

This also led me to examine somewhat, the extent of the robbery that was being perpetrated in relation to woolen goods, and it has been stated by careful statisticians that, conceding the tariff on woolen goods to be a tax added to the cost of the article, it would amount to the immense and exorbitant sum of 29 cents per capita. With what tears of joy and swelling emotion the people of this country will receive the news, that the robber gang propose to reduce this enormous tax, now amounting to 29 cents per capita, to 27 cents per capita! The poor and downtrodden agriculturist, monopolist, laboring man, and all of the sixty millions of people beneath the Stars and Stripes, will thus be saved the first year, a sufficient sum of money to buy a 2-cent postage stamp. My estimates of the reduction of this wonderful robbery may be somewhat in excess of the facts, but I will give to this plundering combination, so anxious to relieve the down-trodden and distressed, the benefit of the doubt, and will therefore let the figures stand so as to save a full 2-cent postage-stamp. [Laughter.]

These illustrations are sufficient to show the absurdity of this cry of oppression and plunder and wrong and robbery from this system of protection. It is enough to make the wooden savage standing in front of a cigar store, smile out loud. [Laughter.]

This robber tariff is collected only on a portion of the articles imported from foreign countries. About $233,000,000 was imported last year upon which there was no duty. About $425,000,000 paid duties amounting to about $214,000,000. We have 60,000,000 of people, and this gives an average of $3.56 for each person; but this includes duties on a large number of articles which the farmer and laboring man does not use. The devotees of fashion who imitate the English snob, and punish the body for dear fashion's sake, rather than comfort it, who wear diamonds, and silks, and broadcloth, who smoke imported cigars and drink imported bourbon and fancy wines, who own tapestried carpets, and who adorn themselves with fine laces, kid gloves, and flashy jewelry. These are the ones who pay over $100,000,000 of this $214,000,000. Take off $60,000,000 on account of sugar and molasses and $4,000,000 on account of rice, all of which the Mills bill proposes to continue to tax, and it leaves but $50,000,000 to be divided among 60,000,000 people, or about 83 cents for each person. If, then, tariff be a tax, and adds the amount of the duty to the cost of the article, the masses of the people pay at the rate of 83 cents per annum each, to the support of this great and magnificent Government of ours. And this is the extent of the robbery over which so many crocodile tears have been poured out in high and low places. This is the pretended cause of the lachrymal exudations, that have deluged White House and Capitol.

One day's abstention by Democratic gullets, from the consumption of Democratic whisky alone, would more than cancel the annual charge. [Laughter.]

I have thus far assumed that the tariff is a tax, but by the logic of facts, this assumption is shown to be incorrect. These facts may for convenience be grouped into three classes:

First. Every article the manufacture of which has been developed under protection in the United States, can be purchased for a less price to-day, than ever before in our history.

Second. Such articles can be purchased as cheap, or cheaper, in this country, than they can be in any civilized country where protection is not the rule.

Third. Many articles sell in this country for an amount equal to, or nearly equal to, the amount of the duty charged.

The first proposition is so clearly established by an incident which occurred in a Western town and so well detailed in a Western newspaper, that I quote the article entire:

A farmer in good circumstances walked into a general store, such as are usually found in small country towns, accompanied by his son, a young man aged twenty-four years. The farmer said to the merchant, "I want to buy a set of crockery ware for my son, who is just married and about to commence housekeeing. Give me a plain white set."

The merchant promptly set out the articles, and, on being asked, stated the price, and made out the bill. The old farmer pulled out his long leather pocketbook, and taking out an old yellow paper said, "Here is the bill of crockery I bought from you in 1859, when I was first married. There are the same number of pieces; these are better than I got, and the price is less than half as much. Where did mine come from, and where are these made?

The merchant answered, "Yours came from England; these are made in this country." "Is there a duty levied on crockeryware?" said the farmer. "Oh, yes," replied the merchant, "the duty on this kind of ware is 40 per cent. of the value."

"But," said the farmer, "I have just read the President's message; here it is. He says:

"'But our present tariff laws—the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation—ought to be at once revised and amended. These laws have the primary and plain effect of raising the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties. Thus the amount of the duty measures the tax paid by those who purchase for use these imported articles.'

"And then he adds:

"'Those who buy imports pay the duty charged thereon into the public Treasury, but the great majority of our citizens who buy domestic articles of the same class pay a sum at least approximately equal to this duty to the home manufacturer.'

"This does not seem to be so as to crockeryware. The President must be mistaken in that conclusion.

"Besides that," said the farmer, "here are the bills I paid you for window-glass and paints for my house and for the one I have just built for my boy, and I find that I did not have to pay half as much now as I did in 1859, and I see there is a very heavy duty on these articles. What makes them so much cheaper, when the President says the duty is a tax?"

The merchant replied, "It does look like the President had made a mistake in that statement, don't it?"

I assert that a tariff is not a tax, unless the purchaser of the protected article pays more for it, in consequence of the duty imposed, than he would if the duty was not imposed. I need not go into detail. Every one conversant with history as well as with the contrast between prices in the past and present, admits that every article of common consumption in the country to-day, unless it be some of the products of the farm, can be obtained for a less price, than they could under the Walker tariff of 1846. Any farmer in the West who goes to the country store to-day to buy crockeryware, and who remembers what he paid for the same kind of crockeryware in 1850, will be convinced that the prices of to-day are but little in excess of half what they were in 1850.

It is safe to say that crockery ware is 37 per cent. cheaper than in 1860; that all kinds of cotton and woolen goods are 25 per cent. cheaper; that boots and shoes are 25 per cent. cheaper; that iron and steel products are 25 per cent. cheaper than they were in 1860. The fact of it is, and a careful purchase of the various articles will establish it, that not a single article the manufacture of which has been developed in the United States by protection, but what can be purchased at a less price to-day, than it ever could before in the history of the country, and it can be purchased at a less price to-day, than it could possibly have been purchased, if the manufactures of that article had not been developed in this country under the protection system.

Mr. HEARD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. PETERS. I will yield for a question only.

Mr. HEARD. I desire to ask the gentleman if any of the manufacturer's profits were to be paid for in agricultural products—if these things could be bought to-day cheaper than at the time he mentions?

Mr. PETERS. Yes, sir; and the figures will show it.

Mr. HEARD. I deny that proposition in toto.

Mr. PETERS. I repeat, the figures will show it; that less bushels of wheat, less bushels of corn, less pounds of bacon, would be needed; less days labor, and less sweat. But if you apply the other test, namely, that articles can be purchased cheaper in a country where protection is the rule, than they can be in a country where protection is not the rule, then do the facts sustain the assertion, that the tariff is not a tax, because the articles under the tariff can be purchased cheaper than they possibly could if the tariff did not exist.

A large number of articles in which the farmer is interested, which are manufactured in this country, retail cheaper in New York City to-day than they do in Liverpool, London, Paris, Berlin, or St. Petersburg. I will name some of these articles, and I defy contradiction. Among them are augurs, axes, butcher-knives, chisels, coffee-mills, drawing-knives, garden-shears, guns, hay-knives, horse-clippers, iron bolts, grass-scythes, steel shovels, sickles, spades, squares, kettles, locks, mop-sticks, fire-brick, mouse-traps, bird-cages, planes, plows, pulleys, punches, scissors, sheep-shears, sieves, springs, table knives, tongs, barrels, crosscut-saws, mill-saws, needles, pins, and I might continue the list so as to include pitchforks, rakes, harrows, wind-mills, thrashing-machines, wagons, and, in fact, almost all farm implements.

The same is true of many things which the farmer consumes. Sugar and molasses are sold almost as cheap to-day over the retail counters in our Western cities as they are sold in Liverpool or London. There is scarcely an article that goes upon the farmer's table that is not supplied and can not be purchased for less money in America, than it can in Europe, and particularly in England, which is the European representative of all that is antagonistic to protection, as has been stated time and again during this debate.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me ask the gentleman this question: While I have no desire to interrupt him, I wish to know if I understood him correctly to assert that the articles he has been enumerating are sold cheaper here than they are in Europe?

Mr. PETERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is all I wanted; I just wished to know the gentleman's position on that subject.

Mr. PETERS. I can not close my discussion of this proposition better than by quoting from a speech made by Hon. Thomas H. Dudley at the Farmers' Convention, at Chicago, last November. He said:

By our present protective tariff on the lowest grades of unbleached cotton cloths there is a duty of 2½ cents per square yard; on bleached, 3½ cents; and on colored prints, 4½ cents, with a corresponding higher rate on the higher grades of cotton goods. Will any one assert that these duties have increased the price or in any way added one cent to the cost of cotton goods in the United States? In none of these cases has the duty increased the price: on the contrary, it has not only lowered the price, but it has also forced the English manufacturer to reduce his price as well—a step he would never have taken so long as he had the monopoly of our market and could fix his own price for his commodities. This reduction did not take place until our home competition came in and forced him to put down his prices.

Now let any American farmer reflect for one moment on the extent of the use of cotton goods in his house. All the underclothing of himself and the members of his family, and often the calico dresses his wife and children wear, the sheets between which he sleeps, the ticking on his bed, and, it may be, the cloth on his table, as well as the towels and napkins he uses, and the curtains at the windows, are all manufactured from cotton, and the manufacture of these goods gives employment to thousands of American workmen, who, to a great extent, form the farmer's home market.

Something over three years ago I attended the national agricultural exhibition of France. It was held in Paris, and a grand exhibition it was, quite worthy of the great nation it represented. I spent four days at the exhibition. There were 14 or 15 acres of ground covered with farming implements, tools, machinery, etc. All the exhibitors had their price-lists upon their exhibits, and I was careful to obtain copies of them. The lowest-priced horse-rake was 250 franes, or $50 of our money. You can buy one just as good in any town in the United States for $27. The lowest-priced mower was $102 in our money, and was no better than we sell for $60, if as good. The lowest-priced reaper, without the binder, was $185; no better than ours for $110. The plows, harrows, and cultivators were 20 per cent. above the price they are selling for in the United States. There was not a hoe, fork, shovel, spade, or rake on the ground but was dearer in price and inferior in quality to ours.

The third proposition is supported by so many instances that I have time only to give the most striking as well as the most easily understood illustrations. Mr. DINGLEY, of Maine, in his admirable speech, gave a good practical illustration. He said:

I have before me two samples of cotton prints, identical in quality and character—the one made in a British, the other in an American mill. If the British manufacturer sends a square yard of his print into our markets he is required to pay a duty of 5 cents thereon—a hundred per cent. The price of the British print at retail in Manchester is 5 cents per square yard. If the fundamental theory of the President and of the gentleman from Texas, and all others who have spoken against protection, is correct, then the cost of all prints of this quality of prints in American markets is 10 cents per yard at retail, for that is the English price plus the duty. But it so happens that any one can go into any retail store in our commercial centers and buy this print at 5 cents per yard—the same as the duty.

Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, in his exhaustive speech upon the tariff, said:

Take as an illustration our steel-rail industry, and let us see if the theory of the President is correct. The first Bessemer-steel rail made in this country was in 1865. At that time there was a duty of 45 per cent. on the foreign product, which continued until January 1, 1871, when the act of Congress went into effect which imposed a specific duty of $28 a ton. In 1867 steel rails were selling in the American market for $166 a ton in currency, or $138 in gold. In 1870 the price had fallen to $106.75, when the duty of $28 was imposed. Now, if the theory of the President be correct, the imposition of the duty of $28 would have had the effect of advancing the price by the amount of such duty from $106.75 a ton to $134.75. But what in fact was the result? Under the stimulating effect of this protection the product of our steel-rail mills rose from 2,277 tons in 1867 to 2,101,-101 tons in 1887, giving investment to millions of capital and employment to thousands of laborers, while the price went down from $166 a ton in 1867 to $31.50 in March, 1888.

His second illustration was equally forcible:

Take the case of "blankets," to which the chairman alluded. A pair of 5-pound blankets were recently imported at the lowest possible cost. The statement of the cost, duty paid, is as follows:

Cost in England at wholesale	$4.45
Duty	4.25
Custom fees	.65
Total	9.35

If the theory is true, these blankets ought to sell for $9.35 a pair; but, as a matter of fact, American blankets of precisely the same weight and quality were selling at that time for $5.20.

Continuing, he said:

But a more forcible illustration, if possible, of the unsoundness of the President's theory is found in the history of a recently established industry in his own State. Previous to 1884 there was not a pound of soda-ash manufactured in the United States. We consume annually 175,000 tons in the manufacture of glass and other American products. Previous to 1884 we imported every pound of it at an average cost of $48 a ton. A duty of $5 was imposed, and the Solvay Process Company was organized at Syracuse, the only one on this hemisphere, at a cost of $1,500,000, with a capacity of 50,000 tons annually. It commenced manufacturing soda-ash in January, 1884. How has it affected the price of this commodity? Was the duty of $5 added to the $48, advancing the cost to $53 a ton? On the contrary, it fell in the American market as low as $28 a ton in three years, a saving to the people annually of $20 a ton on the entire consumption of the 175,000 tons, or $3,500,000.

I can hardly refrain from quoting a letter sent to the New York Tribune by a lady from North Carolina. It is as follows:

Editor Tribune:

SIR: I can not understand this high and low tariff that I hear the men talking so much about. The inclosed I take from a newspaper published here, which copied it from the Philadelphia Record:

"When a sewing woman slips on her thimble (taxed 25 per cent.) and threads her needle (taxed 26 per cent.) with thread (taxed 25 per cent.) and snips it off with scissors (taxed 25 per cent.) and sews a button (taxed 25 per cent.) on her husband's winter flannel shirt (taxed 68 per cent.) she is quite unconscious in her effort to get on in the world how the blessed tariff bears her down. Probably not one woman in the land ever thinks of it; but it is high time she should think of it, and make her husband, who is clothed with the right to vote, act upon it. High taxation is the blight of labor."

It does seem that we poor women are very much imposed upon to have 25, 26, and 68 per cent. put upon everything we use. It is true when we had low tariff the needles that now cost 5 cents a paper we had to pay 10 for, and the thimble that we now buy for 2 cents we got for 10 cents, and the thread that we now get for 5 cents we had to pay 10 for, and the scissors that we now get for 10 cents we had to pay 25 for, and the flannel shirt that we now pay 50 cents for we had to pay $1.25 for. There must be something done to lower the tariff or we will starve to death. Can not you do something to help us poor women? We are needing all the help we can get. Make the President and Congress take off all the tariff and let us go back to old times, "before the war" prices. We are tired of this 25 per cent. business. There is no sense in it, and you men must do better or we women will take the ballot in our own little hands and vote.

Yours truly,

JANE M. McFADDEN,
A Sewing Woman.

ASHEVILLE, N. C., February 11, 1888.

Another strong illustration is to be found in the development of the salt industry in this country. Twenty-five years ago we had but a limited supply of salt, but under the system of protection, new fields were opened, new plants established, and then the price began to fall.

I quote the prices per barrel from 1867 to 1886, as follows:

1867	$1.77	1877	$0.85
1868	1.85	1878	.85
1869	1.58	1879	1.02
1870	1.32	1880	.75
1871	1.46	1881	.85
1872	1.46	1882	.75
1873	1.37	1883	.81
1874	1.19	1884	.73
1875	1.10	1885	.70
1876	1.05	1886	.61

My friend from Michigan [Mr. SEYMOUR], in his speech on the 16th, said that salt sold now at Saginaw, in his State, at 60 cents per barrel of 280 pounds, the barrel itself costing 20 cents, the cost of the 280 pounds of salt, therefore, being 40 cents, or at the rate of 7 pounds for 1 cent.

Will some one kindly explain how it can be sold at this rate if the duty is a tax and increases the cost of the original article? The duty on salt is about 85 per cent.

This is but another illustration of the absurdity of the charge that tariff is robbery. The original cost of the salt is a mere trifle. It is the transportation from the manufacturer to the consumer that may be oppressive. It is not the tariff; but concede that the tariff does add something, did you ever hear a sensible, well-posted farmer complain of this tariff? No. Why not? Because he knows that he buys at a nominal sum from 5 to 7 pounds for a cent. He turns it into beef or pork for which he gets 3 cents per pound, or by adding 1 pound of salt to 14 pounds of butter, he is able to sell the salt again at from 25 to 35 cents per pound. [Applause.]

The charge has been made time and time again in this debate, that only a small portion of our people are benefited by a protective tariff; that only those who are engaged in manufacturing and in working in manufacturing establishments are interested in a protective tariff. What I have shown in the reduction of the prices of the articles of consumption is an answer to such a declaration, but every agriculturist and every mechanic and every laboring man has a further interest. These classes especially, must bow to the imperial decree of the law of demand and supply.

Imagine a city of 10,000 people in which all the adult males were carpenters and dependent upon their trade for a living. No carpenter from abroad could get any work in that city. So far as that city is concerned, there would be no rate of wages or pay for a carpenter. Why not? Because every carpenter would do his own work, and every man being a carpenter there would be no employment for such a mechanic in that place. There would be no demand for such labor.

These mechanics could not earn any money by following their occupations in such a city, and as a result could get no employment, no money, no credit. What matters it to them if each one lives in a fine house which he has built? It would shelter him from the storm, but his cupboard, made by his own hands, would be empty, his wife and children would be crying for bread, and as starvation came on apace, dethroning reason, he would give all he has to appease the hunger of himself and those dependent upon him. His fine house, the product of his skill, the labor of his hands, would be sacrificed to avert starvation's death. Has he no interest, then, in such a diversified system of ndustries as would give to him employment at his trade, for a fair compensation, with which he could purchase the necessaries of life?

What is true of the carpenter is true of every other mechanic. What does he care for the sum of 83 cents per annum, his proportion of the robber tariff, if he can by means of that system get employment at the rate of from $2 to $5 per day? If we were a nation of "boot-blacks" we could earn no money at our trade. If we were a nation of miners we could earn no money at mining. The supply of miners would be so great that all wages would be destroyed, and it would be a struggle with each other for a mere subsistence; a struggle, too, in which but a few could even subsist, and the rest must starve.

Whatever, therefore, diversifies our industries enlarges the demand for labor of all kinds. The policy of revenue reform, which is free trade, is to close up our manufacturing industries because, forsooth, it is claimed, we can buy these articles cheaper in the open markets of the world; to close up our coal and iron mines because we can buy coal and iron cheaper in the markets of the world, to close up our sugar and salt and lumber industries because we can then buy sugar and salt and lumber cheaper in the markets of the world. But what then becomes of the labor employed in all of these industries? The supply for labor in other avocations is even now equal to the demand. Add these millions to this oversupply and it means a destruction of wages in all manual employments. Has the farmer no interest in the diversification of industries? Every one who is not a farmer or a member of a farmer's family, is a customer of the farmer. The farmer produces the absolute necessaries of life. He does not sell these to his brother farmer. He must sell to some one who does not produce them. Why does Liverpool regulate the price of wheat in the world? Because it is the commercial center of a vast area of country, which does not produce as much wheat as it consumes. The producer pays the cost of the transportation of wheat from his field to Liverpool, and he must compete in that market with wheat from India and Russia and every other country that has a surplus.

Suppose instead of consuming only 90 per cent. of our wheat in the United States, we consumed 10 per cent. more than we produced. What would be the result? Chicago would fix the price of wheat for our country, instead of Liverpool. The farmer then would not have to pay the cost of transportation to Liverpool, but only to Chicago, which would average only half as much.

The foreign producer would not only have to meet our tariff of 20 cents on each bushel, but he would also have to pay the cost of the transportation of his wheat from India or Russia. What then does the farmer of Kansas need? He needs more customers in the United States. He wants the consumption of farm products of all kinds to exceed the production.

He does not want the ten million of customers he now has, engaged in the mines and manufacturing establishments of the country, to be thrown out of employment. If such a result was reached, then a large number would become his competitors; would add to the production and decrease the consumption of farm products. I have the honor to represent a district that contains more farmers and more farms than any other district in the United States. They are protectionists because they want more customers. It is not the tariff that troubles them. It is occasional bad crops, and a lack of consumers in the United States. They do not believe that old John Bull has any love for an American farmer. They do not believe that the English manufacturer, through the Cobden Club, is spending millions of dollars, to have free-trade established in this country, because of any love he has for the American farmer. They are anxious to diversify industry, even in Kansas, with its miles of waving grain. They want manufacturing establishments in every town. They hail the coming of these industries with joy. They know these industries will increase consumption and will bring a market nearer to their farms. They are a reading, thinking, reasoning class of farmers. There are more newspapers in my district than in any other in the United States. There are more school-houses, more churches, and more post-offices.

I will quote an article taken from one of the leading daily papers in my district, because it explains the interest of the farmer in manufacturing establishments more clearly and more succinctly than I can:

It is hardly needful to produce figures to show that the farmer prospers most when he is in the midst of a manufacturing population. But let us take the figures compiled from our last census. Classifying the States into four groups, putting into the first group those where less than 30 per cent. of their people are engaged in agriculture, in the second group all between 30 and 50 per cent., in the third between 50 and 70 per cent., and in the fourth all above 70 per cent., and we have as a result:

Engaged in agriculture.	Number States and Territories.	Acres.	Total value.	Value per acre.
Below 30 per cent	15	77,250,742	$2,985,641,197	$38.65
Between 30 and 50 per cent	13	112,321,257	3,430,915,767	30.55
Between 50 and 70 per cent	13	237,873,040	3,212,108,970	13.50
Above 70 per cent	6	108,636,796	562,430,841	5.18

Again take the same States and see in which groups the best prices are procured for their products, and we have another result, as follows:

Engaged in agriculture.	Number so engaged.	Total value farm products.	Value per capita.	Population of workers in agriculture.
				Per cent.
Less than 30 per cent	1,060,681	$404,770,779	$457	18
Between 30 and 50 per cent	1,566,875	616,850,959	394	42
Between 50 and 70 per cent	3,017,971	786,681,420	261	58

There are more than twice as many agricultural products in the fourth class as in the first, yet the crops of the 1,000,000 in the first class are worth per capita nearly three times as much as the crops of the 2,000,000 in the fourth class. Yet there are free-traders who will argue that the cheapest market in which our farmers should both buy and sell is beyond the seas.

If our farmers were surrounded with manufacturers and their attendants, a large consuming population, better prices could be obtained for every farm product. Is any one so foolish as to argue that this would make the farmer poorer? Is any one so foolish as to insist that the New England farmer would be better off if he were compelled to take what the Western farmer gets for his products?

The value of lands in manufacturing States is far higher than in those listed as agricultural States. To illustrate, take a few States:

States.	Acres in farms.	Average value per acre.	Workers in agriculture.
			Per cent.
Connecticut	2,453,541	$49.34	18
Pennsylvania	19,791,341	49.30	21
Delaware	1,090,245	33.74	33
Kansas	21,417,468	10.98	64
Kentucky	21,495,249	13.92	62
Alabama	18,855,334	4.19	77

Or take these States by counties, and it is made still clearer that it is to the interest of the farmer to have his market close to his door.

States.	Manufacturing counties.		Other counties.
	Acres.	Value per acre.	Acres.	Value per acre.
Connecticut	967,946	$71.84	1,485,595	$34.68
Pennsylvania	3,930,549	86.73	15,860,792	40.02
Delaware	253,939	73.87	836,306	21.56
Kansas	1,006,965	24.53	20,410,503	10.31
Kentucky	1,571,585	36.48	19,923,655	12.14
Alabama	481,484	6.55	18,373,850	4.13

Andrew Jackson said:

Plant your manufactories by the side of your farms and you will crown your country with blessings.

Ben Franklin said:

It is well understood that whenever a manufacture is established which employs a number of hands it raises the value of lands in the neighboring country all around it, partly by the greater demand near at hand for the produce of the lands and partly from the plenty of money drawn by the manufactures to that part of the country. It is therefore the interest of all our farmers and owners of lands to encourage our young manufactures in preference to foreign ones imported among us from distant countries.

Read now what a British official said in the House of Commons the other day. If free trade is such a grand thing for the farmers, why this condition of the British farmer? This official said—

That the prolonged depression of agriculture in England is a matter that surpasses the Irish problem in interest and danger. The loss in values for the last year is put at nearly $250,000,000, an amount equal to a reduction of one-fourth of the export trade of the country. Thousands of acres of land have gone out of cultivation, and there has been a concurrent decrease in all kinds of live-stock. Furthermore, there is a steady increase of unemployed persons who formerly earned a living as farmers, the present number being estimated at 700,000, while those who are able to find employment have to work at greatly reduced wages.

Now I want to read a few extracts from British sources to show why the Britisher is so interested in having us adopt free trade or reduce our tariffs. Hon. Alfred Morris, connected as an official with the Manchester British Union, says.

A reduction of tariffs in America will most undoubtedly lead to an augmentation of the mass of imports into the States. The effect of abolition or of reduction of the tariff respectively on the mass of imports is only a matter of degree. In either case an enormous amount of internal production in the States will be displaced. Tampering with the tariff must flood the American market with foreign manufactures, to the displacement of her labor and impoverishment of the community at large.

There is the honest truth. How do the revenue reformers like it? The utterance was not a politic one, and a word of caution became necessary, and so the London Pall Mall Gazette issued this admonition:

England free-traders would be well advised if they moderate the ecstacy of their jubilation over President Cleveland's message. Every word which they say in its favor will be used as a powerful argument against the adoption of its recommendations.

In 1884 we had up the Morrison horizontal bill, providing for a reduction of 20 per cent. After this House refused to consider that measure, the London Telegraph said:

A bill to establish in America what the English call free trade has just been defeated in the House by the narrow majority of 4. The measure was of enormous importance for English manufacturers, as it would have enabled them to export goods to the States without the crushing tariff now imposed, and its fate was watched with intense interest by Englishmen. Were it passed, it would have been worth £100,000,000 per annum to British manufactures.

Now, a few words about that bugbear, the surplus, and I must close, for my time is up.

The idea that has been croaked from the White House, and echoed by almost every Democratic throat, that we have too much revenue, is a false pretense and a fraud. Cut down the revenues now so that you will have no surplus, and how do you expect to pay the $230,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds which fall due in 1891? If the surplus is increasing at the rate of $60,000,000 per annum, it will only provide $180,000,000 to meet this obligation.

The holders of these 4½ per cent. bonds do not want them paid at maturity. They are good investments. The national banks do not want them paid, because many of them are deposited as the basis of their circulation. Wall street does not want these bonds paid, because they are a part of the speculative stock in trade of that financial parasite. These interests are anxious to see the Treasury depleted so that when 1891 rolls around, these bonds can not be paid. They first started the cry about too much surplus and it was repeated and echoed and re-echoed at this end of the line by the President and his subordinates, until hundreds of business interests trembled upon the brink of a financial panic.

Upon this condition of uncertainty and doubt, Wall street thrived, and if the President had been a partner in the scheme, he could not have more efficiently contributed his part to this unholy enhancement of the gamblers' interest; but aside from all these considerations, if we had no debt to meet in 1891, the revenues are not too great. What loyal heart can say, they are too great, while more than 20,000 old soldiers are either in the poor-houses of the country, or are supported by charity? What loyal heart can say, they are too great, while hundreds of thousands of the old soldiers who saved the country, have obligations due them from these revenues, which have not been canceled?

No; these revenues are not too great, and will not be, until all of these obligations have been discharged, not by the death of the creditor, as Democracy fondly hopes, but by such payment and recognition, as will comfort the needy, lighten the infirmities of age, and inspire that patriotism that shall summon another army in the hour of national peril. [Great applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of the present bill, two controlling questions arise at the very outset. They are, first, the necessity requiring the passage of the present bill, and, second, the effect the passage of it will have upon the business of the country. These are not to be answered by political prejudice, but from the standpoint of national interest. The necessity for such a revision of the tariff law might be established by such authorities as the messages of Presidents Arthur and Cleveland; by the recommendations of Secretaries Folger, McCulloch, Manning, and Fairchild; by the findings of the Tariff Commission of 1882, and by the declarations of both of the great political parties in their national conventions in 1884. To these opinions both parties have been committed, and ought to be estopped from further questioning the necessity of revising the present tariff law. Still, as they are but advices and opinions, we prefer to find the substantial reasons requiring action upon this bill.

These reasons arise from two causes, first, an idle surplus, and, second, the inequalities of the law. We are told that there is an enormous sum of money, reaching into the millions, constantly pouring into the Treasury vaults, that will be held there as an idle surplus. At the end of the present fiscal year this surplus will have reached the enormous sum of $140,000,000. If this is continued, in time our money, instead of flowing in the channels of business, where it is needed, will be held in uselessness as a monument to our financial folly, and as a temptation for waste and extravagance. Then one of two policies must be adopted—that of getting the surplus back into business circulation, or that of stopping its accumulation. I can think of but three ways of accomplishing the first. These are, increased appropriations, the payment of the public debt, or some plan of national improvements and defenses. Inasmuch as our appropriations are already liberal and ample, no sound policy could warrant any material increase; and unnecessary extravagance under all circumstances is inexcusable and to be condemned. It is true that an overflowing Treasury invites and produces waste and extravagance and reckless expenditures. We have but to look at the Calendar of this Congress to see the effect of our surplus in the revival of rejected claims, stale demands, and in the various schemes brought forward to extract money from the Treasury.

The maintenance of a government at best is expensive, and inasmuch as the great mass of our people are not burdened with a surplus of their own, every expenditure and the administration of every branch of our Government should be controlled by economy. If our public debt were due, or could be paid off upon any terms of fairness or equity, we might find temporary relief in unloosing our money by taking up our bonds. But believing as I do that our bondholders have been the recipients of too many favors by past Congressional legislation, I can not believe that just legislation, or statesmanship, or fairness to the people who bear the burdens of taxation will permit us to pay the enormous premiums that are being demanded. Certainly something more than the necessity of collecting an unnecessary tax is needed to justify the payment of an undue obligation at the premiums asked. Besides, if this policy were followed it could only be temporary at best. As to the system of national improvements I have heard no specific plan suggested. There are some internal improvements that tend to cheapen the transportation, and even the improvement of our Navy that might be judiciously followed. But these can be done at a very small sum as compared to the millions of surplus.

The necessity for any system of defenses against foreign countries or foreign foes has no more substance to it than the shadow of this Capitol. If we pass just laws bearing alike upon all people, exacting no tax from one class for the benefit of another, stay the possibility of one man accumulating millions from the small tributes laid upon the masses, recognize neither class, section, nor individual interests in legislation, we need have no fear of any foe, foreign or domestic. Every fireside and hearthstone will furnish muscle and courage and patriotism that will be ample protection at all times against all invasions and all countries. Then, if there can be no expenditure brought forward by sound public policy, suggested by liberal appropriations and controlled by economy, by which our money vaults may be relieved and their holdings returned to commerce, our only relief must rest in checking the accumulation of the surplus. If there can be no proper or legitimate avenue through which to return the surplus, there must be some way of keeping our money in the hands of business by decreasing our revenue to the necessities or wants of the Government when economically administered. How can this be done? Either by repealing our internal-revenue laws or by a reduction of customs duties.

If there can be found no better way of checking the surplus than by the repeal of the internal-revenue laws, I certainly prefer that plan to an unnecessary extravagance of expenditure, because I do not think the Government should collect one cent for any other purpose than the economical needs of the country. On the other hand, by extending the free-list and making such reductions as suggested in the present bill, the surplus will be reduced between seventy and eighty millions. The first method will give us cheaper whisky, beer, and tobacco. The other will give us cheaper material with which to build our houses and to furnish them, cheaper implements with which to work, and cheaper clothing for our families. Whisky and tobacco are not used by our wives and children, are not necessary to the personal comfort of the individual or the happiness of the family, and are voluntarily used as a matter of extravagance and luxury and may be voluntarily discontinued with benefit to person, business, home, and community. On the other hand, the lumber, paint, glass, bolts, hinges, and nails in our houses, the blankets and furniture in our bed-rooms, the cooking-stove, pots, kettles, and pans in the kitchen, even the tableware and our clothing—in a word, every one of the four thousand articles that bear a tariff tax—are necessary in business or to personal or home comfort, and every dollar of tax paid upon them that is not needed by the Government or collected for the wants of the Government is an inexcusable folly and a burden as wrongful and unjust as was ever legislated upon a free and intelligent people.

Again, the tax on whisky and tobacco goes to the Government, while only about one-fifth of the tariff tax reaches the Government, and the other four-fifths go to the protected industries. In the first case the tax is paid to support the Government, and in the other case it goes to the support of the protected industries. Unless, then, there is some compensation to those who help to support these industries, some returned benefit or gain, our sense of fairness, of just and equal laws, our belief that our laws should fall fairly and evenly on all alike, force us to declare for this bill against a repeal of the internal-revenue law.

This leads us to the second question. What effect will the passage of this bill have upon the country at large? Or, in other words, is a tax for protection or a tax for revenue the true and sound policy of our Government?

A protective policy indicates that there are two interests in the country—the one that receives the protection and the one that pays for it. In this free land, where self-reliance and independence are inhaled in the very air we breathe, there should be some sound reason for requiring by legislative act that those who are engaged in the hundreds of enterprises and businesses that are not protected should contribute to the support of the few who are engaged in the protected industries by paying them a royalty for their goods in the shape of a tariff. There are various reasons assigned. One says our infant industries can not be developed without protection. Another says it helps our capital to pay better wages. Another says it keeps out foreign goods that represent cheap or pauper labor of Europe. Another says it has enriched the protected industries, and thereby the manufacturing States. Another says it gives us a home market. In a word, all our prosperity, our improvements, our civilization, our inventions, and genius are the outcroppings of a protective system.

But, for the sake of argument, we may reduce all these claims to three general propositions that are claimed by our Republicans. They claim—

First. It helps capital invested in these industries that are protected to develop and increase their business;

Second. It assists the manufacturer in paying better wages; and Third. It indirectly helps everybody else by giving us a home market.

Whatever reason there may have been for aiding infant industries when our country was new and unpeopled, there certainly can be none at the present day founded on the needs capital has for protection.

We have but to read the speech recently delivered by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to satisfy us on that point. He boasted that New England, with but one-thirteenth of the population of the country, had one-eighth of the wealth; that protection had brought her $650,000,000 that she had invested in manufactories; that she has $575,000,000 in her savings-banks, or more than one-half of all in the country; and in addition to all this—has millions of capital invested in loans on property in Western cities, in Western, Southern, and trans-continental railways.

And he might have added that she has nineteen of the forty-three trust companies. This magnificent showing, it is claimed, is due to the benign influence of a protective tariff. As to just how many millions of wealth it has made for them we are not told; but may we not inquire, if it brought you millions of dollars, from whence came it? The answer must be "from the millions of other people engaged in the other avocations of life; from every person who has paid 30, 40, 50, and 60 per cent. of tariff on the goods they used." If protection has added one million or one hundred millions to their wealth, it has as certainly taken that amount from the earnings of the rest of the country.

Who are the people who have paid this? The farmers and the mechanics, the carpenters and the blacksmiths, the butchers and the bakers, the tailors and the seamstresses, the laborers and servant girls, those making agricultural implements, every person who uses the protected articles. Do they boast of their possessions by the millions? Work to them at best is hard. By the sweat of their brows they are willing to earn their living, but when they are required to work extra time to pay tariff prices for all they buy from those who already boast their millions, work indeed becomes bitter, and especially so when they see that this same money is loaned back to them at 8, 9, and 10 per cent., invested in their State, county, and city bonds, and controlling their railroads and freights.

I do not care to challenge the gentleman's boast. New England is as much to me as to himself. Her rocks and hills are as dear to me as the fields of Illinois. The murmur of the ocean upon her shores is as musical as the ripple of the Mississippi. Her Webster and Hancock and Adams are held in as much veneration as a Lincoln or a Douglas. In our prattling infancy we were taught to love the historic fields and heroes of New England. While our love and patriotism are confined to no locality or range, but to every section as one country, we would like to know why New England should be blessed at our expense and disadvantage?

Strip us of unequal laws and legislative disadvantages and put us on the footing of self-reliance and independence, and how will any of the New England States compare with Illinois? Has nature spread out the blessings of her hands more abundantly anywhere than in Illinois? Rivers and lakes second to none wash her banks. A soil in richness beyond compare, one vast garden blooming with its products, and yet you boast we are poor as compared to the manufacturing States. You boast of the millions that have been filched from us by the system of tariff and put into your enterprises and savings-banks. You boast of owning our mortgages, of buying our city and county bonds, of controlling our railroads, and yet you ask us to continue to pay the burdens of a tariff to add to your already incalculable wealth.

We are ready and willing to pay all the necessary expenses of Government, but every dollar that is collected unnecessarily or exacted of us to give to you as a favor or bounty is as unjust as if it were collected by the hand of tyranny to support an idle and haughty aristocracy.

The silent and speechless pyramids of Egypt, that for fifty centuries have been a living and visible monument to the world of the tyranny that filched and forced labor and money from the slaves and unfortunate subjects of Cheops, are but one degree removed from the effect of that policy which, to give millions of aid to one enterprise by extracting it from another, withdraws from business its capital and piles up that other monument of folly, $140,000,000 of idle surplus. Abuses in taxation and the raising of revenue have ever been a favorite way of exercising tyranny.

It has been the peculiar boast of the English-speaking people that they have ever guarded themselves from such abuses. There has been more than one John Hampden to oppose unjust taxation. Every chapter of history has furnished its Hampden. The very harrow that prepared our country for freedom and independence was England's protective policy that required the western colonies to pay a tax upon the various articles they used. And the very spirit that opposed the stamp act and the tea tax rises in the West to-day and challenges the wisdom of a protective policy that lays a 47 per cent. tax on what the West buys and thereby increases the already enormous wealth of the East.

I am not a strong believer in millionaires. It means poverty somewhere. It is too powerful. It crushes independence, enslaves labor, and sets at defiance law. If, instead of advocating a protective policy that starts the little streams from the pockets of the millions into the treasury of the millionaire, you could find some measure to reverse the current and empty his millions into the pockets of the masses, you would indeed be called blessed.

Bishop Spaulding says, in a recent article in the Forum:

A democracy where the millions own nothing and the few own millions must fall a prey to socialistic, communistic, and anarchic turbulences, and though so far there is no proper soil here for such germs to sprout in, the policy which uses all the powers of government to build nests for paupers, who like unfledged birds shall eat only when capitalists drop food into their mouths, will soon supply the lacking conditions.

But we are told if we reduce the duties, the importation of foreign goods will stop our manufactories, will throw out of employment the workmen of those industries, or reduce their wages. I will answer this by quoting from the excellent speech of the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. He says:

It will do nothing of the sort. What will we import, and what did we import when prices rose and the duties fell in 1880? We imported more of the same articles which we were importing before the prices rose. We will import more of the things we can not produce or which can be produced cheaper in other countries than at home. If we look to our table of imports in 1880, we will see that over sixty millions of the increase was of articles in the free-list and about one hundred and twenty-five millions in the dutiable list. The increase of imports free of duty will not hurt the manufacturer or the laborer.

We always import more coffee, more tea, more of everything that is required to meet the wants of the people when prices are high, because when prices are high the country is more prosperous and the people are better able to buy and pay for what they want, and the tariff is then lower and dutiable articles are more largely imported to compete for sale with the home products. In looking through our consumption statement we see that a certain line of articles are imported from year to year; then observing the periods when prices are high and the tariff low you will see that the same articles are imported in larger quantities.

Our manufacturers do not then stop. They go on with increased activity. They did not stop in 1880 when the large importation set in. It gave them renewed life; their wheels flew faster, their machinery worked more constantly, and their operatives were all employed.

The same was claimed when a bill was brought into this House to repeal the tax on quinine. In 1878 it bore a heavy duty, and there were five firms, employing five hundred men at $1.50 per diem, engaged in its manufacture, and it sold at an average of $3.50 an ounce. It was virtually a tax on health and considered a hardship on account of its universal use. The same objections were used then as now—importation of foreign goods, closed manufactories, and idle workmen. The duty was removed, and what was the result? We have, in the ten years since, twelve instead of five firms, more than twice the number of workmen, quinine selling at 50 cents instead of $3.50 an ounce, and thousands of dollars worth sold in Paris and London, the very home of the competition that was feared.

Whatever is imported has no need of protection, and whenever our goods leave our shores for foreign markets protection should cease. Go through the list and you will find a large number of the protected industries that are exporting their goods and competing with "pauper" made goods at the "pauper's" home. We find our coal is selling from England to Venezuela, our lumber shipped even to China, and our cutlery sold all over Europe. Even the Pittsburgh Gazette, which is not only a high-tariff paper, but is published at the home of the protected industries, boasts that the Pittsburgh steel works have established a number of branch houses in Europe, India, and Australia.

Wherever our goods go, wherever we are compelled to seek a market for our produce, there ought to be some exchange of trade. Commerce can not be one-sided. If we wish to sell our goods and produce to foreign countries, we must be willing to take whatever they have to exchange for them.

But, says the protectionist, if we exchange the goods and produce which we are compelled to send abroad to find a market for foreign goods, will that not lessen the consumption of our home manufactures and thereby injure our own industries and the labor they employ?

In this country labor is honorable in all our various industries, and its interest should be consulted whenever legislation may affect it. There are, according to the last census, over 17,000,000 of persons in the various industrial pursuits. Of these, 7,670,497 are employed in agriculture; 2,934,876 are domestic servants and laborers; 1,139,362 are in professional service; 1,810,256 are employed in trade and transportation; 1,214,023 are carpenters, blacksmiths, masons, butchers, bakers, tailors, seamstresses, plasterers, etc., leaving 2,623,089 persons engaged in those manufacturing industries that claim to be benefited by protection.

We would not answer that because these are in so small a minority their interest must yield to that of the majority.

We assert, first, that the price of labor is not controlled by a tariff law further than what demand is thereby made for it. No one measures the wages by the profits he makes. It makes no difference whether a man is making 10 or 100 per cent. profit, he no more pays the employé more than he is compelled to pay in the market at the place of hiring than he pays the farmer more for his wheat and pork than it commands in the market. He is not in business for that purpose and does not do business in that way. He gets his labor in the market and at the market price, the same as he does the various material and product that he uses. The hail-storms of statistics that have been showered upon the House to prove that labor is benefited by protection prove nothing of the sort.

It is no argument to compare the wages of this country with free-trade England. The difference is in advantages. The great West, that has been furnishing homes for Europe's millions furnishes a check to starving wages. Compare Germany and France, with their protection, to free-trade England if you want a true comparison, and you will find England pays much better wages. From what countries do our great flood of immigrants come—from free-trade England or the high-tariff countries? You might as well compare England with China as our country with England to establish the question of the policy of government that will better the laboring classes. But did not the gentleman from Texas prove conclusively that while the American gets much better wages for a day's work than the Englishman he turns out so much more finished work in a day that he really receives less wages on the articles made? It is simply the superiority of every branch of industry in this country over that of Europe. If the tariff could be so collected as to be paid or distributed to the workmen in whose interest it is now asked the burden might be borne with less complaint.

But does not each of these 2,600,000 workmen in protected industries bear some of the burdens of the tariff? Does he not see his earnings go in the 47 per cent. tariff on all that he buys for himself and family? And how about the other fourteen and one-half millions of other people in the various industrial pursuits from whom the tax is continually taken and to whom no benefit comes?

Are not the thousands of servant girls who work fourteen and fifteen hours a day to be allowed to complain when they see their small earnings melting away under the 47 per cent. tariff which they pay upon the dresses, and shoes, and underwear, and everything else that they buy?

The laboring man in the most humble walk of life is taxed to help capital, and if he asks for protection, who heeds his cry? Does not capital, that is so afraid of the pauper labor of Europe, without even a tinge of remorse or pity fill his place with the very labor it so much fears?

Do the thousands of seamstresses that work all day and borrow daylight from the candle to support themselves and families get protection from our Government? Do they amass fortunes, own stone fronts, buy our bonds or hold our mortgages, and yet they must pay their mite on all they buy to support capital.

Several gentlemen in their ecstacy over the innumerable blessings which they seem to think comes from a protective policy, have grown eloquent over our Western industries.

These industries manufacture agricultural implements. From the Tenth Census we find that there were, in 1880, in the State of Illinois, 220 establishments making agricultural implements. The total amount of capital invested in these manufactories was $11,306,955. They employed 7,300 persons, to whom they paid in wages $3,186,999. They paid for their lumber $1,332,201 and for their iron and steel $3,498,414. Lumber has an average duty of 16 per cent. and iron and steel an average duty of 40 per cent. At the above rate of duty the manufacturers paid on their lumber over $180,000 and on their iron and steel $1,097,000. This would make a total tariff tax of $1,277,000 paid on the lumber, iron, and steel, or more than one-third of the amount of all the wages paid by those establishments. How these industries, their employés, or those to whom their goods are sold are benefited I can not understand.

Mr. Buford, a manufacturer of Rock Island, Ill., says:

There is not one article that we make that is in the least benefited by the tariff. On the contrary almost everything that we buy is enhanced by the tariff, and of course our customers in turn have to pay more for what they buy of us. Almost every manufacturer in the West labors under this disadvantage. We ship a large amount of our products abroad where we have to compete with foreign makers.

The manager of the Deere & Co. Plow Works, at Moline, Ill., which turned out one hundred thousand plows in 1881, says—

That the cost of every implement turned out by his house is enhanced 15 to 25 per cent. by the present tariff, with no compensating benefit.

Our Western industries are establishments that make plows, cultivators, corn-planters, hay-presses, wagons, mowers, reapers, harvesters, the various agricultural implements, stoves, boilers, engines, etc. Tell me how they are protected?

Does not the lumber which they use, the iron and steel and paint, every article that enters into the manufacture of their goods, except that of brain and muscle, come to their doors loaded with a tariff duty, which they must pay? They have grown and flourished not by reason of a tariff, but in spite of it.

If they could get their material, whether you call it raw or not, free of duty could they not pay better wages, put more money into their pockets, and sell their goods cheaper to the farmer? With no protection for their business, and paying a protection on all the material they use, they have made the greatest advancement in all industries in the country. With the whole world as a competitor they have no competition. You might as well claim that the satellites of Jupiter, the changes of the moon, the ebb and flow of the tide, or even the Christian salvation are the result of protection as that the success of the agricultural-implement industry of the West is due to such a cause.

But the protectionist says, "We supply you with a home market." "Home market" is a phrase as seductive as "protective." Our 60,000,000 people are to be fed and clothed whether we have protection or not. Let us see where the farmer's market is. From the census report of 1880 the total sum of farm products was about $2,500,000,000. Of this sum $586,000,000 were sold abroad, leaving $1,914,000,000 that were consumed at home. As the 2,623,009 of persons employed in those industries that are protected are less than one-sixth of the persons engaged in all other kinds of industries and business, it is fair to suppose that only one-sixth of the home consumption was used by them. This would make $319,000,000 of home market as against $586,000,000 of foreign market. How does this furnish a home market?

Do the Western people consult the quotations of produce in New England when they are seeking a market? One gentleman spoke of how the establishment of one industry furnished a better local market for the farmer. A better market for what? Garden produce and such things that have only a local market. The great staples of the farm, her wheat and corn and oats, her pork and cattle, are not affected by local markets. The New Englander buys the Illinois and Kansas wheat for the same price that he pays for New England wheat.

The whole world is the market for these staples of the farm, and if a large amount of them are sold abroad does not that foreign market ultimately control the home market? Now, when you send the farmer abroad with his $586,000,000 of produce to sell in a foreign market why not permit him to exchange it for the goods he needs? Suppose he does, and when he has returned, after paying his freight both ways, and enters his own country, what does he find? That he must sell from one-third to one-half of his goods to pay the duty on the balance. If he be told, on inquiring why this is done, that it is to support the Government, to bear its necessary expense, you will hear no complaint. The farmers are as patriotic and respond as readily to the demands of the Government as any class of people. But when you tell him that it is not needed by the Government, that it is not collected for that purpose, but it is a tribute laid to protect and sustain those infant industries whose presidents and directors and stockholders number their possessions by the hundreds of thousands and millions, he does complain, and is justified in complaining.

From reliable statistics I find that from 1860 to 1883 the agriculturists have sold in European markets breadstuffs, provisions, and cotton to the value of $8,000,000,000. What became of this enormous sum? If the farmer will examine the tariff list he will find where a large portion of it has gone; he will find that he has paid a tariff—

And so on through the list of all the things he buys. Even the farming utensils with which he raises his crops bear their average burden of the 47 per cent. tariff, while the twine with which he binds his wheat costs him one cent a bushel for the blessings of tariff. When he commences to complain tell him the truth if you dare. Explain to him that but one-fifth of those various sums goes to the Government and the other four-fifths go to those who make the protected goods.

If he is not surprised at this, tell him further that the Government does not need all or even the fractional part that it receives, but is holding it in idleness when he and his neighbors are needing it in their business. Will he not say, "Why am I unnecessarily taxed?" You answer him, "To develop the various industries of the country." Will he not reply, "Who helped me to clear my farm, build my fences, and break up the prairie sod? I came here when it was a frontier and with but few advantages, little market, and few of the necessaries of life, and by my own industry tamed and improved this farm." Let the developments of the country rest with American energy, enterprise, and brains without being trammeled by forced development. We boast of our free schools, free speech, free institutions; and add to the freedom we now have free commerce, and our industries will develop themselves. Blessed as our country is by nature, our thousand hills stored with mineral, our forests of magnificent timber, our broad lakes and extensive rivers for transportation, with the richest soil beneath the sky, we need no other incentive to possess these riches and develop this country than the ambition and energy and enterprise of the American people.

Some of our protectionists have seen fit to lecture our Irish friends for adhering to what they style an English policy. I would say to them, it is never safe to enact laws from prejudice; but if I mistake not the references were more unfortunate than that. What is our position on this side of the House? We ask that the inequalities of law shall be remedied; that favoritism shall stop, class legislation be wiped out and all our people put on equal footing, and the race of life left to merit, energy, and ability. In this free land of ours, blessed by all the riches that a bountiful Providence could bestow, no power, country, or people can frighten us by competition in any field.

Is not this what Ireland has asked for, what she has demanded and fought for for five centuries? It is not free trade that she complains of, but free people she demands; that an Irishman and an Englishman shall stand on equal footing before the law. She asks to have the tariff of English landlords removed, to wipe out the laws that draw tribute from her people to support a favored class in England, when there is no benefit returned to them. It is home rule she demands. These are the questions that Ireland, weak, depopulated, and butchered, has fought for for five hundred years. Ireland, that has graced and adorned every branch of English history, furnished England her greatest statesmen, most brilliant orators, her poets, historians, and even her master soldier, the great Wellington, single and alone has fought England step by step; England, almost all-powerful on land and sea; England, that knew no master in the Levant; that alone could stay the imperial march of the mighty Napoleon, Ireland has fought her for five hundred years to strike down the hated high tariff of England's landlords, and to-day, with the aid of that incomparable Gladstone, bids fair to win her victory.

Do not chide the Irishman for opposing unjust and unequal laws, they are his enemy everywhere. The spirit born in him at his birth; moving in every fiber of his existence, and ceasing only at his death, is opposed to them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair intended at this point to recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING] for fifteen minutes, but does not see him in the Hall. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I would prefer that the debate should alternate, if any gentleman on the other side is ready to address the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. NUTTING] is not present on account of illness.

Mr. MILLS. Before the gentleman from Arkansas proceeds I ask that he may be allowed to speak without limit of time—a courtesy which has been accorded to all other members of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MASON. What is the request?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas may be permitted to speak without limitation as to time. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLS. This courtesy has been extended to every other member of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. MASON. I simply wanted to ask——

Mr. MCKINLEY. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] will not object.

Mr. MASON. I have not objected; I only wanted to know how long a time the gentleman from Arkansas would occupy. There are some of us who have been waiting some time for an opportunity to speak.

Mr. MILLS. We have extended every courtesy to the other side of the House in extending time and in lengthening sessions, etc., in order that everybody might be accommodated.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Arkansas should speak two hours, it would not interfere with the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. I only wanted to know whether the gentleman would have the privilege of speaking all day.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? The Chair hears none.

[MR. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas, withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, in response to the gentleman who has just taken his seat, I take the liberty of saying, in behalf of gentlemen on this floor who are the friends of the protective system, that while many of us are ready to admit that some revision of the present tariff system may be desirable, we are not willing to entrust that revision to gentlemen who avow themselves as hostile to the principle of protection. We fear the Greeks even when bearing gifts; and we can not but distrust the professions of friendship which our friends on the other side are making in favor of the principle of protection.

The national Treasury is congested. Our income is greater than our needs. This is an admitted evil, and its arrest is the burning question of the hour. How shall it be done? This is the practical problem given for our solution. The way to its speedy determination is open, easy, and certain. A dozen lines cutting down internal-revenue taxation $75,000,000 would bring instant relief. This method, or the free-list, or both, to the extent employed will work exact arithmetical results. Nothing else can or will. Reduction of imposts will enhance the evil, bringing only increased importation and increase of revenue. Men may deny this, but it is a truth proved by experience and recorded in our recent history.

To illustrate. During the three years from 1881 to 1883, inclusive, we imported 2,939,226 pounds of worsted cloth, on which we collected duties amounting to $2,456,548.03; while in the succeeding three years, under the operation of the act of 1883, which reduced the tariff on these and all woolen goods, we imported 12,966,493 pounds of worsted cloth, and collected as duties thereon during the same period, $7,367,411.65, an increase of revenue on that one item, over the three preceding years, of $4,910,863.62. And during the same period, under the tariff amendment of 1883 alluded to, the aggregate increase on all the woolens imported was $11,465,503.27. It goes without saying that if you reduce duties, by as much as they are reduced, by so much do you open the flood-gates of foreign importation, and the foreign manufacturer, ever alert and watchful for an opening to our market, pours his surplus upon us in threefold volume.

The instance cited, one of many, of the effect of a recent reduction of duties upon a single class of articles, should be instructive. In the face of such and so recent an experience touching the very pivotal point of the pending controversy, who dares to affirm, with the confidence which is born of reason and experience, that the proposed reduction in the bill before the House will diminish the aggregate customs revenue under existing law? Will the honorable chairman of the committee venture to predict with any remote degree of approximation to accuracy, how or to what extent these reductions will affect importations of the v ari ous articles enumerated?

If he should make candid reply, and I am sure he would make no other, he would doubtless admit that importations would increase. If pressed further with the question—to what probable extent?—I feel quite sure that the same candor would extort confession of absolute ignorance. Let us not forget the precise point at issue, to wit: By what method shall we relieve the Treasury of its congestion? I take the President at his word. I emphasize the evil "condition" which he condemns, and which he has made the subject of his annual message, to the exclusion of every other national interest, domestic and foreign.

Whatever we do or attempt in the premises must therefore be regarded as a means to that one great end. Will the method of reduction proposed by the Mills bill reduce the aggregate revenue now desired from the enumerated articles to the extent of such aggregate reduction? Certainly not; for there will be large increase of importation. But to what extent? Quien sabe? Nobody knows. There is an uncertain factor in the problem, indeterminable in value. We are thrown into the realm of pure conjecture. To the extent of the amount covered by the free-list as proposed, twenty-two millions, and the proposed internal-revenue reduction, twenty-four millions, the bill meets the point; but how about the thirty-odd millions of surplus remaining, and what if increased importations add as much more? For I beg to assure my friends on the other side that the ebb and flow of trade are under laws as inexorable as the law of gravity.

You can not lessen by the smallest degree the barriers to foreign importation and avoid the full measure of inflow your opening affords. If you could cut duties and at the same time hold the inflow at its present volume, you could compute arithmetical results. But the moment your artificial barrier is lessened or removed, a law, not of your making and beyond your control, comes into play, and your prophecies will fail, and the grizzly monster, the surplus, will grin mockingly in the scared faces of your successors in office.

But is this the real object its author, or authors (for its paternity is somewhat nebulous), and its promoters and friends in this country and in England have in view?

The existing surplus is only a stalking horse. It is made the pretext and occasion of a general assault all along the Democratic line upon the protective system. The President leads the charge. The distinguished gentleman from Texas, the eloquent member from Kentucky, the able and accomplished Speaker of the House, with all their Southern allies, still clinging to traditions born of a vanished system, have struck hands with the theorists and doctrinaires and importers and the disciples of Cobden on both sides of the sea, and declared unrelenting war upon the great American system of protection.

The air is resonant with furious declamation in denunciation of its enormities. Savage phrases and unsavory similes are unsparingly flung at it. It is robbery, it is fraud, it is unjust, it builds up monopolies, it defrauds the laborer of his hire, it swells the coffers of the rich, it carries desolation and misery and scatters the seeds of poverty and pauperism. The brilliant Kentucky editor, always honest in his utterances, styles it a "painted harlot." From the plains of Texas, from the wilds of Arkansas, from the recesses of Tennessee, from the savannahs of Carolina, and from the swamps of Mississippi we hear the same doleful wail over the wrongs and oppressions which the tariff inflicts upon the free, intelligent, energetic, prosperous, self-supporting, well-fed, and well-paid laboring men of the great industrious North. And when our eloquent friends on the other side tire of the rhetorical display of these imaginary evils they turn to prophecy and unfold visions of material glory and prosperity under the banner of free trade such as "eye hath not seen," nor hath entered into the imagination of any other than a free-trader to conceive.

Mr. Chairman, we have been sailing these many days on a sea of rhetorical free-trade assumption.

It has been assumed that the present tariff imposes an unjust and oppressive burden of taxation upon the people.

It has been assumed that an import duty enhances to its extent the cost to the consumer.

It has been assumed that protection does not increase wages, nor prevent their reduction.

It has been assumed that with free raw material we can compete with the low-priced labor of other countries in the markets of the world.

It has been assumed that the effect of protection has been to make the rich richer and the poor poorer.

It has been assumed that the agricultural classes are not its beneficiaries.

It has been assumed that the proposed reduction of duties would not injuriously affect the great cluster of industries concerned.

It has been assumed that the people of the country demand the changes proposed.

It has been assumed that the Mills bill will reduce income to the measure of our needs.

Now, Mr. Chairman, every one of these assumptions rests in pure assertion, has not only been unproved, but is demonstrably without foundation in fact or experience.

Who complains of burdensome taxation? Where are the petitions of the farmers, the manufacturers, and the great hosts of wage-workers in mine, and forge, and mill, and field asking relief? Whence comes this plaint? I hear the voice of Mr. MILLS and his conferees on the committee and on the floor. It is echoed from the classic shades of Harvard and Yale. The Mugwump press takes up the refrain. The Democratic press dare not break with their only possible candidate on the eve of the election. I see, too, the hand of a foreigner resident in the city of New York, a very intelligent and enthusiastic apostle of free trade. No; Mr. Chairman, no voice nor sign comes from the people in favor of this measure.

The door of the committee room swung free and on willing hinges to the representatives of free trade. It was shut to the people and their representatives. The laboring men, whose oppressions these gentlemen so bewail, vainly sought to enter their protest. The inventors and manufacturers, the creators and masters of great industries, who build cities and towns and promote great enterprises, who give remunerative employment to hundreds of thousands of men, masters of their craft and capable of wise suggestion even to the learned members of the committee who turned their backs upon them, were denied access to the secret conclave. Farmers all over the land have showered petitions upon this body praying for better protection to their products, and yet gentlemen stand here in their places day after day and assume to represent the people as excessively taxed by the tariff and clamorous for relief. We are unable to trace the complaint beyond the mouth of the free-trader.

Without intending the slightest discourtesy to any gentleman who has no doubt honestly persuaded himself of the truth of his belief, I must say the audacious effrontry of this assumption is almost sublime.

A many times millionaire stood in his place here the other day and flung opprobrious names at the advocates of protection. He styled them "Bourbons of the densest kind," whatever that may mean. He said protective duties are "artificial restraints imposed upon the natural energies of the mass of men by ignorance, rapacity, and tyranny for the benefit of the few," etc.

He spoke of "the overburdened industry of the country from excessive taxation, the proceeds of which do not pass into the Treasury, but go to the support of grasping monopolies," etc.

In view of this gentleman's business career these utterances would seem to be intensely ironical. He is a citizen of the great State of Pennsylvania. No candid student of the history of her magnificent industrial growth and development can justly deny her obligation therefor to the system the gentleman so bitterly assails.

The accumulation of his own colossal fortune was made possible only under the conditions which protection afforded, and his own case is an illustration of the possibilities open to all of like gifts and enterprise through a system which fosters, encourages, stimulates, and rewards intelligent American thrift and labor in every field of human activity.

But lest the gentleman may turn upon himself and charge himself as being a melancholy example of the disastrous effect of this "semi-civilized," "Bourbon," "ignorant," "plundering," "rapacious," "tyrannical" (I quote his phrases) policy of protection, let us see how this so-called "excessive taxation," "the proceeds of which," he says, "go to the support of grasping monopolies," affects the people of his State.

In the year 1886–'87 the average amount of deposits of savings banks in Pennsylvania was $42,219,099, by 156,722 depositors, an average to each depositor of $269.39. This vast sum represents the wage-money accumulation of the people, and this is the pernicious result of protection to the laboring people of Pennsylvania. This is not rhetoric, nor assumption, nor prophecy—it is fact.

Example is better than assumption; the facts of experience afford sound premises for wise conclusion. Gorgeous rhetoric and impassioned oratory are admirable; they have full swing in the realm of fancy and imagination. Our friends on the other side, cutting loose from the restraints of fact, revel and cavort in the airy fields of conjecture.

Here is the great State of Pennsylvania crowned with all the visible evidences of affluent prosperity. Her thriving cities and towns are thronged with busy multitudes; her agricultural products feed the houest workers at remunerative prices. Her colleges, schools, lyceums, libraries, churches, and her charitable institutions are witnesses of the intelligence and Christian civilization of her people; and her laboring classes have more than forty-two millions cash deposit in her savings institutions. But to make refutation more complete, let us take a broader illustration: In eighteen States, including Maryland, Delaware, North Carolina, and the District of Columbia, embracing in 1880 a population of 28,500,000, the aggregate amount of deposits in their savings-banks in the year 1886–'87 was $1,235,247,371, credited to 3,418,013 depositors, being an average to each depositor of $361.39.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the fruitage of the protective system. It is no fancy-drawn sketch. It is not rhetorical rot. It is the solid, proved, tangible, computable, arithmetically demonstrated object-lesson which the industrious laboring men of this country of every craft and pursuit bring to this Congress in refutation of the fallacious assumptions of the free-trade theorists. How aptly this tremendous accumulation of wage earnings, unparalleled in history and impossible in any other country or under any other system, illustrates the words of a New England poet—not Lowell:

> After all your golden dreams'
> Of golden fountains and golden streams,
> The sweat of patient labor seems
> The true Pactolian water.

Mr. Chairman, the rich, the corporations, the monopolists, the trusts do not deposit their money in the savings-banks, and I point to the financial exhibit referred to as a refutation of the assertion so stoutly affirmed by the distinguished gentleman from Texas and so often reiterated by others on that side, that protective duties benefit only the employer. And I point to it as a triumphant vindication of the protective system.

The message of the President, so much commended by the British press as being in their interest, is a very curious document. Its ostensible excuse was the surplus which the President coolly charges to the tariff side of the revenue. His argument reduced to terms is this: Here is a surplus of, say, eighty millions annually beyond the needs of the Government; to that extent taxation is excessive, therefore tariff duties are excessive. The conclusion is forced, and its motive is hostility to protection and its purpose its destruction; and so he proceeds to assail the tariff, and while professing friendly regard for imperiled industries, he recommends legislation which even his free-trade followers dare not approve. He would take nothing from the one hundred and nineteen millions of internal revenue; he would not disturb the whisky ring—that bulwark of Democracy and the mightiest organized foe of temperance in existence to-day in this country.

Oh, no! There is a sentiment abroad cherished by many good people, greatly respected and encouraged, especially by the whisky ring, that whisky is a luxury and therefore should be taxed; and so it has come to pass that Uncle Sam is set to house and protect about $300,000,000 worth of whisky for the benefit of the ring. This monstrous monopoly is entrenched in the very citadel of the Government, protected by law and the sleepless vigilance of a powerful lobby.

The Presidential scheme was utterly impracticable, without enlargement of the free-list to the point of general industrial destruction. Besides, the free-trade contingent, who had planned this raid, began to hear from the tobacco-growing districts, and the much-bepraised scheme was modified to meet the double exigency.

The President accepts the situation, and now the Mills bill is the Democratic shibboleth. Notice is posted on the doors of the White House: "No recalcitrant Democrat need apply here." [Laughter and applause.] And this is modern Democracy. Fear of Executive disapproval confronts every Representative who feels constrained to follow the dictates of his own judgment upon an economic question and to represent the interests of the constituency which elected him. The President assumes the rôle of dictator. He may and should give Congress information; he may recommend. It is not his province to dictate, even by indirection, what Congress shall do, or how any member shall vote.

We are not surprised, however, to see a distinguished Democrat who just now basks in the sunshine of Executive favor stand in his place here and proclaim that the bill which formulates the protective opinion of a brother Democrat still more distinguished than himself, but who does not bask, "is a misbegotten, ill-shapen, portentous, unjustifiable monster, with no excuse for its existence and no purpose in its life but to obstruct the Democratic party." And here all the other baskers applaud. [Laughter.] A monster entitled to such a picturesque group of descriptive adjectives would adorn the "greatest show on earth." It may be and doubtless is "portentous," but if, as the gentleman says, its "purpose in life" and its "excuse for existence" is to instruct the Democratic party, then may its existence be prolonged until its righteous purpose is fully accomplished.

Should this bill become a law, Mr. Chairman, it would paralyze every industry in my State.

The flock-masters of Vermont, after more than half a century of careful and intelligent breeding from importations of Merino sheep originally selected from the best flocks in Europe, have reached a standard of excellence in their product never yet surpassed in any country.

These sheep have been sought and purchased by breeders in every State from Maine to California. The masters of vast flocks in Australia have come for them, and to-day a cargo of them, gathered in my own county, is on the sea bound for that distant colony, while still another is on its way to the Argentine Republic.

This has become a great industry, beneficial alike to the breeders and to the wool producers, the standard of whose wool product is thus advanced and by renewals from time to time kept at a high point as to quality and quantity. Years of patient study and labor and large expenditure of money have been necessary to work out this result, which has proved of inestimable value to the people at large of this country. If wool is put on the free-list this industry ceases to exist, for let me assure the advocates of this measure that in this field, as in every other of American industry, the home market is the best, and is the great dependence of the breeder of fine sheep. When the home market is destroyed the motive for production ceases. It has been asserted here that this radical change will not seriously injure the farmers engaged in wool growing. This was especially asserted by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. RUSSELL], who, I believe, keeps a lot of fancy, long-wooled sheep, but not a great many of them at that.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. How many do you call "a great many?"

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. When I speak of "a great many" I refer to thousands.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Is there a farmer in your State who has a thousand sheep?

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. Oh, yes; many of them. And the gentleman's sheep, as I understand, are not what we call in my part of the country wool-growing sheep. They have wool, to be sure, but the gentleman says himself that he puts mutton first and wool last. The gentleman does not look like a farmer and does not talk like a farmer, nor does he talk like a sheep-raiser.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Allow me to remark that under the present tariff the wool producers of this country have all gone largely into the mutton business, and killed a great part of their sheep, as we learn from the speeches delivered in this House. Under the present tariff we are all in the mutton business.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. How many sheep has the gentleman?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. As I stated to the gentleman from Maine yesterday, it is difficult for a man to tell in the spring of the year how many sheep he has [laughter]; but I will say that from recent reports I have from 130 to 140.

A MEMBER. Is that all?

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. That is a much larger flock than the average of those in the State of Ohio for which gentlemen plead so earnestly in this House.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. The gentleman has a peculiar way of making up evidence.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. The average flocks of Ohio are somewhere between thirty and forty sheep to a wool-grower. The wool of such a flock would be worth as much as the average of hen's eggs on an Ohio farm. I will add that if all the wool of all the sheep in this country—and the flocks besides—were to be sold, they would not support the number of people who with their families are represented on the other side as being engaged in wool-growing.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. I am very sorry, Mr. Chairman, that the great body of sheep-growers in this country, who, I think, might probably compare in intelligence on this subject with my friend from Massachusetts, do not agree with him on this point. He is in a very sad minority. It is a little singular that the wool-growers of this country do not entertain any such opinions as my friend announces here. We have heard his views on this subject and his reasons for them. I am inclined to doubt altogether the accuracy of his statistics. He does not "speak by the card." He speaks a great deal from his "inner consciousness." His statistics seem to flow forth without any particular previous examination. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I wish the gentleman would speak louder, so that I could hear what he is saying.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. It is difficult, Mr. Chairman, to credit gentlemen with sincerity when they assert this. The only compensation offered is a cheaper blanket. When a farmer can buy a good suit of woolen clothes, ready-made, for $10; when under this abused system clothes and every article put to human use has been cheapened; When the farmers do not ask this change, when the manufacturers in whose interest professedly this action is proposed enter their united protest against it, when the laboring men do not ask it and do not want it, when in short nobody wants it, except the gentlemen on this floor who represent the traditions of another age and another system, the free-traders and the British manufacturers, it certainly seems passing strange that any sane man in the light of this undeniable situation can seriously claim that the destruction of a great industry, involving hundreds of millions of dollars, the property of more than a million of farmers, should be sacrificed at a blow upon a mere conjecture that if this is done he will get his clothes at less cost, and the manufacturer can export clothes to England and Germany in competition with the low-priced labor in those countries.

Those gentlemen who refuse to listen to the advice of the manufacturer and would open to him the markets of the world, are wise only in their own conceit.

Says Mr. Phillips, jr., a large woolen manufacturer of Massachusetts, opposed to free wool, "The world's market is the great free-trade shadow-dance." And the whole case is tersely stated in the quotation from the Commercial Bulletin, of Boston, January 14, 1888, which I find in the views of the minority:

> In brief, with the removal of all duties on wool, * * * we should not gain a cent's worth of foreign trade, for the other woolen-using countries, France, England, and Germany, could still undersell us in foreign markets with the help of their cheap labor. We should lose the fine-wool industry, which would be transferred to South America and Australia, and we should also lose cheap mutton.

My friends from Massachusetts does not deal in cheap mutton, I believe. He sellss his mutton, I understand, at Young's Hotel, Boston.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to have read a telegram which I have just received?

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. It can be read after I close.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I am much obliged to the gentleman. After he closes I will have it read.

Mr. STEWART, of Vermont. If the ratio of increase of sheep in the United States prior to 1883, which was arrested by the reduction of the duty on wool in that year had continued, the number of sheep in 1887 should have been 64,000,000, but it steadily declined to 45,000,000—a loss of about 6,000,000 in two years. In 1883 50,000,000 of sheep yielded 300,000,000 pounds of wool and 12,000,000 carcasses for food, and the total annual production was estimated at $120,000,000. The national organization of wool-growers represents 400,000 farmers. Their vast investment in this interest was made under the promise of protection. Will you, gentleman of the South, deny to the wool-grower what you gave to the rice-planter and the sugar-planter of your own region? Are sugar and rice less daily necessaries of the poor than the clothes he wears? Food is first in the list of necessaries.

By a new classification you increase the duty on rice, you maintain the duty on sugar, which increases the cost of every meal to every family in this country, and you deal your free-trade blows at every Northern industry. You come to the rescue of the Southern tobacco-grower. Coal and iron ore are dear to some of your Southern confreres, who will not sud port your bill if it slights their interests. So you say coal and ore are not raw material; but, coming a little farther North, you say wool and salt and lumber are raw material.

You also class as raw material marble, which my State largely produces, and of which there are rich deposits in Georgia, Tennessee, and many other States of this Union, still undeveloped or partially developed. Northern enterprise has recently gone into Georgia and is opening quarries there. I saw a representative here the other day trying to get access to some member of this Committee on Ways and Means, to represent the injury which this proposed measure would do to these interests, which Northern capital is now endeavoring to develop so greatly to the benefit of the Southern people. You say that marble is raw material, although it costs more than twice the labor to cut a block of marble and put it into the mill that it does to saw it into slabs and fit for market; but then, gentlemen of the committee, how could you know this fact when you would not hear ex-Governor Proctor, of my State, who stands at the head of the interest in this country, and who has visited the quarries of Italy and carefully studied the whole problem? Nor could I appear before you and represent the case of my constituents. Your inner consciousness could evolve raw material; so down goes marble on the free-list. Millions are invested in its production. Thriving towns and thrifty peoples cluster about its scenes of operation. It pays wages averaging $1.75 per diem. For similar labor in Italy wages average from 20 to 75 cents per day, the latter sum for skilled labor. It employs more than twenty thousand men. The value of machinery used in quarrying marble alone is estimated at $1,200,000, and the aggregate value of the product was in 1883 over $31,000,000.

As for everything else, ours is the best market for marble.

The competition, however, is in the higher grade of marble, so that if it is put on the free-list production of high-grade marble will practically cease, and the price of the lower-grade marble, which is that in general use, will increase because of limited production.

So also wood-pulp is classed as raw material. Here is another great modern industry created by protection. Mills have been erected, expensive machinery invented and manufactured, employment furnished to many thousands of laborers, and paper is cheaper than ever before. It is the same story so oft repeated in this country. Every protected industry ultimately cheapens the product.

Nor does the Northern farmer, whose lot is cast along the Canadian border, escape your attention. On the Canadian side of the line land is cheaper, houses are poorer, the scale of living is much lower, and the rate of wages correspondingly lower. It is only because of our higher wages that the constant flow of emigration sets to our side from Canada, of which they make such complaint, and yet you propose to reduce our border farmers to the level of the Canadian standard by placing a considerable list of products common to both countries upon the free schedule. Is this fair and just? Is it wise or expedient?

A protective tariff which guards American labor, which holds the duty squarely to the point of difference between our labor and that of any and all foreign countries, which maintains the principle that we should give preference to the employment of our own people, which encourages industry in all diversified forms, has proved beneficent in every period of American history when on trial. It is a system, and must be judged as such by its general scope and effects. It was not conceived in any class interest, and while its friends must admit that absolute justice in the adjustment of all details is a work of great difficulty, yet, if upon the whole, it is so framed as to secure and advance the great general interests of the country and the people, it should deserve the support and commendation of the people. Under this system the great interests, farming and manufacturing, of employers and employed are interdependent and mutually helpful.

The conflicts between labor and capital, which have been referred to in this debate, are not the result of starvation wages, nor even in many, perhaps a majority of cases, of low wages. They are born of a quickened intelligence and a clearer understanding of the just law of right which should govern the economic relations of men everywhere. The early methods may be clumsy and often faulty, as I think they have been, but these conflicts are the visible signs of life, and the steps and instrumentalities of better adjustments. They are signs of life. Organization, debate, the platform, and the newspaper will enlist attention, excite interest, induce reflection, and wise action will follow considerate deliberation. If only our Southern friends will forbear to throttle the laborer by giving his employment to other people, or by cutting his wages to their beggarly standard, he will be—as the Labor delegates who vainly sought a hearing before the committee said—abundantly able to take care of himself and to secure his just share of the employer's profit, whether under the tariff or otherwise. Our Southern friends, who have arrayed themselves in very nearly solid phalanx against Northern industry and enterprise, need not concern themselves about the unrest of the laboring classes in the North. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FORAN], who is well entitled to represent that class of Northern men, has voiced their sentiments on this floor far more truly than any gentleman on that side of the House, as the next report from the ballot-boxes of this country will show.

The laborer is coming to know his power, and that his power to command the service of capital increases each succeeding year. He is learning that there is no necessary conflict between labor and capital. Mr. Atkinson reports that between 1830 and 1884 the amount of cotton cloth made by an operative increased sevenfold, the wages of the operative rose from $164 in gold to $290, and the profit on each yard of cloth decreased sixfold.

Wages increase while profits diminish. It seems a paradox, but it is fact. The association of capital in industries which superficial thinkers count an evil enables capital to utilize on a grand scale the accumulated results of past labor, and so, while the profit on the single pound or yard diminishes, the aggregate profit of the vastly increased business insures to the employed advanced wages.

So capital and labor are both working consciously or unconsciously in line with a beneficent law of equalization. This law can have its perfect work only in our favored land under a tried system which secures diversity of remunerative employment; which gives, as is proved, the wage-earner an ever increasing interest in the earnings of capital; which stimulates labor-saving invention; which encourages every form of industry; which guards our laborers against the evils of unrestricted competition with impoverished foreign labor, and which insures to our country that pre-eminence in growth and substantial prosperity which challenges the admiration of the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole will rise in order that the House may receive a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. ROGERS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the tariff bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 90) for the relief of William Clift;

A bill (S. 94) for the relief of Perez Dickinson, surviving partner of the late firm of Cowan & Dickinson;

A bill (S. 97) for the relief of J. L. Cain and others;

A bill (S. 517) for the relief of J. Henry Rives;

A bill (S. 566) making an appropriation for a final survey and estimates for and the commencement of the construction of a boat-railway around the obstructions to navigation at The Dalles and Celilo Falls, in the Columbia River;

A bill (S. 661) for the relief of Charles Murphy;

A bill (S. 961) for the presentation of badges to the officers and men of the Greely relief expedition;

A bill (S. 975) for the relief of H. A. Myers;

A bill (S. 1078) for the relief of Florida Kennerly;

A bill (S. 1171) for the relief of the legal representatives of George McDougall, deceased;
A bill (S. 1177) for the erection of a public building at Fortress Monroe;
A bill (S. 1242) for the relief of the legal representatives of Maj. William Kendall;
A bill (S. 1323) to authorize the President to confer brevet rank on officers of the United States Army for gallant services in Indian campaigns;
A bill (S. 1554) to increase the appropriation for the erection of the public building at Sacramento, Cal.;
A bill (S. 1599) correcting the military record of James O'Rourke;
A bill (S. 1625) to amend section 7 of the act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to the immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880;
A bill (S. 1782) to authorize the leasing of the school and university lands in the Territory of Wyoming, and for other purposes;
A bill (S. 1871) to perfect the military record of Warren C. Alden;
A bill (S. 1882) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River, at or near Clinton, Iowa;
A bill (S. 1883) to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Mississippi River at or near Muscatine, Iowa;
A bill (S. 1903) granting the right of way through the Fort Riley military reservation, Kansas, to the Chicago, Kansas and Western Railway Company;
A bill (S. 1969) granting right of way to the Junction City and Fort Riley Street Railway Company into and upon the Fort Riley military reservation in the State of Kansas, and for other purposes;
A bill (S. 2030) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, at Forest City, Dak., by the Forest City and Watertown Railway Company;
A bill (S. 2116) to provide aid for State homes for the support of disabled soldiers and sailors of the United States;
A bill (S. 2377) providing for the issue gratuitously of certain meteorological instruments to voluntary observers at present recognized in the Signal Service;
A bill (S. 2393) to fix the compensation of inspectors of hulls and boilers in certain districts of the United States;
A bill (S. 2410) for the relief of L. A. Davis;
A bill (S. 2411) for the relief of C. A. Williams and others;
A bill (S. 2446) granting an increase of pension in certain cases therein mentioned; and
A bill (S. 2519) to make enlisted men of the Signal Corps responsible for public property.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 2528) authorizing the construction of a railroad bridge across the Red River of the North by the North Dakota and Pacific Railway Company;
A bill (H. R. 3290) to amend section 685 of the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia;
A bill (H. R. 4601) to amend the naval record of Nickolas Leuschen, Peter Leuschen, and Loth Possum; and
A bill (H. R. 6800) for the relief of John Powers.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 7052) relating to postal crimes and amendatory of the statutes therein mentioned, requested a conference with the House on said bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. SAWYER, and Mr. WILSON, of Maryland, the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9711) making appropriations to enable the several Executive Departments of the Government and the Bureau of Agriculture and the Smithsonian Institution, including the National Museum and the Commission of Fish and Fisheries, to participate in the centennial exposition of the Ohio Valley and Central States, to be held at Cincinnati, Ohio, from July 4 to October 7, 1888.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2216) for the relief of Thomas A. Osborn.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 484) for the relief of Thomas C. Dickey;
A bill (H. R. 1640) changing the name of the port of Lamberton, in the district of Burlington, N. J., to the name of Trenton, in said district;
A bill (H. R. 2365) for the relief of William P. Thorne; and A bill (H. R. 6887) for the relief of Henry Brock.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. FISHER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; which were signed by the Speaker:

A bill (S. 38) granting to the Washington and Idaho Railroad Company the right of way through the Coeur d'Alene Indian reservation;
A bill (S. 39) to grant an increase of pension to Frederick Beno;
A bill (S. 269) to grant the Fort Smith and El Paso Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes;
A bill (S. 326) for the relief of Edward Fitzgerald;
A bill (S. 331) granting a pension to John Kalbfleisch;
A bill (S. 347) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Youngstown, Ohio;
A bill (S. 354) to provide for the survey of certain historic grounds, locations, and military works;
A bill (S. 475) for the relief of the estate of Thomas L. Price, deceased;
A bill (S. 801) for the relief of Basile Champagne;
A bill (S. 805) granting a pension to Melvina Greenwood;
A bill (S. 816) granting a pension to Amastasia Walter;
A bill (S. 820) granting a pension to David A. Servis;
A bill (S. 835) for the relief of Elisha Griswold;
A bill (S. 850) granting certain lands in the Territory of Wyoming for public purposes;
A bill (S. 860) granting a pension to Stephen Singleton;
A bill (S. 1096) granting a pension to James Lucas;
A bill (S. 1204) to provide for holding the circuit and district courts of the United States at Martinsburgh, in the district of West Virginia;
A bill (S. 1237) granting a pension to Anna Mertz;
A bill (S. 1717) granting a pension to Emma Von Bernewitz;
A bill (S. 1795) for the relief of the First National Bank of Marion, Iowa;
A bill (S. 2419) granting a pension to Lemuel R. Rea;
A bill (H. R. 1275) for the erection of a public building at Columbus, Ga., and appropriating money therefor;
A bill (H. R. 1645) to limit the hours that letter-carriers in cities shall be employed per day;
A bill (H. R. 2928) granting a pension to William Lemons; and
A bill (H. R. 4358) to increase the limit of cost for the public building in course of erection at Charleston, S. C.

SESSIONS OF COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House a request, which the Clerk will read, from the Committee on Agriculture:

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Agriculture asks leave to sit during the sessions of the House for the transaction of important business.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] asks unanimous consent that the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting an estimate from the United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, instead of the Committee on Claims, the latter reference having been made on the 16th instant. The change of reference will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

TARIFF.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union resumed its session, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to take part in the general debate upon the tariff. I intended to reserve what thoughts were pertinent to its details when it came up for amendment in the committee. But for certain references of a personal nature to myself I would have refrained.

For my own choice I have in charge the Census and Apportionment, matters which are of more importance, and I may say dignity, than any mere temporizing with our fiscal or economic system. The reports of the census form the basis not only of all argumentation, but of all just legislation in connection with our finances and economies; and therefore my time and strength have been devoted to laying the foundation of those returns because they are authentic, and have reference to our entire country. Properly to deduce conclusions on these topics, our lawmakers should build upon these foundations. In the long and exhaustive debates which have occurred during the past few weeks, members have not been loth to draw upon the census of 1880, which for completeness and pertinency has no comparison with any former census, or the census of any other land. According to reliable estimates the next census of the United States will show 64,500,000 inhabitants. It will reveal an immense increase over former decennial periods, certainly much greater than that between 1860 and 1870, when it was only 22½ per cent.

TARIFF A BUSINESS QUESTION.

As I remarked on the first day of this session, in response to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], the regulation of our system of taxation, whether internal or by customs duty, is a matter of business. It is not a fit subject for mere party discussion, much less for personal recrimination. It does not depend upon the platforms of parties nor the utterances of our statesmen so much as on sound business judgment, based on facts collected with careful heed by the officers of the Government.

The member who approaches the subject of the tariff with a view to making party capital will have more or less of bias, and can not reach conclusions satisfactory to the general interest.

BUSINESS: LABOR, CAPITAL, AND LAND.

What is business? It is the adaptation of means to an end, the employment of three factors for the general and individual welfare of the people. These factors are labor, capital, and land. Legislation that shackles in any way these wealth-producing forces is, in its very nature, tyrannical and unjust, because it is the result of discriminations and combinations in which the interests of the people suffer.

Of these factors, the first to be reckoned is capital. We do not lack capital. But it may well be considered whether capital, in later years, has had equitable and contented distribution, and how far our taxing system has contributed to this end.

As to the land, have we not a larger territory than any European state except Russia? We have one and a half million square miles of arable land, scarcely one-quarter of which is in cultivation. Three hundred and twelve thousand five hundred square miles produce all our grain, hay, cotton, sugar, rice, and garden vegetables. We are enlarging our proportion of cultivable and pasture lands rapidly, not only by our natural growth, but by immigration. Our mines of gold, silver, copper, and coal are only the auxiliaries of our boundless and varied acreage. It must, indeed, be a comprehensive system, depending upon a wise adjustment, that would deal with a so richly-endowed landed inheritance.

In spite of certain sorts of monopoly which are fixing themselves upon our land in the shape of cattle kings, railroad grants, and absentee landlordism, we are comparatively free from the feudality, primogenitive succession, and other aristocratic and exclusive privileges of older countries.

ENLARGED MARKET INDISPENSABLE.

With such an outgrowth as we obtained in the last century are we not rapidly becoming dependent upon a market beyond the limitation of our tariff laws? In fact, is not restriction to the home market a barrier against the supply to and the demand of other nations? Why should this flood of good things be dammed against passage to other countries with whom we might exchange? Why should it be flung back upon us to destroy and be destroyed?

These are questions which press upon every farmer in the land, and upon every manufacturer who has not the fortune to be combined in a "trust."

ENLARGED MARKET FOR OUR CRUDE MATERIALS.

Our crude products form the bulk of our exports, but should we not be warned by the increasing land products of other countries—Russia and India and South America—that any restrictions against foreign trade becomes a self-imposed restriction upon our own.

SURPLUS, THE PRESSING QUESTION.

The Ways and Means Committee have responded to the urgent message of the President with as much wisdom as is possible under the circumstances of our industrial system. All the philippics hurled at the President return upon his revilers. What he said in his pointed and emphatic message was imperatively demanded because of the extortions which filled the Treasury. The wrong that he exposed was multiplying, in his judgment, into a brood of wrongs. The Treasury had become a hoarding-place for money needlessly drawn from the people. Its withdrawal from the people was bad then, in December, 1887; it is worse now. It menaces industry and business. It invites public scandal. It stimulates public plunder.

One of our Ohio Democratic statesmen, Governor William Allen, used to say that it was "as hard to run a powder-house in hell as an honest government with a plethoric treasury." [Applause and laughter.]

RELIEF.

Where is the relief? Five ways are proposed:

1. To keep on hoarding? This is not only a continuance but an aggravation of the peril.

2. To spend? This is the remedy of my friend from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], who points out many good and many wild schemes and largesses for a spendthrift Congress. To this I am opposed.

3. To pay the public debt? This is being tried with the undue bonds; but with what result? The last purchases which have so much enhanced those bonds show. The President warned us of this remedy as inviting the payment by the Government of an increased premium; and the facts already more than justify his apprehension.

4. To deposit the money in banks for use by the people? Against this, too, he warned, and wisely so. I never will consent to foster "any fateful alliance between the banks and the Treasury," or any "reliance in private business upon public funds." It is of the very essence of Jacksonian principle to divorce the Federal fisc from private enterprise.

5. To substitute for the 4 per cent. bonds due in 1907 a bond bearing less interest, say 2½ per cent., and pay to the holders money equal to the present value of the difference in interest, or rather to exchange bonds at a fixed premium? It is a safe investment for a man or a government to invest in his or its own notes or bonds. Perhaps this plan is the best next after reducing taxation.

6. The last proposition is the one before us. It is the reduction of taxation, internal or otherwise.

REDUCTION OF TAXATION.

Who can be harmed by the reduction of a burden? It may be a necessary burden, in so far as it pays for our security under government; but still is it not a burden? Its relief should be sought, and it should be consistent with the only proper object—revenue, not for hoarding or extravagance, but for economical expenses.

I do not design to argue at length the nature of this burden. I am now, as ever, convinced that such a tariff as we have not only brings about serious conflicts between labor and capital but is responsible for the high prices of manufactured goods; that it depresses the labor market; and that it fosters trusts and combinations. In fact, every tariff from 1789 down to the present time, in so far as it was protective, injured both farmer and laborer by making farming less profitable in order to make the cost of labor to the factory cheaper.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

In remarking upon the tariff in 1882 I was very frank to contend that I would forego the opposition which I made to the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] for the abolishment of the excise system. I was willing then to forego that opposition on the basis of a resolution which I offered in the House, and which is there quoted. But I desired to abolish the internal-revenue system only as a system or mode of collection, not as to the taxation of certain articles. I was willing to see the tax collected by the States. I think now, as I said then, that it would have worked like a charm. The protectionists were not, however, in favor of reducing taxation in the tariff, but they were in favor of a hasty riddance of the whole internal-revenue system and its Federal mode of collection. I regarded the tariff which we sought to revise as a monument of war necessity and of subsequent treachery. It was promised that it would be reformed after the war when the internal taxes were reduced on home manufactures.

I then inveighed against the Federal administration of the internal-revenue law and favored its abolition, because of its cumbrous, corrupt, and spying system. Its officers were then in the habit of pursuing the offender into cigar and tobacco shops, and into stills, breweries and factories with threats and promises, in order to influence the voter in favor of the administration. Thanks to Democratic economy, that army of five thousand has since been many times decimated. Worse than the janizary or the mameluke, it undertook by its occult machinery to intimidate and defraud; and I was willing to do away with it in the Federal system, as every speck of it on our body-politic was then a cancer.

There has been no time since the discussion of the tariff of 1861 when economic measures were before Congress that I have not protested against their excesses, and given the reason, which has been verified; and that is that the excesses would engender a surplus, which was corrupting to legislation and administration. At all times I have been willing to cut down the taxation to avoid this peril. I was willing to welcome relief from this surplus. And since we could not tear away the octopus which was preying upon the people in the indirect form of taxation, I was even willing to take the direct form and thrust it one side; and the more so because it was in the hands of the Republican party, which was using its emissaries and officers for espionage not only in New York City, but elsewhere, for sustaining their corrupt practices and perpetuating their supremacy.

But, sir, this bill is before us. It concerns more a surplus than it does a tariff reform. The surplus is now the principal object with me; the tax but the incident. If I can not apply the reduction at one point, I will hereafter to another. But for the present I believe that the committee that reports this bill, considering all the varied industries of this country, have done the best that was perhaps possible with a view to the successful accomplishment of the great object—the reduction of taxation—so as to avert future accumulations and avoid the paralysis of business.

THE BILL NOT A RADICAL MEASURE.

Why, at best, this bill proposes very little. The wonder is that so much noise has been made because of what it does propose. In round numbers it takes off but about $78,000,000—$54,000,000 from the tariff, and $24,000,000 from internal taxes. It adds to the free-list some articles of necessity, so as to reduce the cost of their manufacture and that of the commodity itself.

The present average of the tariff on dutiable goods is 47.10 per cent. This bill, if passed, would leave it 40 per cent., and is not the latter still an enormous burden on production?

NOT A FREE-TRADE MEASURE.

Call this bill a free-trade measure! Why, it leaves the average duty higher by 10 per cent. than it was under the law of 1862, which was a thorough war measure. Before the recommendation of the Tariff Commission it should hide its head, for that commission recommended 20 per cent. reduction, which would have left the average less than will be left if this bill becomes a law

If this bill be not passed and the matter is committed to the discussions of the forum, where the people can hear homely and plain discussion, no one can tell the result when next it comes before a renovated Congress. [Applause.]

OPPORTUNITIES AND ARTICLES TO REVISE.

There are various articles from which a revenue could be wholly or partially dispensed that would benefit the whole community, and with the least injury to our manufacturing interests on the protection theory.

The amount collected from these for the year ending June 30, 1887, are as follows:

Sugar	$50,000,000
Tobacco	30,000,000
Alcohol used in the arts	12,000,000
Tin-plates	5,700,000
Low-grade wools	5,000,000
Chemicals, etc	4,000,000
Flax, unmanufactured	2,400,000
Lumber	1,000,000
Salt	700,000
Coal and coke	600,000
Iron ores	700,000
Clays	85 000

I should have been very willing, were there no other alternative, of taking off from this list the revenue proportionably, or almost in any way, to prevent the menacing accumulations in the Treasury. From any of these articles, especially sugar, tobacco, lumber, wool, coal, and salt, which are used by the masses more than almost any other, I would, in an emergent condition of our business, be willing to make reductions. Salt is a necessity for our dairymen, and is used largely by our meat and fish packers. Sugar is as necessary to a family as bread. Coal is indispensable to our homes and factories. Lumber should be free for building purposes, and we should as a sanitary and economic measure save our forests. Chemicals should be free—as free as the raw material of our woolen fabrics. Besides, the relief of chemicals would benefit our soap and other manufacturers. And alcohol should be free, when used in the arts and manufactures. Relief here would be a boon to many of our lesser industries. A great relief would be given also in the matter of clothing; because at least 50 per cent. more for clothing and blankets is paid in this country than in other countries.

Here, too, are the percentages of taxation on several articles which are necessaries, and from which some selections for relief might be made:

	Per cent.
Tax on sugar	80
Tax on rice	112
Tax on salt	83
Tax on corn-starch	93
Tax on potatoes	45
Tax on woolen dress goods costing 22 cents a yard	71
Tax on common cloth	91
Tax on woolen hosiery	70
Tax on flannels	72
Tax on common woolen shawls	87
Tax on cotton hosiery	45
Tax on cotton bagging	54
Tax on plain earthenware	55
Tax on window-glass	86
Tax on plate-glass	147
Tax on steel rails	80

Doubtless, in the finality of this bill, when it comes to a conference, considerations of this nature may be paramount; but for the present, whether this bill is amended or not to suit my views or those of my constituency, I will give my vote, heart, and mind to its passage.

MAXIMS OF TAXATION.

Writers on political economy have laid down for the accomplishment of taxation maxims which are almost classical. These are developed by John Stuart Mill, in his Fifth Book and second chapter, to be:

First. That the subjects of every State ought to contribute to the support of the Government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities. Otherwise it is inequality.

Second. Adjust the time and manner of the payment, and the amount of the tax with certainty, so that the tax-gatherer should not become insolent or corrupt.

Third. The convenience of the tax-payer.

On this head is reckoned taxation paid by the consumer of an article, little by little, as he has occasion to buy the goods. He should be at liberty either to buy or not to buy, as he pleases. In this he pictures our own tariff system.

And fourth—which is more to our purpose in this discussion—that every tax ought to be so contrived as to take out and to keep out of the pockets of the people as little as possible over and above what is needed for the Treasury.

Under this head is discussed the diversion of a portion of the labor and capital of the community from a more to a less productive employment; and in this, too, he speaks appropriately as to our own system.

But above all there should be equality as the rule in taxation as in all other affairs of government. [Applause.] The sacrifices which taxation requires should be made to bear as nearly as possible with the same relative pressure upon each and all. It is equality of sacrifice. It means the apportionment of the contribution of each person toward the expenses of the Government. This standard is one of perfection. It can not be completely realized, but it is necessary in discussion to know what perfection is. In other words, if we can not in a debate of this kind find out the absolute truth and the perfect theory, we can do as the mariner does at sea when he loses his compass or his reckoning—he can sail by a star, if he can not sail into a star. [Applause.]

These maxims, Mr. Chairman, may seem abstract. They may be placed within the category of doctrine; but I hold now, as I have ever held here, that there can be no wise, practical legislation unless we deduce it from, or find it crystallized in, correct theory. The sneer against scholastics and doctrinaires comes from ignorance of the philosophy of economy and legislation.

The same law of induction by which Lord Bacon, after experiment, generalized, applies as well to political as to physical science. It has been said that Lord Bacon in his Novum Organum, made possible the discovery of the circulation of the blood, the steam-engine, electric motors, and all those forms and forces of invention which have changed the industries of the world, and given to civilization its advancement. It is only when the fixed laws are violated that man retrogrades, or if he does not retrograde, that he simply marks time, and does not march.

It is not worth while, Mr. Chairman, for me to go over the platitudes connected with the debates on protection. I have labored in that line since I first entered Congress.

CONSISTENT OPPOSITION.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] the other day referred to the tariff known as the "Morrill tariff bill," as though that distinguished gentleman [Mr. MORRILL] had not produced many bills, any one of which might well bear his name. In referring to the bill of 1861 the gentleman from Ohio remarked that I was not here to vote against it, although I was one of the two members now in this Congress (Judge HOLMAN being the other) who were then members of this House. I wondered at the statement at the time, for I thought that I had never missed an opportunity of vindicating the liberalities of trade against the demands and exactions of class legislation. But I find in my remarks made in 1884 in this House that I said:

> On the 25th of February, 1861, I came into this House from a sick bed to protest against the tariff bill then pending. I denounced it as a great fiscal tyranny, a mountainous burden on the West. While favoring a revenue tariff to meet our then small expenditures, I opposed all bounties, special advantages, and class legislation. I showed that the bill as then designed raised bounties from the consumers of the West and South, to be paid to the iron-masters of Pennsylvania and the manufacturers of New England.

I have none of the vanity of consistency [laughter], but I will not be charged with inconsistency when I repeat further that in August, 1864, when another Morrill bill came up, I said "that the West could take care of itself"—for I then represented in part the State of Ohio, now so well represented by my friend [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] who honors me by his close proximity and attention—that "it is rich by nature in its resources; and if the people of Pennsylvania can not live by working their forges, with their own natural resources, and if the people of New England can not live by working their spindles, with their natural ingenuity, without the aid of other classes of industry and the bounty of the Government, let them move to the West, and there the God of Nature will protect them in the cultivation of the soil, if they have the industry to work and the frugality to save."

Indeed, sir, before 1861, in some remarks which I made on an appropriation bill, I vindicated the same idea. My record on this topic has not changed. It is as clear as a "fountain in July, when we see each grain of gravel."

PRACTICAL MODE TO ASCERTAIN BOUNTIES.

But the speech to which I made reference especially when I interrupted the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] was that made in 1864. I said it was the most elaborate speech I had ever made upon the subject, amid a score of speeches. It was necessarily more or less elaborate and exhaustive, because at that time there was a depreciation of American paper, as compared with American gold, of 60 per cent., and that was of course added to the cost of the article bought abroad. Moreover, in all commercial transactions between two foreign countries the basis of exchange must be specie, as the currency of the countries is reduced to par values. So that then, when a man brought a hundred dollars' worth of goods into this country he had to sell them at that time for $174 of our currency, with freight and duties superadded. That amount I ascertained by taking the cost of American gold as compared with English gold.

This state of things no longer exists. Nevertheless, by the same mode of demonstration you can find out precisely the moneyed element that enters into this tariff tax and the proportion which never goes into the Treasury of the United States. The elements of cost upon merchandise imported from foreign countries are, first, cost abroad; second, the difference of exchange; third, the duty; fourth, freight, insurance, and other charges of importation; and fifth, the importer's profits, which we reckon at 10 per cent., and all the preceding items.

Now, it is precisely at this point of cost that the imported article comes in competition with the corresponding article of the home manufacturer. The aggregate of all the items above mentioned constitutes the protection bounty which the tariff system gives to the American manufacturer. The consumer of the domestic article, of course, pays this bounty, in addition to the duty, to the manufacturer. No man familiar with political economy pretends to dispute this axiom. No man pretends to dispute the proposition that the object of a tariff for protection is to increase the price of the article; else who would care for protected bounties? Not the manufacturer, certainly. If not he, who, then? Certainly not the consumer.

In order to verify a posteriori from the facts the cost of the taxed articles in addition to the tariff, I obtained the bills of lading at our custom-houses on pig-iron, bar-iron, cotton, and woolen manufactures, etc., which will be found in the Globe of June 2, 1864.

I was almost afraid in that debate to show what the cost and bounty of these articles were when they reached the consumer. It was almost incredible, especially when aggravated by a depreciated money system.

Of eleven principal articles imported from abroad and reckoned upon the basis of standard gold currency of the United States, I could not resist a conclusion that there was an average of over 60 per cent. in the shape of a bounty to home manufactures. And I deduced this conclusion:

Think of it! For the iron which we use in all its varieties of adaptation; for the cotton we wear, whether printed or plain, in the calico dress or the shirting; for the wool in blanket, carpet, or clothing; for the newspaper, book, and pamphlet; for the leather we use when tanned or manufactured into boots and shoes; for the clothing we buy already made up; for the soap and candles and India-rubber goods; for these only under our tariff of 1862, and not counting our recent increase or the proposed increase of this bill, we pay as gratuity to one class of persons the enormous sum of $750,250,252.

Will any one pretend that all this is for revenue? What! when the tariff does not raise one-tenth of that sum on all articles of importation? What, then, is this $750,250,252 paid for? Not for war, not for debts, not for expenses. Is it possible that we have to pay on some ten articles only, in paper money, $750,000,000 to get less than $50,000,000 of revenue from them?

I use these figures simply to show the method under the tariff of 1862, and not for the purpose of showing what the present tariff with its 47 per cent. duty levies upon the people; but to show the immense sums paid by the consumer which never gets to the Treasury of the United States, but goes as bounty to the home manufacturer.

Deducting the 60 per cent. for depreciated paper money, on the amount then ciphered as bounty on the articles named, and you have, in order to get $50,000,000 into the Treasury, paid a bounty of $300,000,000. This was a stupendous outrage. [Applause.]

Is not the President correct, therefore, as an economist and wise in his foresight as a statesman when he says:

That the tariff renders it possible for those of our people who are manufacturers of certain articles which are protected and taxed to sell them for a price equal to that demanded for the imported goods that have paid the customs duty? So that it happens that while comparatively a few use the imported articles, millions of our people who never used and never saw any of the foreign products purchase and use the things of the same kind made in this country, and pay therefor nearly or quite the same enhanced price which the duty adds to the imported articles.

But how small is his reckoning of the amount that never sees the Treasury and is the heavy part of the tax upon the consumer. He says that those who buy the domestic article pay a sum at least approximately equal to the duty to the home manufacturer. If I am correct, the sum thus paid is five or six times the amount of the duty. [Applause.]

He is re-enforced in this statement by that of Robert J. Walker, in a letter I have before me, dated November 30, 1867. I quote from it:

Our present tariff is also most unequal, oppressive, and unjust. It is grievously onerous upon agriculture, commerce, navigation, ship-building, the mines, and fisheries, whilst even manufactures, in connection with our present wretched excise system, are languishing under its inflictions. The present tariff, besides the tax of $150,000,000 a year upon imports, the duties on which are paid by the people into the Treasury in gold, exacts another tax of at least $350,000,000 a year in the enhanced prices of rival protected domestic articles. This can be readily proved by comparing the prices current in gold of such domestic articles with the prices of similar articles produced in other countries. Thus the tariff taxes the people of the United States to the extent of $500,000,000 a year, of which only $150,000,000 go into the Treasury, and the remaining $350,000,000 go into the pockets of the protected classes. And yet even they are not prosperous, on account of the diminished demand for their products, and because they are also burdened, with the rest of the people, by the weight of intolerable taxation.

The annual taxes now paid by our people as the result of the tariff, we have seen, are at least $500,000,000 a year. Add to this another $500,000,000 a year as the result, directly and indirectly, of our internal system of taxation, including the stupendous and atrocious whisky and other frauds, and our national taxation, in time of profound peace, amounts to $1,000,000,000 a year. Less than half of this goes into the Treasury. This is independent of State, county, city, and municipal taxation, which is enormous. This billion of dollars a year, as the census shows, is about one-seventh of the gross values of our present annual products, and can be borne by no people on earth. Repudiation is the necessary result of the continuance of such a system.

CHEATING BY STATUTE.

It will not be doubted that it is an under statement, that to get $200,000,000 into the Treasury it costs a thousand million! If this be not accepted as true, then go to the custom-houses and inquire for the bills of lading. When you find out the fact as I did, you will not wonder at the diabolism of the tariff; you will not wonder that the father of all sin and lies is the father of the tariff. [Laughter.] Members grow indignant at the percentages levied on our necessaries and the comparative immunity of luxuries; but they grow reconciled when it is known that these sums go to carry on government. They are reasonably content with them, even though they create a surplus and endanger values and credits. But this is not the head deviltry in the business. Our tariff makes "horns and hoofs" free, while it taxes the Word of God! The devil is in that, but only a little devil. It is when our laws adds to the tax that goes to the Treasury the robberies outside that the worst begins. Do you deny this result? I give you a touchstone to test it.

We import, say, $400,000,000 a year of the protected goods, and pay an average of 47.10 per cent. on them. Alongside in the merchant's store are the competing American goods. They are 47.10 per cent. higher than they would be sold outside of the United States. And since they are five times the value of the foreign goods, in dollars, we must pay $5 tax to the protected manufacturer where we pay $1 to the Government. Any woman who buys Irish linen in Cork, or a shawl in Paris, when she brings it in will know the unhappy fact. It is sometimes true, as this debate develops, that American goods are cheaper over our own borders. They have to be sold in foreign markets and to compete they must be undersold.

The devil is never dressed up so elegantly as when he appears as a protectionist.

Oh! how is the devil dressed?
He is dressed in his Sunday best,
With his scarlet coat and breeches of blue,
But there is a hole for the tail to come through.

[Laughter.]

It is said that when the devil walked the earth in full dress he took most delight in seeing a cunning old lawyer "cheating by statute." [Laughter.] If he had only known the complicated machinery of the tariff, ad valorem and specific, mixed in his own dress, by the square inch and by the threads, he would have enjoyed far more the legislative cheat. [Laughter.]

A FORM OF TYRANNY.

And now, I ask, where, under our Constitution; where, by the laws of nature; where, by the laws of Providence, is the warrant thus to violate the rights of property? Governments may seize property, the property of individuals, by mere arbitrary act. This, says Dr. Wayland, is a form of tyranny with which all the nations of Europe of old were too well acquainted.

But—

He says—

the same thing is done by unjust legislation. That is, when legislators, how wellsoever chosen, enact unjust laws, by which the property of the part, or the whole, is unjustly taken away, or unjustly subjected to an oppressive taxation.

Frequently since 1864, Mr. Chairman, I have had occasion to pursue the same methods of argumentation in relation to these peculiar modes of public oppression. I have learned these principles in connection with economy, not from slave-owners, or Southern statesmen, or members of the Cobden Club, but from a teacher whom I reverence and who belonged to New England. I need not say to the reverend gentlemen now in yonder gallery—who represent the Baptists of this country—what emphasis belongs to the teaching of Dr. Francis Wayland, our most distinguished moralist and Christian. [Applause.] He warned us in our college days to beware when the antidote to evil became the source of evil; when society itself set the example of peculation; when public injustice became the prolific parent of private violence. He told us the result as he had gleaned it from history, to which he applied his analytical code of morality. That result was, that capital, immigration, and production ceased, and a nation either sinks down in hopeless dependence, or else the people, harassed beyond endurance, believing that their condition can not be made worse by any change, rush into all the horrors of civil war. The social elements are dissolved, the sword enters into every house, the home ties which bind men together are severed, and no prophet can predict at the beginning what will be the end.

ILLUSTRATIONS FROM BAD TRANSPORTATION.

Let me make a homely illustration. I heard it in the class-room, from Dr. Wayland; and to it Mr. David A. Wells has added his own piquant observation. It refers to the interchange of commodities and to transportation. If transportation be difficult, it adds to the cost of the article to the consumer, just as a tariff or tax. Whenever you diminish the abundance of things which minister to our necessities, it is like interposing a desert, swamp, an unbridged stream, or a bad road between producer and consumer. No road at all; it is a prohibitory duty. Twenty per cent. duty is like a bad road; 30 per cent. is a corduroy road [laughter]; 40 per cent. like a broad, deep, and rapid unbridged river, and 50 per cent. like a swamp flanking the river on both sides, while 80 or 100 per cent., such as is levied upon steel rails, blankets, and window-glass, is a band of brigands who strip the merchant of nearly all he possesses. He should be grateful to God that he escapes with his life. [Laughter and applause.]

LOCAL INTERESTS.

I do not complain of gentlemen desiring to help their local interests. Truly it requires a little sacrifice to vote for the general weal when it causes a particular reduction of profit at home. Local color in art gives grace to picturesqueness. Our polity has as a presiding genius, autonomy. Let us respect it, but let us not carry it to such excess as to make the removal of general wrongs impossible. Statesmanship should study how best to reconcile the jarring and diverse industries of our extensive land.

May I quote, with proper modesty, the sentiment upon which I have acted in respect to these local interests? I can not do better than quote from a debate in the Globe (page 2683, volume 52, first session, Thirty-eighth Congress) in which the eminent gentleman from Maine, Mr. Blaine, complained of my remarks about Maine and lumber.

Mr. COX. I beg leave to correct the gentleman. He could not have made these remarks if he had listened attentively to my speech. I referred to the lumber interest only to show that it was unprotected. My remark, therefore, was in favor of the gentleman's State. I said the lumber interest of the West by the census of 1860 amounted to over $33,000,000, while that of New England was only about $12,000,000. Hence lumber was unprotected.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman arraigned the New England States, and I did not hear him make any exception.

Mr. COX. I did arraign New England as a whole, but not in regard to the lumber interest.

Mr. BLAINE. I would like to know in regard to what interests the gentleman arraigns my State?

Mr. COX. I named ten articles on which they have special protection.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman name one article on which the State of Maine has especial protection, only one? That is all I ask for.

Mr. COX. I will say to the gentleman that I made no reference particularly to the State of Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. But the State of Maine is in New England, and the gentleman's sweeping charges were against New England as a whole.

Mr. COX. I gave the statistics of cotton, woolen, and iron manufactures, clothing, etc. If any of these are in Maine, my remarks will apply. Maine generally sustains the rest of New England in her exactions.

Mr. BLAINE. Why, sir, your own State is protected in iron to the amount of millions of dollars more on that single article than Maine ever received on all her products together.

Mr. COX. It does not necessarily follow that I am to stand up for one particular interest in my State if I deem it against the general interests of the whole State, or militates a just principle of taxation.

These views of public duty on these difficult subjects I commend to younger members. They did not embarrass me either as a member from agricultural Ohio or commercial New York. Indeed, I believe they sent me to Congress again and again from the great metropolis. [Applause.]

Some members here are unequal to the effort, or are reluctant to attempt to make local sacrifices for the general good. My commission is as a Representative of the United States from New York and not for New York. [Applause.]

Members admit that there are certain productions which upon principle should not have protection; but they declare that they will make reprisals for the clamors and exactions of the tariff in other matters where they are unprotected. I have inveighed against this system as mutual brigandage and the reciprocity of robbery. [Applause and laughter.]

Our tariffs illustrate this in every paragraph. Kentucky wants cheap copper stills for her whisky. She gets even with the Michigan robber by demanding a tariff on hemp. Now hemp is to be on the free-list, and why not copper? Maine steals on lumber to make up for the Massachusetts roguery on fabrics. Massachusetts howls for cheap coal; Pennsylvania says, no; and so Massachusetts goes out with a Home Market Club and knocks down the West and South, to rifle them of half their gains on corn and raw cotton. Tennessee, Virginia, and North Carolina, being fleeced all round in clothing, sugar, and what not, go for "goobers" at a cent a pound. [Laughter.] California demands a large reprisal for her olives and vines, because she is fleeced on salt by New York, West Virginia, Ohio, and Michigan. The Gulf States form a band of brigands, and march forth with precious little hope for any steal worth the powder; but being reduced to extremities, they call on Fra Diavalo from Louisiana to lead against the robber gang of cut-throats on cotton-ties and trace-chains. Pennsylvania, the Robert Macaire of the lot, steals boldly on all articles from a plate glass to a locomotive; and to make up for the general loss, the Northwest masks herself behind her forests and demands timber reprisals; and so on. Nothing is sacred. Even the corsets of Connecticut, around which hover so many happy associations [laughter], or the brier-wood pipes of Father Knickerbocker are not safe from the interchangeable piracies of the tariff. [Laughter and applause.] Oh, the beauty of reciprocal rascality! [Laughter.]

IS IT ROBBERY, OR COMMUNISM?

Gentlemen seem to take umbrage because we call these tariffs which take from one class to give to another, robbery. But I have the best ethics for the statement that the right of property is violated by cheating, stealing, robbery, or violation of contract; and universally, just as these crimes prevail, production languishes, industry diminishes, the richest soil fails the impoverished inhabitants. But when Government lays its powerful grasp on the property of the citizen to bestow that property on favored enterprises, it is none the less robbery and communism because done under the forms of law.

Oh, but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] says it is not a tax, only a "trade regulation." [Laughter.] In this he differs rom every writer upon political science. I am inclined, notwithstanding the euphemism, to call it,—otherwise. [Laughter.] The suave expression "trade regulation" sounds pretty, but it is all the same a tax and something worse.

IS IT BURGLARY?

But stop! Mr. Chairman, I should apologize. I must be decorous. [Laughter.] It is not robbery. Since the tariff forces taxes from one person to give to another by indirection, by a sleight-of-hand manipulation, is it not merciful to call it by another name than robbery? Ah, sir, it is done in the night season. [Laughter.] It is done against the defenseless victims when asleep and in their homes. Some folks would call it burglary. [Laughter and cheers.] But I must be parliamentary. [Laughter.] Therefore I call it a trade regulation. [Laughter.] I have read a volume by M. Huc, a Catholic priest, who, dressed in the yellow robes, traveled through Thibet. He made many graphic descriptions of the then strange land of the Grand Llama. Among other descriptions (I quote from memory) is that of an adventure in the Thibetan mountains:

AN EUPHEMISM—"TRADE REGULATIONS."

A brigand meets the priest upon the road. The brigand does not point a pistol at his breast nor draw a knife. He says with perfect courtesy:

"Venerable elder brother! It is cold to-day in the mountains. I would like the loan of thy cloak."

And again:

"Beloved friend, dost thou not see that I am tired with walking? Thy horse, if thou pleasest."

This is a "trade regulation" in the land of the Grand Llama! [Great laughter.]

But the great bulk of our tariff larcenies is done in the night season; and if Dr. Wayland and other writers be correct beyond a cavil, these unequal, unlawful, and outrageous taxes are flat burglary. I beg pardon—I will use again the language of my friend from Ohio, used in this House, and not in Canada—it is not taxation. It is a little "trade regulation" by which Ohio is made magnificent and prosperous at the expense of our Southern brethren.

SUN AND COAL.

Gentlemen complain that this is a radical bill to ruin our industries. How can this be so? Why, the sun and his kindred elements are regarded as aliens against which we must have protection and prohibition. Coal is left off of the free-list, although ready to drop into our ships from the cliffs of Nova Scotia, to give caloric to the factories of New England.

Mr. Chairman, I once had occasion here to improve upon one of Bastiat's fables so as to apply it to our country, but I did not then know that the story had a basis in fact. M. Rouviére, late prime minister of France, in a speech in 1882, I think, said that the tallow chandlers of France—good, kind, simple protectionists—petitioned the chamber of deputies to suppress gas. Why? Because it would ruin their business.

With this new light I beg to repeat the analogue, with my own comments, and to print Bastiat's petition as an addendum to my remarks.

M. Bastiat's petitioners desired to suppress sunlight. They were protectionists of the genuine type. They demanded that the authorities should close all windows and sky-lights, inside and outside, all shutters, curtains, blinds, bulls'-eyes, openings, chinks, clefts, and fissures whereby the sun enters to the disadvantage of the manufacturers of wicks, snuffers, street-lamps, extinguishers, and the producers of oil, tallow, resin, and alcohol. [Great laughter.]

"No cheap and plentiful light from abroad for us," they cried. [Laughter.] "Let us have petroleum against the external competition of daylight. Light is an uppish, solar foreigner, and should not rival the coal-gas from the sunless retorts of the earth. [Laughter.] Light is alien. It is cheap, pauper labor. [Laughter.] It inundates us half the time. Your Joshua is a protectionist. [Laughter.] He would have the sun stand still that coal and gas be high-priced. [Laughter.] The market for gas, candlesticks, and gas-burners should not be disturbed. Oh, no! For is not light a secret enemy, purchased with foreign gold? [Laughter.] Quench it, and artificial light will be gorgeous and bountiful, though dear. How many domestic industries does not the prism destroy?"

Surely, the sun saps the foundations of agriculture, for is not tallow from the sheepfolds of my friend from Vermont [Mr. STEWART]? [Laughter.] It destroys the oil market, plugs the gushing wells, and interferes with transportation. It throws out of employment workmen innumerable; it reduces the wages of such as are left. Under this policy of free light, what becomes of what is left of the whaling industries of New England? Who protects the heroes of the harpoon? The very bronzes, gildings, crystals, lamps, and spacious saloons of the rich are useless half the time because illumined by the proximity of the sun.

Let us build an opaque roof, ribbed with steel, over the land. [Applause and laughter.] What matter the expense? Every American coal-bunk and mine will furnish the material for an American-made gas-retort. No gratuities of nature, no natural wealth. Give labor a chance. [Laughter.] Let manufacture thrive. Down with the sun! Imprison electricity! Up with old chaos and darkness! And while cheap foreign labor is forbidden in its products at the custom-house forget not also to bar out from Castle Garden the cheap foreign laborer who comes thither with light in his eye and iron in his blood; for is not his light and iron an alien to the protectionist? [Applause and laughter.]

PEANUT INDUSTRY AND THE SON OF AFRICA.

The raiser of peanuts, by a parity of reasoning, protests against the free importation of that article. It is consumed by my little Arab constituency of the Bowery. [Laughter.] I must regard them. Because the same article is raised by those whose cheap labor is evidenced by its clotheless condition under Africa's burning sun—let peanuts be protected! Why not?

The same philosophy applies to the salt made abroad by solar radiance and evaporation. The sun is a cheap laborer, and although we have a sun shining over our own Onondaga in New York, it has not the calorific properties and chronic results of other suns, in other skies, which have laid away vast mines of saline crystals in the bosom of the earth.

There is coal, too. Why should it not be protected or restricted from abroad? Is it not the product of the sun and nature?

THE SUN, CARBON, AND LOCOMOTION.

One Sabbath George Stephenson—the inventor of our multitubular locomotive—sees a train flashing by with its long white plume of steam. Turning to his friend, he asks:

"Can you tell me what is the power driving that train?"

"Well, is it not one of your big engines?"

"Aye, but what drives the engine?"

"Oh, very likely a canny Newcastle driver."

"What do you say to the light of the sun?"

"How?" asked the friend.

"It is nothing else," said the engineer. "It is light bottled up in the earth for tens of thousands of years—light absorbed by plants and vegetables—being necessary for the condensation of carbon during the process of their growth if it be not carbon in another form; and now after being buried in the earth for long ages, in fields of coal, that latent light is again brought forth and liberated. It is made to work as in that locomotive for great human purposes."

Was there not poetic beauty in the reality of this conception? Think of it. This sun power, equal to billions of horses, is not only every day providing fuel for some great locomotive emergency of the future, but it lifts up fabulous weights of watery vapor into the clouds, which returns to bless the earth by giving form and color, fiber and juices, scent and strength to tree and flower.

These same sunbeams were pressed into coal by the centuries and ponderosities, and when mined and fired become incentives to fabrication and motions, that outstrip Apollo's coursers of the sun. They move the fast-flying shuttles of manufacture and interchange to create the tapestry of a better civilization. [Applause.]

Why should these natural and cheap workers for human happiness be laid under embargo and prohibited to our people?

THE FRUITS OF THE EARTH—ARE THEY FREE?

The same cogency of reasoning, the same patriotic love of a home market, and independence of foreign supply, especially in case of war, are illustrated in a petition sent to this House by a Connecticut gardener from Glastonbury. Almost in sight of the Charter oak his strawberry beds give their succulent rubies to the sun; and the sun, through coal and Stephenson, harness a force to bear them to my constituents. But the Connecticut gardener is not satisfied with this nearness to the New York market. He demands that a heavy if not prohibitive duty be placed upon all foreign fresh fruits; oranges now taxed 25 cents a box; grapes now 20 per cent. ad valorem, and bananas—and why? Because the consumer being satisfied with cheap foreign fruits fresh from the West Indies would discourage his strawberries. [Laughter.] He would embargo the ships of all lands, where currants grow, and figs and dates are sugared by the sun, in order to leave a larger yearning in the human esophagus for the strawberries and huckleberries of the Nutmeg State. [Laughter.]

By a parity of reasoning the anchovies and sardines of France and the raisins of Turkey should be prohibé in order to protect the suckers of Illinois and the grapes of California. [Laughter.]

Truly, when we do begin our attacks upon nature and her processes it is hard to stop. It is the little end of the wedge for a potato, and then the result is a whole catalogue, including the gramniverous animals, the rhinoceros, hippopotamus, and elephant, by which we teach children natural history. [Laughter.]

The present bill proposes to repeal the 10 per cent. ad valorem on barks, beans, berries, balsams, birds, and bulbs. Who opposes this alliterative benefaction? On barks? Some quack who has found a root that may be ruined in the market for medicinal use. On beans? Some maker of castor-oil intended to relieve the infant industry of the home market. [Laughter.] On berrries? Some batrachian of the swamp who croaks for protection to his cranberries. Balsams? But why go on? The argumentum ad absurdum has no limit for opposing the revision of such a tariff as we have. Let foreign nuts, and seeds, and weeds, and "dried insects not edible," be prohibited or restricted, for is not the country rich in hazels and hickories, garden seeds, and jimson weeds, and who knows what industries chemistry may evoke out of these—our natural resources!

INFANT SUCTION POWER.

Mr. Chairman, I am confused by the tabular opulence of our tariff speeches. We have tables on wages, tables on the home market, tables on iron and lumber, tables on cotton and copper, tables on salt and wood-screws—tables on everything. I am afraid we do not study them heedfully. I will not make many tables; but I am studying statistics. I have made a calculation about our infant industries, and their power of suction from a maternal government. [Laughter.] Skipping the era from 1846 to 1860, during the existence of a good Democratic tariff, I beg to develop some statistics. That suction power amounted to 10,441,000 horse-power. [Great laughter.] I prove it by showing the power of the fly in mechanics as a provocative to force. [Laughter.] Taking the unit of power, which is 1 pound weight raised a foot, and the weight which a horse raises is 33,000 pounds a foot in a minute, I thus get the one-horse power. My friend from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] late Commissioner of Patents will note my accuracy. [Laughter.] These are statistics. [Laughter.] Then after the manner of our protectionists, I seek the census of 1880. [Laughter.] I desire the number of horses, oxen, milk cows, mules, asses, and other cattle. [Laughter.] The number in the aggregate is 48,095,807, from Alabama to Wyoming, all within our borders. I give a period of three months of the year for fly time. [Laughter.] Then, sir, I demonstrate irrefragibly that these live stock for about ten hours of the day keep their tails in motion. [Laughter.] I deduct as an uncertain factor the Texican steer, who uses his foot to kick vagrant flies from his ear [great laughter], and then I find that the forces thus expended and utilized, omitting the Texican steer, give me the premise which I have seen somewhere in the speeches of the gentlemen on the other side, from which I deduce the untold suction power of our infant industries! [Laughter and applause.]

Through this enormous and well-ascertained horse-power in fly time I am enabled to gauge the amount of milk which Michigan suckles through copper, Pennsylvania through iron tubes, Massachusetts on cotton, New Jersey on spool-thread, Louisiana on sugar, Maryland on coal, New York on salt, California on blankets, Ohio on wool, and so on. Of course there is more or less struggling as to which infant should have the right of way [laughter] or the first pull at the pap. [Applause and laughter.]

It is said, sir, of the infant Hercules that when he was suckled by his mother he pulled so hard that he spilled the lacteal fluid and produced the milky way in the heavens. Hercules is Pennsylvania. [Applause and laughter.]

WAGES—SYLLOGISMS.

I do not affect elaborate tables. They are so common as hardly to be read, especially when they refer to wages under the tariff. A table may show a low scale of wages for England, and a high scale for the United States. But what does it prove? Let me reproduce here, in syllogistic form, these logical sleights of hand or mouth.

Thus argues the protectionist:

England has free trade; England has low wages. Ergo, free trade produces low wages.

Again: The United States has protection; the United States has high wages. Therefore protection produces high wages. [Laughter.]

Now, one may very easily parody such chop-logic, thus:

England has a House of Lords. England has low wages. Conclusion: the Lords make wages low. [Laughter.]

Or, the United States is infested with tramps. The United States has high wages. Therefore tramps make wages high. [Laughter.]

Ireland has no snakes. Ireland has low wages. Argal: Snakes make wages high. [Laughter.]

Apply the same argument to Russia. Russia has high protection. Russia has low wages. Therefore protection makes wages low.

Turkey—will gentlemen excuse me for my reference? [Laughter.] Well, Turkey has a low tariff—8 per cent. Turkey has the Koran. Therefore the Koran makes wages low. [Laughter.]

The truth is, as has been frequently stated on this floor, and proven, that wages are a matter entirely irrelevant to the discussion of tariff, depending upon the law of supply and demand, and the circumstances, situation, and resources of the country. [Applause.]

I have discussed, Mr. Chairman, very often here the relation between the tariff and wages. I will not enter upon that further now, except to say that by the reports of our consuls, and notably the consul at Birmingham, Mr. Schoenhof, and by a comparison of tariffs and wages in other countries, it is safe to conclude that the tariff does not affect wages in the sense in which the Republicans claim it does. No man can argue, solely from these relations between wages and prices and tariffs, as to the beneficial results to the people.

INVENTIONS, STANDING ARMIES, CONSUMERS, ETC.

A country like ours, which has 250,000 inventions protected by the patent law, as my friend [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] so well recognizes, and with her artisans and laborers replete with intelligence and ability, need not fear competition from nations which have withdrawn, at great cost, millions of their productive citizens for standing armies. The nations who compete with us have 1 man for every 24 of the population in the soldiery; in the United States we have but 1 man in 1,610 of the population.

HOME MARKET.

When protectionists clamor for a home market they forget that there is no standing army of consumers, and that nearly all of our people are producers. They say: "We must have a home market; we must consume all we produce at home, and produce only as much as we consume."

We do produce more agricultural products than we consume by five hundred millions' worth a year. How can we consume these products at home—in our country? It would require several millions more people who would consume only and produce nothing. But if more people do come in there will be more products still and a greater surplus. The proposed remedy only increases the surplus, and can not diminish it, unless, indeed, we follow European example and keep a standing army of two millions of idle soldiery. [Applause.]

A liberal Englishman statesman—not a Tory—Sir Lyon Playfair, speaking of this condition of our country, points to the United States as the great industrial nation of the future, and exclaims: "Luckily her protection policy is an incubus upon her industry, and gives us in England breathing time to prepare for the coming struggle."

NON-PROTECTED CLASSES.

It has often been repeated here that the last census shows that of the 17,392,099 of our population engaged in industries, 7,670,493 were employed in agriculture; and, in round numbers, about 4,000,000 in professional and personal services, nearly 2,000,000 in trade and transportation, and nearly 4,000,000 in manufacturing and mining. At least 1,214,023 were engaged in pursuits which were not benefited but rather injured by a high tariff. They were injured, I say, because the protective tariff, which is alleged to make high wages for others, did not benefit these. The pattern-makers, the bricklayers, the molders, the house carpenters, and many workers in other branches of business which are absolutely unprotected, command higher wages than those working on protected articles.

There are nearly 400,000 carpenters and joiners, 300,000 milliners and dressmakers and seamstresses, nearly 200,000 blacksmiths, 133,000 tailors and tailoresses, 102,000 masons, 76,000 butchers, 41,000 bakers, 22,000 plasterers, and others engaged in unprotected pursuits, who bear the burden without receiving the supposed benefit of the favored class.

Counting out the number of unprotected farmers—and over one-half of our entire population are dependent upon farms—I have before me a list of trades and employments. It includes over one hundred classes, from the architect to the wood-chopper, who derive no sort of reward, but whose business is crucified between the two thieves—ad valorem and specific duties, levied upon all they consume.

Here is a list of the number of our population engaged in 1880 in non-protected industries:

It is this class of people that I have the honor in large part to represent. They live in our cities, and though they may be largely engaged in manufacturing according to our census returns, they are not manufacturing those articles which have the special favor of our tariff.

DO NOT TAX WAGES. OH, NO!

Gentlemen may tell us that they do not tax the wages of these men, whether high or low, by their tariff.

I know that they do not tax their wages; but they tax all that their wages buy. They thus reduce the purchasing power of the little money that is left at the end of the week or month; for every article that enters into their expenditure, from the potatoes, taxed specifically 15 cents a bushel, to the salt, at over 80 per cent. ad valorem, and from the rent of their houses, which is enhanced by the tax on lumber and iron, etc., to the blankets that give them comfort in the winter nights.

INSECTS IN THE TARIFF.

We have reports made by our Commissioner of Agriculture about every imaginable insect that preys upon our crops: The Hessian fly, the army-worm, the weevil, and that latest pest called Hemiptera, or the family of Lygæidæ. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] understands this family. They have "trade regulations" of their own. [Laughter.] I may say that they are familiarly known as the "chinch-bug." Efforts are being made to dislodge these pests that destroy our grasses and our grains. Much money is expended out of our surplus for that purpose. Would it not be much better for the farmer, if the same amount of skill in the treatment of certain little tariff insectivora were investigated so as to destroy them? Where our game laws do not suffice, or our birds do not answer the purpose of destroying these pests, our reports tell us that a solution of common soap added to boiling water or kerosene will have that effect upon chinch-bugs. Let us not be particular as to the nature or quantity of the remedy.

LUXURIES AND NECESSARIES.

Allow me, Mr. Chairman, to place in parallel columns a statement of a number of these insectivora. One column will show some of the luxuries of life, which come in free, or nearly so, under the present tariff, and the other the duties on the articles of necessity. And yet, for years and years in this House, gentlemen have refused even to consider the advisability of reducing the one or raising the other of these taxes and harmonizing their discordant elements:

Duty on articles of luxury.	Duty on articles of necessity.
Ottar of roses, free.	Castor-oil, 180 per cent.
Neroli, or orange-flower oil, free.	Linseed-oil, 62 per cent.
Diamonds, 10 per cent.	Common window-glass, 87 per cent.
Raw silk, free.	Raw wool, 45 per cent.
Jewelry, 25 per cent.	Steel rails, 85 per cent.
Gold studs, 25 per cent.	Horseshoe nails, 116 per cent.
Finest still wines, in bottles, 29 per cent.	Cheapest mixed woolen goods, costing abroad 24 cents per yard, 77 per cent.
Finest thread lace, 30 per cent.	Spool thread, 51 per cent.
Fine Aubusson and Axminster carpets, costing abroad $2.77 a yard, 46 per cent.	Common druggets, costing abroad 26 cents a yard, 86 per cent.
Finest India shawls, costing abroad, say $20 a pound weight, 35 cents a pound and 40 per cent. ad valorem, or say 40½ per cent.	Common woolen shawls, costing abroad 68 cents a pound, 86 per cent.
Silk stockings, 50 per cent.	Common worsted stockings, costing 26 cents a pound abroad, 73 per cent.
Finest broadcloth, costing $5 a pound abroad, 35 cents a pound, and 40 per cent., equal to about 41 per cent.	Common cloth, costing 65 cents a pound abroad, duty 35 cents a pound, and 35 per cent. ad valorem, equal to 89 per cent.
Pâte de foie gras, 25 per cent.	Rice, 106 per cent.
Musical instruments, of all kinds, 25 per cent.	Galvanized wire smaller than No. 16 and not smaller than No. 26 wire gauge, 132 per cent.; smaller than No. 26, 155 per cent.
Duty on a quart bottle of champagne, costing abroad $1 a bottle, 58 cents.	Duty on a dollar's worth of bleached cotton fabric, costing abroad 5½ cents a square yard, 66⅔ cents.
Curry and curry powder, free.	Potatoes, 15 cents duty per bushel.
Olives, green or prepared, free.	Corn starch, 85½ per cent. duty.
Spices of all kinds, free.	Salt, 85 per cent. duty.

AMERICAN IDEAS, NOT FOREIGN.

Our American statesmen from the earliest days to the present who have been wise in econony have been accustomed to swear in the words of no masters from abroad:

In the "Principles of Trade," which appeared in 1774, two years before Adam Smith wrote his Wealth of Nations, it was asserted that commerce should be as free between all nations of the world as it was between the several counties of England.

Franklin's letters of 1778 were of the same tenor, namely, that our tariff should be for revenue only. Jefferson, as minister to France, was then advocating free trade. He recommended that commerce be relieved of its shackles in all parts of the world. Gallatin opposed protection very soon afterwards in Congress.

HONEST DEFINITION OF FREE TRADE.

As early as 1831, William C. Bryant argued for the liberties of interchange. The agitation went on up to the final triumph, in 1846, when the tariff, in the language of Senator ALLISON, was made as "perfect a tariff as any we ever had." [Applause.] Protection had no more strenuous opposers than the men who, like Emerson, in the very midst of the war, spoke of free interchange as in the interest of all nations.

These men did not undertake to convey the idea that free trade was the abolition of custom-houses, nor the substitution of direct for indirect taxation. In the language of a representative protectionist paper, the Philadelphia American of the 7th August, 1884, they held that it meant such an adjustment of taxes on imports that the entire revenue of the country should be thus collected, and so long as it did not lay its duties in such a way as to lead any one to undertake any employment or make any investment he could avoid in the absence of such duties.

NEVADA TO THE RESCUE—THE IRISH VOTE.

The gentleman from Nevada [Mr. WOODBURN] undertook, as he said, to fill up a gap. He filled one. [Laughter.] He thought that the President's message was a British document, but not having the testimony on that head complete from the internal evidence of the document itself, he rushes to London and invokes the Cobden Club to his assistance. He makes many apocryphal statements in relation to it, and quotes that enemy of Ireland and America—the Tory organ—the London Times, as evidence that the Democratic leaders of this country are horrible free-traders. He revamps the old story of British gold which is to be used in America for the Democratic party and its success. He finds in the membership of the club an army of dukes, and the Lord knows who, and drew the inference that with their "three guineas apiece" they are going to subdue America and overturn the Republican party [laughter] and things generally! Goodness, gracious! Whole ocean into tempest tossed to waft a feather and to drown a fly! [Laughter.] He was careful to omit the names of the distinguished Republican leaders, who are, of course, in the conspiracy against themselves! He became so confused as to the name of the Secretary of War that his mistake naturally produced "great laughter and applause," which should have been reconsidered on the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] that it was quite another Endicott!

Among others whom he should have named as members of the Cobden Club were some of the most liberal men in American politics upon both sides, including the Speaker of this House and several Senators.

Now, sir, what was the objective point of all this logical debate on the Mills bill? It was the Irish vote. [Laughter.]

The gentleman was careful to let the House know that he was born in Ireland. Our Congressional Directory had already indicated that. But if I should pursue the method pointed out by a scientist of Dublin, Dr. McElheran, I think I could denationalize the gentleman. [Laughter.] That distinguished doctor showed that the way to test a true Celt was not by the place of his nativity, but by his features and name. You may recognize the genuine Celt by his eye or by his hair. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. VANCE] smiles and points to his own ruddy poll. [Laughter.] I look around for a white charger [laughter]; but there is no fear of the coincidence, as the gentleman is not of the gentler sex. [Laughter.] The Celt has a handsome eye and a graceful figure, while the Angles and Saxons—as Defoe held—were the mud of all the races. Of course I would not apply such a remark by the author of Robinson Crusoe to the gentleman from Nevada, although perhaps he deserves it for his baseless attack upon Mayor Hewitt. Of course, since the statement as to our mayor has been refuted, he will make the amende. We will give him time. [Laughter.]

The gentleman may have been born in Ireland. I once heard an Irishman say, "Because a baby is born in a stable it does not follow that he is a horse." [Laughter.] It is well understood by physiologists that such men as Shakespeare and Sir Isaac Newton are ascertained by their lineaments to be Celtic in their origin. Cromwell and his confiscators left quite a spawn of aliens in Ireland; and some of them have claimed to be of the pure stock. But they are not. They are not the O'Callaghans, the Murphys, the O'Conners, the O'Shaunesseys, the Sullivans [laughter], or the O'Neills, whose royal lineage is honorably upheld by my friend from Missouri who sits near me. [Laughter.]

When a member makes profert of himself, in order to reproach others, he must take the consequences, even if they be both philological and physiological. "Wood-burn"—what does it mean and where did it come from? There never was a better Saxon word than wode or wudu; it is a wood. It signifies, when an adjective, "mad," "furious" [laughter], because wild animals lived in the woods of Denmark or Friesland. Burn is thoroughly Saxon. It is from biernan. I surmise that the gentle defender of Tories from Nevada was descended, most honorably of course, either from some lordly Saxon charcoal burner, or that the name came from some of the Cromwell soldiery, who burned all the woods they could not confiscate when they invaded Ireland.

Names are not much in a debate, but as the gentleman has spread my middle name—Sullivan—on the record, I must analyze that also a little in return, by saying that Sullivan is from the Latin, "Sol" and "Levant." Sun Rise! [Laughter.] My ancestor came from the East. I went back as his reflux wave. [Laughter.] I may mention confidentially that one of my ancestors carried a hod at the building of Solomon's Temple. [Laughter.] All I know of the family is that a recent ancestor came over from Ireland with Lord Baltimore. He was in "noble" company.

There is another test of Celtic blood to which I may refer, as it is so pertinent to the Mills bill. The gentleman from Nevada will be pleased to know that his championship of the Tory protectionists of England indicates that he leans toward, if he does not belong to, the bluest blood of the landed aristocracy of England. [Laughter.]

Evidently the speech of the gentleman was made for the purpose of prejudicing the Irish against the Democracy, by reason of their dislike to their English oppressors. But his arrow falls far short of the mark.

The gentleman was pleased to say something complimentary of myself as a member of the Democratic party, and referred to me as a representative of a cosmopolitan constituency in a cosmopolitan city. He spelled my name at full, and more than intimated that I became a member of the Cobden Club, because it was a "nobleman's foreign association."

This remark of the gentleman from Nevada seems to have been well received by the House. To be more exact, let me quote his language:

> At the same time, to my utter astonishment, I find one of the foremost men of the Democratic party, a distinguished author, wit, and humorist, a Representative of a cosmopolitan constituency in a cosmopolitan city, SAMUEL SULLIVAN COX, became a member of the noblemen's foreign association.

By the brackets I notice, though I did not hear the speech, that this was received with laughter and applause.

I am at a loss how to discriminate. I have no special vanity, but I suppose the applause was intended for myself as a foremost Democrat, author, wit, humorist, and Representative [laughter], and that the laughter was at the gentleman's expense for associating me with noblemen—as such people run nowadays in and out of divorce courts in England.

Mr. Chairman, I am not altogether certain that the gentleman should be laughed at for calling me a nobleman. I have had some sort of a decoration given to me by the successor of the Caliphs and the Sultans. But the nobility which I most admire is not that of mere title. I had almost forgotten my honors abroad. I did dearly yearn for the society of you gentlemen. [Laughter.] All the pride I have is to be a Commoner along with other common folks here. [Applause and laughter.]

I do not care even for the courteous "Honorable" in this House. I have an ambition to be considered a good man and a faithful member. I have no special desire to be considered either witty, humorous, or a littérateur. Whatever the House or the gentleman may have meant by their laughter and applause, I would commend to him the verse of Tennyson, where he says:

> How e'er it be, it seems to me,
> 'Tis only noble to be good;
> Kind hearts are more than coronets,
> And simple faith than Norman blood.

[Cheers.]

And certainly no one ever merited this tribute of the laureate of England more than Richard Cobden, the yeoman's son, the friend of America, and the defender of just economic laws. [Cheers.]

When the gentleman prints my name SAMUEL SULLIVAN COX in the RECORD, he indicates something of my Celtic blood, but he indicates something better than my thought and service.

I beg to say that I accept my middle name with considerable pride; for among the best men of the Revolution from New Hampshire were the two Sullivans, one of whom was governor of Massachusetts and the other a general in our Army. Both were the friends of Washington. The general was not only the first to wrest Fort William and Henry from the tory Government of England, but, after the Revolution was over, he signalized his bravery and skill by suppressing the Indians in Central New York, when they were allied with the tories with which the gentleman is pleased to be allied.

I am not so proud of my middle name as I was; for when I reflect that Boston culture has produced another kind of Sullivan [laughter], and that he ingloriously retreated from the beautiful land of France before a Tory British slugger, I am not so vain of my name parted in the middle.

The gentleman from Nevada represents a little rotten borough which is held by a lot of silver lords. From his standpoint he chooses to defame the men who made the "cheap loaf" for the poor Englishmen, and who, as O'Connell expressed it, were engaged in the same sad work toward Ireland. The attempt is as futile as the attack of a microbe against the shaggy frontlets and pachydermatous hide of the American bison recently brought to this capital. [Laughter.] The gentleman's State is supposed to be in the Union. With its forty-odd thousand inhabitants it has as much power in the Senate as New York with its six millions. Still, should he not cultivate something of the modesty which belongs to littleness, of which I am a commendable specimen, and not be too forward in attacking men who, like Cobden and his corn-law repealers, and as Macaulay said of the Puritans, were the noblemen of nature by the imposition of a mightier hand?

If the gentleman would produce the impression that those who have been named as members of the Cobden Club in their catalogue are unfaithful to Ireland or to America, he had better correct the RECORD; at least so far as my name is concerned, for not only have I defended her sons and had resolutions passed of sympathy and of succor for the cause of Ireland and Irishmen who were imprisoned wrongfully, as the RECORD of this House will show, but I had the honor of making the motion, before a Democratic Speaker [Mr. RANDALL], by which Mr. Parnell was accorded the privileges of this House for an address upon the wrongs of Ireland.

It would take more misrepresentation and innuendo than the Tory member from this rotten borough has shown, to produce any impression upon the cosmopolitan constituency which I have the honor to represent.

By ancestry, by inclination, by virtue of long service here, running through nearly thirty years, I never had one thought for or sympathy with the Tory leaders who sought to drive England to desperation by their protective policies.

The Tories of New Jersey, from which State came my folk, were in alliance with the Hessian and the red-coat to drive the patriots of the revolution into ignoble humiliation. They failed; but had they succeeded, and had the Liberals of England, whom the gentleman stigmatizes, failed, we might still have been an English dependency, and the gentleman, if he had lived at all, might have been engaged in the constabulary force in Ireland to-day endeavoring to suppress, under the orders of Tory Balfour, the enfranchisement of the people of his native isle who are seeking for home rule.

In picking out my name, had he looked over the list of the Cobden Club a little more closely he would have seen the name of Governor Jacob D. Cox, a Republican gentleman and soldier. He was an honest statesman. This he illustrated in this House, and as Secretary of the Interior. In association with such a man one can welcome such pitiful assaults as those of the Tory member from Nevada.

Governor Jacob D. Cox was the friend and associate of General Garfield. They were both sympathetic with liberalities of all kind. I do not charge that either of them accepted all the tenets of the Cobden Club.

I do not understand General Garfield's relations in that way, and certainly I had no such idea. I do not know how I became a member. It was tendered to me, I suppose, for my persistency in vindicating the liberalities of thought which belong to economic study and the observations which I made of the working of our tariff system. The Cobden Club has other objects beside freedom of trade. It sends out pamphlets in relation to the tenure of land. It favors the removal of primogeniture. It would improve the tenure of title to land in England as well as elsewhere. It would stop the great pension-lists and other excesses of English economic administration. Publications on these themes are sent to its members. I have received my share and such instruction from them as I could glean. But it does not follow that I am bound by all its tenets, for I, too, swear in the words of no master, and no platform, and no party on this subject.

While in a foreign country I was elected a member of a society which, being translated, means Phil-Hellenic. In my diploma these Greeks spelled my last name with a K, a capital K. [Laughter.] The K was at both ends of the name [laughter]—Koks. [Laughter.] The object of this association is the study and diffusion of knowledge of ancient Greek archæology, history, language, and literature. It may have its peculiar theories about Grecian art and philosophy; but did it follow that though I accepted such an election, honorably tendered, I was bound to any particular philosophy of ancient Greece, whether that of Plato or Aristotle? Must I become a cynic or a stoic, revel in the sty of Epicurus, or my soul become transmigratory with Pythagoras? Must I accept a peculiar theory of the dative case, or adhere to the pre-Periclean or post-Periclean school of art? I was never called on to eat fish or drink cold champagne in the seat of Byzantine Empire; but if I had been I should have drank to the Illiad and the Odyssey and to the swelling of the voiceful sea, which is the vehicle and symbol of liberty! I do not know what this honorable society of Greeks may do on the Bosphorus, at the seat of their ancient empire and glory, but I hope that they will do nothing that will ever be brought up in Congress to the disadvantage of myself, my party, or patriotic associations. [Applause.]

This little esprit of the gentleman, according to the brackets in the RECORD, produced "laughter and applause."

It is well that the gentleman got in his laughter first. The incident reminds me of another Irishman. He was in a meadow with a little bovine. The bovine began to paw the earth and tear up the ground with his horns, and the Irishman laughed and laughed at the unique performance. [Laughter.] But soon the little bull pitched him over a fence. The Irishman got up, and said, "Isn't it lucky I got in my laugh first?" [Laughter.]

Before I finish with the history of this club and its opponents and members the gentleman will be, perhaps, not a little astonished to know where the laugh comes in; and that he has made himself the advocate of the meanest and worst of all the aristocratic and titled gentry that ever rackrented and stole the land or harassed and oppressed the people of any country. [Cheers.]

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

In this connection it is but just that we should recognize the efforts in and out of this country made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH] to reciprocate without restrictions with the Dominion of Canada. Boldly, in spite of the objurgations of his party, he casts protection to the winds, moved on Canada, and took a toboggan slide into free trade. [Laughter.] I perused his admirable speeches with eagerness to find the re-enforcement of a policy which I have here advocated. Alas! He was himself one of the lost sheep to which he referred so felicitously. Doubtless he made the Canadian protected wilderness resonant with his bleating.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], in "peeping" around for the one sheep he had lost and loved more than the ninety-nine who had not gone astray, must have been astonished to find that by leaving him alone he soon came home—with his little protection tail behind him. [Laughter.]

But what will gentleman do for the lost Norse lamb from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]? He is still wandering. No one is looking for him. He has the range of the Northwestern pastures, and I think we need not mourn over him. [Laughter.] He belongs to the hardy race who are not afraid to syllable the words and ideas of commercial liberty. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Ohio is not ignorant of the elements of reciprocity; he knows their value; and he has upheld its banner. I am proud of his efforts. He applauds the zollverein of our own Union. He would extend it not merely by interchanges with Canada, but to the other Americas. But the moment he mounts his reciprocal charger and makes our continent the scene of his chivalric endeavor, he turns his back upon other continents.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Will my friend from New York yield to me for a moment?

Mr. COX. With much pleasure.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If my friend had read my speech he would have found that my argument went to the effect that the protection system deals with conditions and not with boundary lines. It deals with the philosophy of economic politics without any reference whatever to geographical lines.

Mr. COX. Then, of course, if that is the definition, my friend is in favor of his philosophy being extended. It means to be reciprocal with Canada. If it be good philosophy for Canada, it is good philosophy to apply to Central America and South America and Mexico.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Undoubtedly, and wherever the conditions are the same. It is against the false conditions that destroy, where restrictions should apply and not against the locality. The gentleman will see——

Mr. COX. I get your idea.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. It is a good one, is it not? [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. Yes; but it is a little remote and nebulous. [Laughter and applause.] But I think I get it.

Mr. Chairman, I have not much charity for my friend from Ohio. I have for my friend from Nevada, for he does not know as much as my friend from Ohio. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Ohio is not ignorant of the conditions in regard to reciprocity. The same conditions would bring European countries here by the aid of the vapor of water and by the telegraph.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If my friend will permit another interruption, I will ask that his time be extended.

Mr. COX. Well, do it now, so that I can be certain, so as to be courteous. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I will ask an extension of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended without limit, as I want to interrupt him for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. I want to call my friend's attention——

Mr. BOOTHMAN. Mr. Chairman, while I would like to listen to the gentleman from New York all day, I must interpose an objection, as it is not just to other gentlemen in the limited time remaining.

Mr. COX. That settles it.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I beg my friend's pardon; the time has been extended, as I understand it.

In 1848 a measure for complete reciprocity passed this House without a dissenting voice, being voted for and supported both by Democrats and Republicans alike, the understanding being then that it in no wise trenched upon the protective system.

Mr. COX. I would like to be permitted to answer the gentleman.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I beg my friend's pardon. I did not know that there had been objection. [Cries of "Go on!".]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair of opinion that the objection came too late.

Mr. COX. I do not desire to continue if there is an objection. I dislike very much to take the time of other gentlemen.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Now permit me a moment.

Of course in this matter, and a part of my proposition was that, the tariff fence should be extended around Canada and extend the system along and around the border, they adopting the same tariff system as against the world, where different conditions prevail, should we not extend a hand to them?

Mr. COX. I give you my hand on that. [The gentlemen shook hands.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Then we are making progress at last.

Mr. COX. I am with the gentleman, and by the doctrine of Richard Cobden and his club, and the same doctrine of John Stuart Mill, and the same doctrine of Robert J. Walker and his tariff, I would advocate for Canada the liberality of our exchanges. I congratulate and welcome the honorable gentleman within the bosom of the good old reciprocity and revenue-reform party. [Applause.] And I will give out for him, before I get through, a hymn to sing that will warm his heart so as to make us thoroughly harmonious.

The gentleman from Ohio, who is a most erudite and eloquent gentleman, joined with the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SYMES], who is also both eloquent and learned—and, by the way, Colorado is a sort of English colony—in deprecating the Anglomania which leads members here to oppose the Tory protection party of England and Canada. I hope to see my friends' efforts bring fruit in reciprocity with Canada, and thus aid Ohio and Colorado and all of us; and such fruit that will give wealth, content, and cordiality for both countries, as Cobden and Chevalier did for England and France, and as Cobden and Robert J. Walker did for England and America when they shook hands across the Atlantic, the one by the tariff of 1846, and the other by the repeal of the corn laws. They thus gave a splendid aggrandizement to their respective countries.

OHIO AND THE SOUTH.

The picture the gentleman from Ohio drew from my native State is a proud record of the achievements of her people. During this centennial season it was peculiarly appropriate; but when it is considered that her prosperity is due in part to unequal laws, there is not so much pride in the comparison which he institutes between Ohio and the South. Why, let me ask, if these laws be equal—as tax laws should be in a common union—should these results be so diverse? Why boast of results which are the results of Federal disfavor to one section and favor to another? Is it fair that strength should forever aid the strong? Shall wrong hold sway forever? No, no; the gentleman following the vaticinations of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] sees the iron that is sleeping in the sunless chambers of the southern earth, awake, and through its agencies will yet bless the South beyond its fondest dreams.

The attempt of the gentleman from Ohio to excite indignation against Democrats who were in sympathy with the corn laws, of which Cobden was the leading champion, shows that he is not yet altogether in sympathy with the men who favored that repeal.

TORIES AND PROTECTIONISTS RUINED IRELAND.

That class of men for five centuries held England in its thrall, and, what was worse, mercilessly persecuted Ireland. They were protectionists of the most intense and grasping sort. It was while these Tories ruled that they destroyed the labor of Ireland by exactions and persecutions only equaled by the myrmidons of Cromwell. They not only confiscated like Cromwell, but they did worse. Their protection, like that of the wolf to the lamb, struck down the woolen and other industries of Ireland.

The gentleman therefore places himself in line with the spoilers of Ireland in the past centuries and with the Salisburys and the Balfours of the present. He is in sympathy with the long list of Tory ministers, from Lord North down, who harassed and plundered that "saddest isle of the sea." [Applause.]

He places himself in so far as he can in sympathy with a party of aristocrats who, under the reign of the Georges, and the worst of the Georges—George the Third—produced the revolution which gave us independence, and who, with allies like our Indians—those hell-hounds of savage war—and the mercenary Hessian, made the early struggles of our fathers a long conflict against all the barbaric cruelty of the Tory protectionists and landlords. He arrays himself against that Liberal party, from whom the Whigs of our Revolution received their name. That party was led by Chatham, Barré, and Burke in the defense of our colonies against Tory trade restrictions, taxation and tyranny. The old Federal party was recruited, after our Revolution, from the Tories. During the war of 1812 that same Federal element sustained England against the Madisonian Democracy. To-day, the present Tory administration is fighting the Liberals of England and Ireland, who have Gladstone and Parnell at their head. The Tories are protectionists. They drove the English people in 1846 as they are now driving the Irish by every menace to their freedom and their prosperity—to the very point of starvation and insurrection. [Applause.]

LESSONS OF THE CORN-LAW REPEAL.

There are lessons here quite pertinent to the pending bill and debate. I crave your indulgence for dwelling on them.

For five centuries England blundered in fostering industry by restricting exports and forbidding imports. Her statesmen, like the Lotus-eaters of Tennyson, listened listlessly to the—

> Chant of an ill-used race that cleave the soil, > Storing their yearly little dues of wheat and wine and oil.

Her arousal came with a terrific revolution, producing clamors for bread and protests against starvation.

Up until 1846, when she began to reciprocate with us, the history of her corn laws is the history of a desperate struggle unexampled in our world.

Her first effort was to restrict the imports of foreign wheat, rye, barley, oats, and maize—different species of so-called "Corn"—so that she might have abundance and cheapness at home.

These early restrictions, from 1360 to 1688, were well intended. She was, during that period, an agricultural rather than a manufacturing country. She raised all the corn she consumed, and had a surplus. At that time any law against the importation of corn would have been inoperative. She was not then so foolish as to enact such laws.

We have upon our statutes some similar sops, quite as unsubstantial as they are insulting to our farmers.

But even with such legislation, she was hampering the natural force of her industry and trade. She was forming the habit of meddling and tinkering, by Parliamentary action, with the growth of her industries. She was raising up a favored class. Of course, it was done on the pretext of protection and patriotism, but it was done really for the aggrandizement of the rich landed proprietors. She built up great families and self-seeking monopolists; and this, sir, is our first lesson growing out of the corn laws. Strike out the words "agricultural monopolists," and insert "manufacturing monopolists," and leave the word "protection" stand, and you have the same combination here that throttled both commerce and agriculture there. It compelled the people to pay tribute to the lords of the land. [Applause.] In other words, it put money into the pockets of the few by crippling and destroying the industries of the many.

Then came another era of class government. It was that of an internal protective system. It was a system of bounties and penalties—bounties to the rich and penalties upon the poor, forbidding the purchase of corn in one market in order to dispose of it in another. It crowded out the middle men. The only result was one which ever follows the intermeddling of law with the natural course of trade—stagnation and decay.

More than one hundred years ago, contemporaneous with our own struggle for independence, these internal restrictions were effaced from English law. The protective system failed and free trade was established, but only within the circuit of the country's borders. In our Union we copied something from this example. Bounties were simply the price which the people paid for the lush growth of unremunerative labor. What the operatives of England paid for so many years to agriculture and its "splendid paupers," agriculture in this country has paid to the lords of the loom and the forge, who have been inspired with the same grasping avarice in their demand for enormous duties on manufactured articles.

It is not necessary, in drawing these lessons from English legislation, that I should discuss the justice of giving a bounty to one person or one class for encouragement and not to another. Absolute justice requires a bounty or a subsidy to every one, and when that paradisical epoch arrives there is a bounty to no one! If my neighbor pay a bounty to me equal to that which I pay to him, there is no benefit to any one, except to the tax-gatherer.

PROHIBITION OF CORN IN ENGLAND.

A hundred years ago the manufacturing and commercial interests of England began to arise with greater strength. New avenues of wealth opened from the colonies. The nation received an impulse of prosperity. The consumption of corn increased and prices rose correspondingly. Then began the prohibition of grain importation. The agricultural monopolists fancied that they were floating serenely upon the bosom of a Pactolus whose very sands were gold. They were deceived, just as the protectionists in this age and country deceive themselves. Corn laws began to appear in all the variety of their manipulations to outwit the natural laws of trade. Food became dear, but dear food did not bring high wages. Riots became common. Labor was ground down between the upper and nether mill-stone of protection. Then began a most terrific era in England. It had all the agonies of a tragedy.

Gaunt famine, like a skeleton, invaded laborers and tenants, even upon the very farms whence came the rich livings of the titled landlords. Wages declined, rents advanced, and wealth became more and more inequitably distributed. The rich grew richer and the poor poorer. Then came on the struggle which gave presage of relief. The landed interests were still dominant. The hungry population resented their exactions with a fury born of despair and death. Parliament was menaced. Cordons of the military surrounded St. Stephen's

CORN-LAW REPEALERS.

During this night of British gloom the protectionists of England were callous to every appeal and every interest of human life. Starvation has a wild logic of its own. Brave men arose. They questioned with stern and pitiless inquisition the legislation which taxed bread. The scales fell from their long-abused sight. Little legislative makeshifts were used to palliate the consummate evil and postpone the dreaded crisis. In vain the great families, led by the Duke of Wellington, who, like Brennus, threw his sword into the scale, attempted to withstand the current.

LEADERS OF THE PEOPLE AGAINST TORIES, ARISTOCRATS, AND PROTECTIONISTS.

Who led this warfare for the poor against the rich? Who gave it oratory, and dialectics, and song? Who voiced the disasters and cried aloud for the reform, for the repeal of these cruel laws? Chief among those who vindicated the rights of the poor against monopoly in this legislative war, in which he never rested for years, was Mr. Villiers, of Wolverhampton. He is an old, old man now. They have erected a monument to his memory, even in his life. I place his name before that of others, not less brave but more laggard, under whose leadership the repeal was consummated.

When that distinguished statesman, Sir Robert Peel, was denounced by his party in the Commons for the act of repeal he cried out defiantly, and yet how tenderly and proudly:

I shall leave a name execrated by every monopolist who, from less honorable motives, clamors for protection because it conduces to his own individual benefit; but it may be that I shall leave a name sometimes remembered with expressions of good-will in the abodes of those whose lot it is to labor, and to earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow, when they shall recruit their exhausted strength with abundant and untaxed food, the sweeter because it is no longer leavened by the sense of injustice.

There were other men who championed the demand of the people for the "cheap loaf," and whose names are handed down honorably among the poor of England, whose "untaxed food was all the sweeter because it was no longer leavened by the sense of injustice."

OTHER CHAMPIONS IN AMERICA AND ENGLAND.

In the long roll of these worthies, champions too of anti-slavery in America as well as England, are Cobbett, Prentice, W. J. Fox, Hume, Potter, Dr. Bowring, Sumner, Beecher, Garrison, Phillips, and others. But why make the catalogue? That night of English wrong was set thick with stars—a whole constellation. Cobden among them was shining resplendently as a star of the first magnitude. [Applause.] Cobden was not a nobleman. He was not an hereditary legislator. He was born of the people. He was the son of a yeoman. He was brought up to trade. It was his business training, together with observation abroad, while a partner in a Manchester cotton-mill, that made him so cogent in debate and so simple and earnest in his devotion to the cause of the people and to the "cheap loaf." [Applause.]

EULOGY OF COBDEN, FRIEND OF AMERICA.

Mr. Chairman, I should be derelict as a member of Congress, or as a citizen of the United States, if I did not, even in this feeble way, vindicate the splendid fame of Richard Cobden. He was not merely a friend of the poor when they needed friends, but he was a distinguished economist when economy was thundered from the hustings for the relief of the starving. More than all these, by his speeches, writings, diplomacy, and parliamentary efforts, he has done more than any other Englishman to hold up the institutions of our own country, not merely for the indulgence of mankind, but for their imitation and admiration. Nor were the encomiums which he bestowed upon our country born of a mercenary or trading spirit. He had a genuine love for America. He twice visited us. He denounced those who had depreciated our character and slandered our people.

In a volume of his writings, which I have in my hand, there is a comparison between Great Britain and America. With what fervor he turns to the industrial, economical, and foreign peaceful policies of America, while with the live coal of a seer on his lip he bids at distance our future, Hail! He does this with a pride which knows no selfishness and with a humanity that regards no isolation. England and America were, in his view, bound together in peaceful fetters with the strongest of all ligatures that can bind two nations—commercial interests and the destiny of representative governments. [Applause.] He took pride in the discharge of our public debt. Though he found in America a rival with his own country and analyzed the disadvantages of the position of England in comparison with America, he saw in the unlimited extent of our unsettled territory a means of employing capital and labor with which the little isles of Great Britain would in vain strive to compete.

He was not insensible to the fact that the Englishman was a born aristocrat, with an insatiable love of caste, which he said pervaded every degree from the highest to the lowest; but he believed that in the course of time such changes would come through education and suffrage as to bring England upon the roster of genuine republican states. Every reform that England has made in the interests of her people, and for her colonial advancement, found Richard Cobden its friend and his gifted speech its ally. And it comes with an ill grace from an American, whether native or adopted, to blur the escutcheon of this champion of America and this honest friend of the people. [Applause.]

I had the honor of being on the committee which welcomed Cobden to America. He visited this Hall. He was received with as much if not more welcome from the Republican than from the Democratic side of the Chamber. No one made his name a reproach, for he had been the friend of our Union. He had been the companion of John Bright, the Quaker manufacturer of Birmingham, in denouncing with resonant eloquence and virile logic the infamies of protection.

I must beg my Irish friends to remember that Daniel O'Connell spoke for the repeal as the friend of the English and Irish people. Speaking at Manchester, he demanded to know "why, if the corn laws are good to rescue a people from wretchedness, they do not rescue the people of Ireland? If these protective laws give employment and high wages," said he, "why do they not give them in agricultural Ireland?" Subsequently, in demanding to know what the corn laws were for, he answered his own question by saying, "to put money into the pockets of the landlords—not the money of the Russians, the Danes, or the Swedes, but that of their fellow-countrymen."

POETRY OF THE REPEALERS.

Seconding these efforts of the tribunes of the people came the blacksmith poet, Ebenezer Elliott, and the "Voices from the Crowd," by Charles Mackay. These corn-law rhymes not only denounced the exactions by which bread was made dear to the people, but they looked forward to that influx of grain from the new hemisphere—America—by which the loaf would be cheapened and the people saved from starvation.

These men disdained any compromise. They moved on to victory; they found the realm of England in discrowned and hunger-ridden anarchy. The time was "ripe, and rotten-ripe," for change.

RESULTS OF THE REPEAL.

They gave it comparative quiet and prosperity, and progress followed the victory. More than that, so far as America was concerned they gave us lessons by which we were mutually bound and by which our values were immensely enhanced. The Democracy of the United States reciprocated. In the interest of the people of both nations a great benefaction fell like manna in a wilderness of selfishness. [Applause.] The event justifies the truth that nature, in her overflowing goodness, had provision against scarcity and famine; so that when crops fail in a small area like Great Britain, or are insufficient to supply her needs, there is lavish abundance and a surplus in other lands, in the valleys of the Mississippi and its tributary streams. The law to which Virgil referred two thousand years ago as the "eternal federation" by which Rome grew great, is the same law in modern days. Progress has given to the phrase a miraculous meaning, for it multiplied the loaf for the multitude. The result here was not merely a home market for home product, but the widest extent of surface for production in our own land, causing less danger of scarcity and an abundance of the necessaries and conveniences of life for importation abroad.

The repeal of the corn laws and the tariff of 1846 was the consecrated protest of benevolent legislation. They vindicated the providence of the All-loving Father, whereby the excess of one land and its opulent harvests, and the diversified labor of the people of all countries compensate for the deficiencies of each other.

The same arguments which are used to-day by the protectionists here were used by the protectionists in England to prevent the repeal of the corn laws. The old story of the home market, and especially in the contingency of foreign war and the dependence upon another country for supplies was used in the Parliament of England just as now in the Congress of the United States. They were used in vain. England could no more be independent of foreign supply for her bread than America could be independent of England in the sale of her grain and cotton.

The fruitfulness of labor was increased, toil itself was mitigated, misfortunes were avoided, and the benefits of the repeal, through international dependence and reciprocity, gave a new impulse to both countries. It opened a market for English goods here, while it enlarged our market for our product abroad. It did not injure either country. It aided both beyond all the dreams of avarice.

During the twenty years preceding 1849 the exports of British and Irish productions had increased 33½ per cent. for each decade. From 1849 to 1859 the increase was 105 per cent. It is fair to presume that by 1859 English industry had become adjusted to the new conditions. Nevertheless, for the period up to the Franco-Prussian war there was an increase of exports of 45 per cent. The value of the exports per capita in 1849 was $10.93; in 1859 it had more than doubled, being $22.11. In 1869 it had risen to $29.79. In 1878, under a high tariff, while we Americans were making great boasts of our exports, their value per capita was only $12. Nor have the working people of England been routed out of the mills by foreign pauper labor. In cotton manufacture the number of hands employed increased from 330,924 in 1850 to 479,512 in 1874. The woolen trade for the same period nearly doubled its force. So also the flax industry.

INTERDEPENDENCY OF NATIONS.

God never made an independent man nor allowed an independent nation. Men and nations must lean upon each other. The very variety of the growth of nations with the staple of every soil make it the duty of legislators to exclude monopoly from the family of nations as selfishness from the family of individuals.

BENEFICENCE OF THE TARIFF OF 1846.

There never was a tariff during whose continuance there was so much advancement in all that makes up the wealth of nations as our low tariff of 1846. Under its provisions farmers got better prices for wheat, grain, wool, etc., than they have averaged under the present tariff. Manufactures multiplied more rapidly, farm values increased much faster, and all of our people had full employment. During that period, from 1850 to 1860–'61, a tramp was as unknown as a "trust," a strike had no place in our political lexicon, the word "lockout" was infrequent, and the word "boycott" was not known. There were no conflicts between capital and labor. The country became harmonious so far as its policy was concerned, because it was just.

It has been said, ignorantly, that Robert J. Walker changed his views before he died as to the policy of the tariff measure so honorably associated with his name. I knew Governor Walker when he was Secretary of the Treasury, and intimately. As our Globe-RECORD shows, when he was made governor of Kansas, I followed his judgment in the crisis of Kansas and the Lecompton constitution. He was a man of remarkable genius for administration. His mind was in inverse proportion to his body. I had occasion to know that he never deviated from the doctrine of his great report on revenues of 1846. To make this assurance of record here I refer to a pamphlet letter of his handed to me by his son, General Duncan S. Walker, dated November 30, 1867, after the war, and after comparison could be made between his system of 1846 and the high tariffs of 1861 and subsequently. This pamphlet was a defense of our resources to enhance our credit; a plea for the reduction of our taxes and the disbanding of our army of tax-gatherers. He would have reduced our revenue to $244,000,000 a year, and have derived it from three sources—a tariff for revenue, an excise on wines, malt and spirituous liquors, and tobacco, and a tax on our national banks.

I print here what I may hereafter allude to more at length, namely, his résumé of our experience with his tariff for revenue:

> Under the tariff of 1846, as shown by the census, our wealth increased from 1850 to 1860, 126.45 per cent., whereas, from 1840 to 1850, the increase was only 64 per cent.; from 1830 to 1840, 42 per cent.; and from 1820 to 1830, 41 per cent. So also, from 1850 to 1860 our agricultural products increased 95 per cent., and our manufactures 87 per cent., being in both cases nearly double any preceding ratio of increase. So also, our exports, imports, and revenue nearly tripled in the same period of time, and our domestic trade rose nearly in the same ratio. This augmented ratio is not the result of increase of population, which, from 1850 to 1860, was less than 36 per cent. The Irish famine was supposed by my opponents to account for the increase the first year, although the decreased price paid abroad that year for our cotton nearly equaled the additional sum paid by England for our breadstuffs and provisions. But the next year and the next, before any gold had reached here from California, our exports and revenue went on augmenting in a corresponding ratio, rising in eight years from $22,000,000, under the tariff of 1842, to $64,000,000 under the tariff of 1846.

These results were wonderful, and our Committee on Ways and Means have considered under these lights this remarkable policy, ad valorem and all, in the framing of their measure. It was a novelty to kings and oligarchies. It exacted the largest duty from capital and the least from labor, and therefore it should have remained, at least in principle, for all the emergencies of our Republic.

A SCOTCHMAN'S HOROSCOPE—OUR FINANCIAL SUICIDE.

In glancing at the cold statement in McCulloch's Commercial Dictionary, under the head of "New York," I find from that frigid Scotchman and statist thus summing up of the effect of the great commercial reform during the administration of Sir Robert Peel:

> He says that the last and greatest of all changes was the change in the corn laws. It had a powerful influence in the United States. Mr. Polk's Government having free trade by these and other circumstances succeeded in carrying a comparatively liberal tariff, to take effect from first of December, 1846; and this tariff kept its ground until 1857, when it was superseded by a still more liberal one. But the downfall of the tariff by which it was carried was quickly followed by a reimposition of high duties by the act of Congress of March 2, 1861, and this again by the outbreak of the civil war.

But—

> the bulk of the American people have never been supposed to be blind or indifferent to their own necessities; and these they may be assured will be best promoted by reverting to, as soon as possible, and maintaining a system which enables them to sell in the dearest and to buy in the cheapest markets. If they retain high duties, they will fall wholly on themselves and on no one else, and the less they buy from foreigners the less they will be able to export to them.

In other words, as I have often preached in this House, we can not continue to sell our surplus, which is growing every day by reason of our increasing army of labor, unless we buy from others. A one-sided arrangement leads to impoverishment, overproduction for home needs, and consequent mortgages and bankruptcy.

Mark the words which I cite from this cold statistician. He warns us that to retain high duties they will fall wholly upon ourselves, and on no one else.

Or, since gentlemen prefer figures of poetry to figures of arithmetic, I might well apply the metaphor of Byron about the struck eagle stretched upon the plain, who viewed his own feather on the fatal dart, winged against the shaft that quivered in his heart. [Applause.]

Indeed, sir, we are already feeling the pangs of the wound that we ourselves have made; but it is all the keener to feel them when we reflect that we have furnished the pinion which impelled the steel, and that the very plumage which had warmed our eagle's nest drinks the life drop of his bleeding breast.

RECIPROCAL PROSPERITY.

England grew rich and America prospered by reciprocity. And when this reciprocity was broken on our part by inordinate tariffs, we failed proportionately, and the history of our tariff, shown in this debate, illustrates the fact that our tariffs, when they are low, give advantages and advancement. When they are high it is otherwise.

Patriotism and economy are not convertible terms. Economy means the law of the house, the law of supply and demand. It means cash and credit, not a banner nor a border.

Every people must trade abroad. Every individual is dependent upon some other. If he be a luxurious man, he must have jewels from Golconda polished in Amsterdam. His delicate neckerchief must tie him to the loom of Jacquard. The spices to stimulate his appetite come from the ancient seats of Oriental power. His cigar is from Cuba and Manila; his coffee from Arabia, Java, and Brazil. China gives him tea, and Cuba sugar. He will have his clothes, in spite of laws, out of the broadcloth of France and England, and his wife her dresses, of silk and satin, from Lyons, provided always they are offered on better terms; while for the man who is not a bon vivant or a rich man, the sail and steam of traffic is in perpetual unrest to relieve his burdens, cheapen his comforts, and provide his necessaries.

Therefore liberal policies as to trade, while in our country always contemplating a revenue for an economic administration of the Government, should enlarge the area of trade and stimulate labor unto richer harvests.

No man with a particle of reasoning in his composition can say that abundance with a large market is a curse, or scarcity with a narrow market a blessing.

The elements of England which overcame the willful obstinacy of Anglo-Saxon legislators brought mankind together and gave to the producer of corn in America his splendid market and its quick returns by steam and telegraph, and to the daily toilers of England it answered our Lord's prayer for their "daily bread."

Great Britain was forced to abandon her extreme protective policy only when the country was brought to the verge of bankruptcy, starvation, and revolution. Her protectionists, as early as 1842, made the same arguments as those made in this House by our protectionists. They predicted that the reduction of the British tariff would shake the social relations of the country to their very foundations, subvert the whole system of society, lower wages, throw great quantities of land out of cultivation, render it impossible for the government to raise taxes, and reduce the laborer to a lower scale in life. Nothing of the kind happened.

THE ENGLISH FLAG ON THE SEA.

Among other predictions were those of Disraeli and other Tories that the ship-building of Great Britain would vanish, but never in all history has there been seen such a stupendous result as that which followed the repeal of restrictions on her ships. Her shipping rose from 3,400,000 tons in 1848 to over 8,000,000 tons in 1883, and it is still rising, while we have lost all of our foreign shipping.

OUR OCEAN TONNAGE LOST.

It is the saddest of our experiences as a nation that our flag under navigation laws that will not let us buy, and our tariff laws that will not let us build, has ceased to kiss the breezes of other than our inland and coasting trades.

> Dies iræ, dies illa,
> Solvet sæclum in favilla.

The degradation of our commerce is like the obscuration of a star in the sky. It is not a partial, but a total eclipse, a lost Pleiad without even the phantasy of a nebulous cloud to reassure us of the return of our days of commercial glory on the sea.

A PICTURE OF PROSPERITY.

In 1841, when Sir Robert Peel took office, there was no interest, manufacturing or otherwise, that was not depressed, no property that was not depreciated, no seaport in which ships were not rotting at the wharf, no agricultural labor that was not working on starvation wages and parochial relief; the revenue was insufficient to meet the national expenses and bankruptcy menaced the country. All at once, as by some enchanter's wand, agriculture became prosperous, rents were increased, manufactures and employment were extended, wages were raised, the revenue was enhanced, property was improved, and taxation was lessened. Every successive movement in the amelioration of the tariff of Great Britain up to and after the repealing act of 1846 showed advancement in all the elements that make up the happiness and wealth of nations. [Applause.]

THE FARMING INTERESTS.

It is easily shown that not more than 5 per cent. of the labor of the country is affected by our present tariff in the way of protection. Other members have shown the relation which the agriculturist bears to the tariff, and they have shown that he is not protected at all. But, on the other hand, he is at the mercy of other countries, with their cheap forms of labor. He must sell his crops at prices fixed by the pauper labor, not only of Europe, but of Asia and Africa, since the price of wheat in this country is regulated by the price in the European markets. The whole world contributes its supplies to those markets, and the peasants of Russia, Hungary, and India, with their cheaper labor, are rivals of our farmers. Therefore, our farmers are in direct competition with the cheapest labor in the world.

The Indian fellah, with his 6 pence a day for his labor, and the Russian serf, with something less, compete with our farmer, whose product is subject, in addition to a charge for transportation through inland to seaboard and three thousand miles of water besides, to the markets which fix the prices of his stuffs. When you consider that, in addition to all this, he has to pay the tariff-increased price for every protected article he buys, you can well understand what the protective system does for him. It throttles him. It paralyzes the four million of farmers who are and should be the mainstay of the country. It is no exaggeration, perhaps, when one of our humorists in Georgia wags his funny tongue about the infant industry that gets its slice of bounty, and "takes a powerful long time to get grown." [Laughter.]

When a man—

Says he—goes to one of these manufacturing cities he finds everybody strutting around, and the banks full of money, and the land worth $200 a front foot; but just let Congress talk about reducing the tariff, and they scrouge up and pull a small bottle from under their coat tails and cry out, "I am an infant—a poor little infant! Ain't you gwine to protect me? Are you gwine to take away my pap and leave me an orfen?"

[Laughter.]

Another one of our humorists in writing of and from the great West intimates that the farmer has the priceless boon of liberty. But it is liberty to pay war prices for everything he wants, and to sell his crops for less and less year after year; liberty to pay big prices for machinery, help, clothing, and everything else he buys, and to ride into town on a December day, accompanied by the cold remains of an assassinated hog, and then to be told that pork had gone down to 4 cents! He properly regarded such a ride, in the society of a hog that died by one's own hand, as depressing. And yet it was that same animal that had been loved so well in infancy, hid down in the cellar so you could not hear him squeal when he was killed, and which the farmer afterwards helped to scrape with a case-knife, so that even in death he would be a source of pride. He is depressed by the thought that all of that hog is swallowed up by the price of the protected frock he hoped to carry home to his wife.

Mr. Chairman, I am not yet alarmed at the India competition in wheat, with which we are threatened. Our Department of Agriculture in its Report No. 46, November, 1887, has a paper which is calculated to allay any present alarm on this subject, even in spite of the increased importation. Nor do I care to discuss at the present time the varying prices of our wheat and other grain stuffs, or the ample surplus that under every circumstance and condition we have for exportation. Our prices have been remunerative and the quantities enormous.

A table which I have before me will show that from 1872 to 1886 the United States has furnished in grain and flour 51.10 per cent. more than one-half of the whole of the wheat surplus of the world, that is absorbed by the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

The largest national product since 1874 is annually harvested in our country. France stands in the second rank, but imports more than she exports. India comes third, and Russia occupies the fourth rank The table will show the various relative proportions.

My chief object in referring to these matters now is to show the impulse which was given to the accrued product of our soil by the repeal of the corn laws and the enactment of the tariff of 1846.

EXPORTS OF CORN AND COTTON BEFORE AND AFTER RECIPROCITY.

In a table which I have prepared I have taken the exports of wheat and corn alone, including flour and meal. I have tabulated them in five-year periods.

In 1830, at the end of the five years, we exported over 23,000,000 bushels of wheat, and more than 6,500,000 bushels of corn.

These exports grew in half-decennial periods, until in 1845, preceding the great reciprocity treaty between Great Britain and the United States, when the wheat export was over 34,000,000, and the corn about 8,000,000.

Now mark, sir, the marvelous increase which, in spite of the Tories of England and their allies here, resulted from the liberalities of Cobden and his allies of the Corn Law League.

The five years ending in 1850 show our wheat export at over 71,500,000 bushels, and our corn nearly 54,000,000. So that almost at once, compared with the five years ending in 1845, we more than doubled our wheat exportation and had more than six times as much of corn exportation. Since 1850 the figures are still more marvelous. So that at the end of the five years ending in 1885 our exported wheat amounted to 608,000,000 bushels and our corn to nearly 279,000,000 of bushels. And since that time the stupendous energy of our soil and enterprise of our farmers can be traced directly to the liberalities of interchange championed by the Cobdens of England. Is it for this great benefaction to the teeming West, with its fat glebe and stalwart farmers, that these men of 1846 are reproached by their Tory allies in America?

It is also as true with respect to the production and export of cotton as with respect to the exportation of grain. A grand impulse was given to that staple by the reciprocal laws of 1846.

Going back to 1830, when our annual production was only 1,000,000 bales and our exportation 772,000, we find that after 1848–'49 we had 2,808,000 production and 2,226,000 exportation, while during the last year our production was 6,500,000 bales and our exportation 4,500,000!

Here is to be found the wealth of our magnificent soil, whose surplus has enabled us not only to pay off our great indebtedness, but, under hampered conditions and in spite of the restrictions of our tariffs, most unnaturally exacting and cruel, to assume among the powers of the earth the station that we to-day occupy.

It would seem that there is no argument that can be made from our authentic statistics cogent enough to persuade the selfishness of some men even into the indulgence of self-love. Self-love has been defined as that which would lead a man to eat his own dinner and allow his neighbor to eat his, while selfishness is defined to be the appetite of a man for his own dinner and a desire to eat that of his neighbor.

THE AD ABSURDUM.

It would be a very difficult task to persuade men who are selfish to indulge in self-love, much less in disinterestedness. Perhaps the most cogent reasoning upon this subject would be after the manner of our humorists, known as the ad absurdam, which Aristotle ranks among the best rudiments of logic.

We have a humorist known as "Bill Nye." I was about to read for your relief his description, exaggerated somewhat, of the farmer's life out West. I forbear.

A MEMBER. Give it to us.

Mr. COX. I will print it, as good reading on a dry topic. This clever writer has been acting as a rural gentleman. He has ideas of stock-growing, garden-sauce, and other home-spun matters about farming in the West. I quote:

"Well, farmin' is like runnin' a paper in regards to some things. Every feller in the world will take and turn in and tell you how to do it, even if he don't know a blame thing about it. There ain't a man in the United States to-day that don't secretly think he could run airy one if his other business busted on him, whether he knows the difference between a new milch cow and a horse hay-rake or not. We had one of these embroidered night-shirt farmers come from town better'n three years ago. Been a toilet-soap man and done well, and so he came out and bought a farm that had nothing to it but a fancy house and barn, a lot of medder in the front yard, and a southern aspect. The farm was no good. You couldn't raise a disturbance on it. Well, what does he do? Goes and gits a passle of slim-tailed yeller cows from New Jersey, and aims to handle cream and diversified farming. Last year the cuss sent a load of cream over and tried to sell it at the new crematory while the funeral and hollercost was goin' on. I may be a sort of a chump myself, but I read my paper and don't get left like that."

"What are the prospects for farmers in your State?"

"Well, they are pore. Never was so pore, in fact, sence I've been there. Folks wonder why boys leaves the farm. My boys left so as to get protected, they said, and so they went into a clothing store, one of 'em, and one went into hardware, and one is talkin' protection in the Legislature this winter. They said that farmin' was gittin' to be like fishin' and huntin', well enough for a man that has means and leisure, but they couldn't make a livin' at it, they said. Another boy is in a drug store, and the man that hires him says he is a royal feller."

"Kind of a castor royal feller," I said, with a shriek of laughter.

He waited until I had laughed all I wanted to, and then he said:

"I've always hollered for high tariff in order to hyst the public debt, but now that we've got the national debt coopered, I wish they'd take a little back at mine. I've put in fifty years farmin'. I never drank licker in any form. I've worked from ten to eighteen hours a day; been economical in cloze and never went to a show more'n a dozen times in my life; raised a family and learned upwards of two hundred calves to drink out of a tin pail without blowing all their vittles up my sleeve. My wife worked alongside o' me sewin' new seats on the boys' pants, skimmin' milk, and even helpin' me load hay.

"For forty years we toiled along together and hardly got time to look into each other's faces or dared to stop and get acquainted with each other. Then her health ailed. Ketched cold in the spring-house, prob'ly skimmin' milk and washin' pans and scaldin' pails and spankin' butter. Anyhow, she took in a long breath one day while the doctor and me was watchin' her, and she says to me, 'Henry,' says she, 'I've got a chance to rest,' and she put one tired, wore-out hand on top of the other tired, wore-out hand, and I knew she'd gone where they don't work all day and do chores all night.

"I took time to kiss her then. I'd been too busy for a good while previous to that, and then I called in the boys. After the funeral it was too much for them to stay around and eat the kind of cookin' we had to put up with, and nobody spoke up around the house as we used to. The boys quit whistlin' around the barn and talked kind of low by themselves about going' to town and gettin' a job.

"They're all gone now, and the snow is four feet deep on mother's grave up there in the old berryin' ground."

Then both of us looked out of the car window quite a long time without saying anything.

"I don't blame the boys for going into something else, long's other things pays better; but I say—and I say what I know—that the man who holds the prosperity of this country in his hands, the man that actually makes money for other people to spend, the man that eats three good, simple, square meals a day and goes to bed at 9 o'clock, so that future generations with good blood and cool brains can go from his farm to the Senate and Congress and the White House—he is the man that gets left at last to run his farm, with nobody to help him but a hired man and a high protective tariff.

"The farms in our State are mortgaged for over $700,000,000. Ten of our Western States—I see by the papers—have got about three billion and a half mortgages on their farms, and that don't count the chattel mortgages filed with town clerks on farm machinery, stock, wagons, and even crops, by gosh! that ain't two inches high under the snow. That's what the prospects is for farms now. The Government is rich, but the men that made it, the men that fought perarie fires and perarie wolves and Injuns and potato-bugs and blizzards, and has paid the war debt and pensions and everything else, and hollered for the Union and Republican party and high tariff and anything else that they was told to, is left high and dry this cold winter with a mortgage of $7,500,000,000 on the farms they have carned and saved a thousand times over."

Yes; but look at the glory of sending from the farm the future President, the future Senator, and the future member of Congress.

That looks well on paper, but what does it really amount to? Soon as a farmer boy gits in a place like that he forgets the soil that produced him and holds his head as high as a hollyhock. He bellers for protection to everybody but the farmer, and while he sails round in a highty-tighty room with a fire in it night and day, his father on the farm has to kindle his own fire in the morning with elm slivers and has to wear his son's lawn-tennis suit next to him or freeze to death, and he has to milk in an old gray shawl that has held that member of Congress when he was a baby, by gorry! and the old lady has to sojourn through the winter in the flannels that Silas wore at the riggatter before he went to Congress.

So I say, and I think that Congress agrees with me, Damn a farmer, anyhow!

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, we should strike out all after the enacting clause of this bill and pass an amendment to tax all that the farmer produces. Would it not compel our manufacturer to pay the foreign price of it, and the tariff of 40 or 50 per cent. besides? Perhaps this would benefit the farmer. But how would it operate as to the manufacturer and the rest of the people? And where is the difference between such a tariff and the present one, except this, that the farmer's ox is now gored, and in the other case it would be the ox of the manufacturer? [Applause.]

CORN-LAW REPEAL POETRY.

I am sure the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUTTERWORTH], who joined his eloquent voice in the denunciation of the Cobdenites and the Democracy, must have observed how Tory protection was impoverishing and decimating the Canadian Dominion for the lack of reciprocity. He must have observed the need of just such poetry for the North as the gentleman from Michigan quoted so exultantly in the conclusion of his speech for the South.

By way of reciprocity, also, I would give the gentleman from Ohio a little gem which he can quote with reference to protection anent the fish question, that he saw illustrated in Canada, and which is but a faint copy of what we have in this country.

One of our own native singers, known as the "Sweet Singer of Michigan," has given us a touching ode about the alligator. I commend it to the gentleman from Ohio, who has been studying the fish question in Canada:

How cheerfully he seems to grin,
How neatly spreads his claws,
And welcomes little fishes in
With gently smiling jaws!

[Laughter.]

CORDEN AND HIS CLUB SYMPATHIZERS WITH OUR UNION.

It must not be forgotten that the men who founded the Cobden Club were the men who, through the darkest hours of our own civil conflict were, in and out of Parliament, devoted to our Union. It was this "School of Manchester" that prevented the English cabinet from joining with the French Emperor in recognizing the Southern Confederacy and breaking the blockade. What ingrates, therefore, are these Republican lovers of the Union who join the Tories to attack the Cobden Club. These Cobden promoters of interchanges, by which both countries were benefited and neither injured, or who, in the language of General Garfield in this House, desired a point of stable equilibrium upon our tariff, with a rate not so high as to keep foreign producers altogether out of our markets or to stimulate the unnatural growth of manufactures, but who, protective step by step, reach forward to the goal of free trade—these are the men who are the object of these tirades, in order to prejudice the ignorant against the liberal tariff reformers of our country.

LEADING REPUBLICANS; REVENUE REFORMERS.

Why should you Republican gentlemen be so indignant that members upon this side are members of the Cobden Club? If Cobden and his club favor a tariff for revenue, without the burdens which belong to a protective system, it only shows how sensible Cobden and the club were and are. Have not some of your best men favored such ideas? Has it not been proven in this debate that such Republican leaders as President Garfield, Mr. Blaine, and others who were their lieutenants and subordinates, were marching in the same direction? It matters not whether they belonged to an English club or not. It matters more what their sentiments were upon this theme. It proves nothing; but it is an ad hominem, and an estoppel upon your bravado. I challenge the other side to deny what I assert to be the truth, that the Forty-second Congress, which elected Mr. Blaine its Speaker, was organized on a liberal and not upon a protective basis. It ill becomes those who sustained Garfield and Blaine to call us to an account for the same ideas to which those Republican leaders gave their adhesion.

I now assert that Blaine virtually made a bargain with the revenue reformers shortly before his second election to the Speakership. It was to this effect: that if they would not interfere with him in that election he would give them a majority of the Committee on Ways and Means of the Forty-second Congress. [Applause.]

This compact was made—

Writes a gentleman who knows the fact—and entered into at the Fifth Avenue Hotel during one of our revenue-reform meetings. Mr. Blaine—was not at the meeting, but he was at the hotel, and he came there because the meeting was to be held there, as he told me at the time. He said, further, that he came expressly to see us. We wer all good Republicans then. It was in our power to make "Jordan a hard road to travel" for any candidate for Speaker against whom we should unite. We had not thought of uniting against Mr. Blaine, but we had thought of taking steps to give revenue reform a push in the House, and naturally the Speakership was the place to begin. Mr. Blaine knew that the meeting was to be held, and he came or "happened in" just at the right time, but, as I have said, did not come to the meeting.

He says—

He sent for me and asked us what we wanted. I told him that we wanted some tariff-reform legislation, and to that end we wanted a Committee on Ways and Means that could be depended upon. He said that he had always treated us fairly—and that he would do so still, but he could not give us the chairman. He did not say in so many words that he would give us a majority of the committee, but since the only way to get any reform legislation was by having a majority, we understood that "treating us fairly" meant that precise thing, but that the other side would have the chairman. Otherwise we should have carried out our original intention of selecting a Western candidate for Speaker and supporting him with all the votes and influence we could command.

When Congress met Mr. Blaine was chosen without opposition. A few days later, and long before the committees were appointed, EUGENE HALE introduced his bills to repeal the duty on salt and coal. The latter was, I believe, turned over to General Farnsworth, HALE agreeing to support it. The debate and the vote you remember very well, because you took a lively hand in it. Both bills passed by two-thirds majority, as I recollect.

This was at the short (first) session of the Forty-second Congress, beginning March 4, 1871. At the beginning of the second session the committees were announced, and, sure enough, Mr. Blaine had given us a majority, five of our men to four of the other side. Mr. Burchard, of Illinois, was put on, at my suggestion, as a Republican revenue-reformer who could be relied upon. Mr. Finkelnburg, of Missouri, was put on at Mr. GROSVENOR'S suggestion.

When the protectionists began to complain that they had been betrayed, Mr. Blaine's answer was, that he was the organ of the House and not of his own private views, whatever they might be; that the House had voted by very large majorities for the repeal of duties on coal and salt, and that he considered that an instruction to him to make the Committee of Ways and Means in harmony with those votes. This was really unanswerable, but if Mr. KELLEY and his following in the House had known what had gone before, what had taken place at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, they would not have been so easily appeased.

[Laughter.]

We, who knew about the Fifth Avenue Hotel conference, always believed that Mr. Blaine put Mr. HALE forward to introduce the salt and coal bills in order that he might afterwards say to Mr. KELLEY and the high-tariff, that the House had instructed him, etc. It is certain that Blaine helped all he could to get the bills passed. General John F. Farnsworth can testify fully on that point.

That distinguished statesman and soldier I saw here a moment ago.

A MEMBER. He is here.

Mr. COX. I am happy to have his presence to set at rest this matter. I doubt not he will confirm my statement and that of the other gentleman, my correspondent. [General Farnsworth bows acquiescence.] [Applause.] The gentleman bows his assent. The committee as constituted at that time had a liberal chairman, whose speeches indicate his tendency. But outside of the chairman, Mr. DAWES, of Massachusetts, there were three Democrats, Brooks, Kerr, and BECK, and two Republicans—Burchard and Finkelnburg, who gave a majority in favor of the reduction of the tariff according to the policy laid down by such advanced thinkers as Garfield, ALLISON, Logan, and others.

Now, sir, with what sort of grace and with what abundant arrogance these gentlemen, who are now arraying themselves with the relict feathers of the "Plumed Knight," sent from Paris and Florence, and saluting him as the great vindicator of protection against the heresies of President Cleveland—can these gentlemen from Maine and other States thrust any foreign club, even when it comes in the form of an Irish shillelah, under our eyes? [Laughter.] Let them deny the statement I make and I will produce the proof. The proof will show that their trusted leaders, if not all members of the Cobden Club, were as nearly associated in principle with it as any of the gentlemen who have been so trucnlently arraigned by the Tory protectionists of this House. [Applause.]

INVOCATIONS FOR THE DAWN.

I listened with rapturous delight to the murmurous river of breath which flowed so sweetly from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS]. I am sorry I do not see him here.

A MEMBER. Here he is.

Mr. COX. I am happy to see his roseate face. He made a gallant plea for American industry, capital, and labor against the whole world. That is the title of his pamphlet. It is a superb orchestra for a grand opera. His quiet style, his polished periods and musical tone enraptured his side of the House, but it did not listen to his speech as I did. It has not read it since, as I have, between the lines.

It convinced me of the futilities of placing shackles upon freedom. It confirmed my belief that a home market, when good at home, would be still better when extended. It was intended to show, although he did not seem to say so, that the bill which has been introduced by the Committee of Ways and Means was but a little thing, and, as he hinted, miscellaneously begotten in the dark. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Michigan never intended, as I judge by his conclusion—and I hope the House will bear with me until I reach it—to give forth the impression that we should be restricted in our markets, and that abundance was not a benefaction, and the deprivation of food and shelter and clothing not a curse. Oh, no! But in the conclusion of his speech truth crept in on his natural oratory, and lo! like Silas Wegg, he dropped into poetry. [Laughter.] As a devoted friend of freedom he could not conclude his eloquent speech without something ostensibly in favor of freedom. [Laughter.] What an invocation it was when he quoted the free-trade poetry of Charles Mackay! I applaud him for it; so did the Republican side applaud him, without knowing the covert and exquisite satire of his performance.

The gentleman saw in the limited relief of this bill "untoward circumstances to retard the South in her material progress." He rallied the South, and bid "her march forth unimpeded to a splendid industrial future." Rising to a splendid climax he sounded the advance for the South. He rejoiced in the "New South, a new industrial South, born of the throes of war, but full of hope and full of courage." Indeed, it was the consummate flower of oratory. He saw the South standing "with uplifted brow facing the dawn of a mighty future; her loins girt for a new race. With unfettered hands," and, ah! here, sir, came out the grand peroration of his splendid speech: "With unfettered hand she smites the earth! The fountains of unmeasured wealth gush forth! Beneath her feet she feels the stir of a marvelous life. Her pathway is already illumed with the light of blazing furnaces. Her heavens are aglow with the break of a new day! All hail its oncoming!"

And then, with one grand, magnificent bound he leaps upon his Bellerophon and rides the winged steed of his imperial fancy.

> Aid the dawning, tongue and pen;
> Aid it, hopes of honest men;
> Aid it, paper; aid it type;
> Aid it, for the hour is ripe,
> And our earnest must not slacken into play.

Then he calls on the "men of thought and the men of action" on every side to "clear the way." What way? The way which the muse of Mackay pointed out; the very way which Cobden had blazed out. "Clear the way," so that "when the sun shall reach the zenith of that glorious day" of British free trade, "the North and the South, cemented in the indissoluble bonds of commercial and fraternal unity," will march together for "grander industrial triumphs."

What a splendid burst of free-trade eloquence is this! Like the palm of Zealand, when it puts forth its flower, its sheaf bursts with a report that echoes through the forest like thunder! Even so, through the lumber regions of Michigan let this dawn of Cobden free-trade light up the bosky recesses and give cheer to the lumberman as he toils through wintry privations. Not satisfied with his own glowing sentences, the gentleman summons the poet of the Cobden Club, the friend of Cobden, the companion of Ebenezer Elliott, the co-worker with John Bright, the co-laborer with Sir Robert Peel, who sang the song of the cheap loaf, free trade, and a regenerated Great Britain!

I never dreamed till I heard my friend give forth his trumpet-sound for free trade how ennobling was the cause! You will say that perhaps he only adopted the words without meaning. But I will not believe it of so intelligent, cultivated, and liberal a member as the accomplished gentleman.

It reminded me of a story. May I relieve the discussion by its relation?

Several MEMBERS. Go on! [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. It is about a boy down in Virginia who desired to join the Baptist Church and be immersed. Perhaps the Baptist clergymen who fill yonder gallery may recall the circumstance. [Laughter.] The boy was named Jim. He is called to give in his experience before the deacons. They desire to know how he got religion. He told them: "I dreamed that I saw Jacob's ladder and Jacob a-wrastling with the angels, and I heard a voice saying, 'Jim, climb dat ladder;' and I clumb [laughter], and I clumb; then another voice from de clouds came down, saying, 'Jim, climb on;' and I clomb on, and I clomb on, till I got to the last round of de ladder. Den I hear the voice of de angels out of the crystal gates, saying, 'Climb on!' and I say, 'Good Lord, I can't climb no mo'.' Den a voice ring out and say, 'Jump, Jim; jump!' an' I jump; an' dis chile got the damndest fall since de fall of Adam." [Long-continued laughter.]

Was this invocation to free trade limited to my distinguished friend from Michigan? By no means. Other gentlemen hearing him, arose. They also cried out to aid the dawn!—the same old dawn! But we gentlemen on this side of the House are content simply with a reform which relieves us of 7 per cent. out of the 47 burden, and for purposes of business to prevent the accumulations in the Treasury of the moneys of the people. This reform is hardly a twilight, much less a dawn.

Now I propose, Mr. Chairman, to signalize this conversion of my friend from Michigan and his brethren who have echoed this song of the dawn of British free trade. I do not propose to be harsh toward them. I would like to see my friend not only assist but assisted in clearing out the way. He will have his troubles by the way. The dawn may be clouded and the paper and type too heavily laden with tax to be useful in a clearing.

It would be a glorious consummation of this debate could we only have gentlemen on the other side join in this invocation to paper and type and to the hearts of honest men to clear the way for British-Cobden free trade. And what part in this clearance would be taken by the gentleman who represents the little State of Nevada, with its 41 per cent. of foreign-born people and its 45,000 inhabitants? Will he join in the hymn when my friend from Michigan lines it out? And what will our other brethren of the Republican party do when Brother BURROWS raises his "Ebenezer." [Laughter.] I would like to line out the inspiring verse. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen need not rise to sing. If the tariff were not so high I would have purchased a tuning-fork for the occasion: "Aid the dawning!" Sing! But, gentlemen, you do not sing. [Laughter.] Surely such an ecstacy as that produced by Mackay's verse, so well recited by the gentleman, must have stirred your hearts to music. [Laughter.] Or perhaps we had better have a prayer meeting. [Laughter.]

LYRICS FOR FREE TRADE AND FREE BREAD.

It would be indecorous on my part to say that gentlemen on the other side who have been quoting the poetry of free trade with such wild enthusiasm were ignorant of the source from which their inspiration came. I fear I am responsible for this gushing lyric, for I used it in our caucus to break the dead-lock so as to aid the dawning of our reform. [Laughter.] My friend from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] somehow got into our caucus. I think it was not intentional, for I have seen no signs of repentance and conversion. [Laughter.] He may have carried the burden of Mackay's song to the accomplished gentleman from Michigan, and hence—the dawn.

I recall another verse of this poet of the people, Mackay. In it he pleads earnestly that the operative of England should have leave to earn his daily bread by his skill and to buy it where he would.

> What do we want? Our daily bread;
> And trade untrammel'd as the wind;
> And from our ranks shall spirits start,
> To aid the progress of mankind.

It was for the dawning of that day that he sang the song so eloquently quoted by the gentleman from Michigan. It was not a British song. It was the song of a lover of his kind. When this distinguished poet came to America he again celebrated that same economic liberty which had been secured in England. I commend his verse to my friends on the other side:

> To the West, to the West, to the land of the free,
> Where mighty Missouri rolls down to the sea,
> Where a man is a man if he is willing to toil
> And the humblest may gather the fruits of the soil.

THE LIBERTY OF LABOR.

Why should not men who were anti-slavery propagandists and prophets have favored the principles of Cobden in the interest of liberty? Does not slavery, like the restriction of exchanges, prohibit the producer from using the products of his own labor according to his own pleasure and advantage? Does not slavery deprive the individual of at least a portion of the results of his labor without return? There was no warrant in England, there is no warrant here, either by natural laws, or state laws, or constitutional requirement to restrict such freedom of exchange to the personal or class interests of any one, any more than there is a warrant for a state religion or the abridgment of speech, press, and suffrage. [Applause.]

Why should the United States with its elements of prosperity and power and its institutions of equality and freedom isolate itself as if it were Japan or Corea? Nay, why should it, at a time when these Oriental countries are opening their ports to the world, be laggard in the race of commercial advancement? The history of mankind during all the ages displays no such fatuity.

LOW TARIFFS OF HISTORY.

Why, in Athens two thousand years ago a 10 per cent. revenue duty was regarded as an outrage. Five per cent. was the highest. In ancient Rome from 2½ to 5 per cent. was the highest maximum. In Turkey, may I refer to my friend again [laughter], 8 per cent. is the tax on all foreign importations.

Our First Congress made some showing of protective duties, but the average was only 8½ per cent., and the duties we have now on cottons, woolens, and iron that run above 50 per cent. were then only 5.

Why, sir, we have had forty changes in the tariff since our first enactment. It was protective until 1846, when it was liberalized; so that by 1860 it reached an average as low as 17 per cent. Then the war came on, which was exceptional. We then began to tinker with the tariff over and over again, until we have our present enactment.

It is the habit of gentlemen to minimize the amount of taxation by showing how small per capita each particular tax is upon our people. Thus they infer that since it only takes 3 cents on one thing, 5 cents on another, and 10 on another, that we ought not to complain. But many a mickle makes a muckle, and the day of small things is large in legislation and ought not to be despised.

THE LITTLENESS OF TARIFF RESTRICTIONS.

Why, sir, when we think of it, the Earth itself is but a little thing in space compared with the glories of our planetary and other systems. It is hardly a grain of sand amid the stellar spaces.

Professor Langley, secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, concludes his volume on The New Astronomy by a story which he relates of a race of ephemeral insects who live but an hour. Born at break of day, they die of old age just after the sun rises. Their descendants may live on till mid-day, while it is another race that sees the glory of sunset.

Imagine such a scene as sunset—

Says the Professor—

when the whole nation of mites gather under the shadow of some mushroom to hear what their wisest philosopher has to say of the gloomy prospect. He tells them of the time when the mushroom itself was young, and when the sun was in another portion of the sky; then that the sun had changed its course, and that all nature was about to be resolved into a fleeting nebulous mist. What the hearers of such a philosophic mite would think of his philosophy the infinite God only knows.

But it seems to me that the philosophers of our time who undertake to limit the comforts and happiness and means of living of a few mites under one portion of our American mushroom, and to that portion only, are very much in the position of the ephemera, who talk about the laws of nature, as if they could constrain them to their own selfish will. [Applause.]

THE AMERICAN QUADRICENTENNIAL.

Four hundred years ago Columbus set in the forehead of his time the jewels of Elizabeth the Catholic by the discovery of America. We are preparing for the celebration of that remarkable event. The people of the three Americas will be called together to give gratulation over this marvelous fact in the history of our star.

Four hundred years ago the red man held undisputed and barbaric sway over the vast region now embraced within our limits. Out of this wilderness has arisen from the loins of the old world a nation who rejoice and boast of their liberties.

OUR ADVANCEMENT AND HOROSCOPE.

Have we not a right to rejoice and boast? Has not our greatness expanded like the oak, bole upon bole, ring upon ring, and spread its branches from sea to sea, from Gulf to Lake? Our benevolence, and learning, and wealth, and splendor, and commerce have become the cynosure of all eyes, even as our country is the refuge of all peoples. We need not repair to the urns of other skies or to the policies of other lands to illumine the light of liberty in our own. We have what Rufus Choate called a youthful, exultant, and defiant freedom, enshrined and consecrated, and we are now happily united with one sentiment and under one Constitution. [Applause.]

LABOR AND LIBERTY SHACKLED.

With all this wonderful experience and accomplishment, beyond the wildest dreams of that classic genius which pictured a new Atlantis and an ideal commonwealth beyond the Hesperian star—shall our country be shackled by a wrongful constraint? Shall Economy, which ever walks white-handed along with her sister—Liberty—fail of that guiding effulgence which makes glad the heart of our people? Why should not our struggling millions aspire to a better future? Why should they lay up the treasures of their enterprises, if, indeed, the spirit of freedom be wanting? Freedom not only to work as we please, but to dispose of the product of our work as we please; freedom to spend our means where we can get the most for them; freedom to invest our means without the ignominy of enslaving statutes, and freedom to symbolize with our enstarred ensign, that beauty and unity with which nature has glorified our beloved land, and to inspire other nations with the same constitutional order wherewithal that we have been made free.

What avail the plow and sail,
Or land or life, if freedom fail!

[Long continued applause.]

EXHIBIT No. 1.—Bastiat's famous petition.

Petition of the manufacturers of candles, wax-lights, lamps, candlesticks, street-lamps, snuffers, extinguishers, and of the producers of oil, tallow, rosin, alcohol, and generally of everything connected with lighting.

To Messieurs the members of the Chamber of Deputies:

GENTLEMEN: You are on the right road. You reject abstract theories and have little consideration for cheapness and plenty. Your chief care is the interest of the producer. You desire to emancipate him from external competition and reserve the national market for national industry.

We are about to offer you an admirable opportunity for applying your—what shall we call it? your theory? No; nothing is more deceptive than theory. Your doctrine? your system? your principle?—but you dislike doctrines, you abhor systems, and as for principles, you deny that there are any in social economy; we shall say, then, your practice, your practice without theory and without principle.

We are suffering from the intolerable competition of a foreign rival, placed, it would seem, in a condition so far superior to ours for the production of light, that he absolutely inundates our national market with it at a price fabulously reduced. The moment he shows himself, our trade leaves us—all consumers apply to him; and a branch of native industry, having countless ramifications, is all at once rendered completely stagnant. This rival, who is no other than the sun, wages war to the knife against us, and we suspect he has been raised up by perfidious Albion (good policy as times go); inasmuch as he displays towards that haughty island a circumspection with which he dispenses in our case.

What we pray for is, that it may please you to pass a law ordering the shutting up of all windows, sky-lights, dormer windows, outside and inside shutters, curtains, blinds, bull's eyes, in a word, of all openings, holes, chinks, clefts, and fissures, by or through which the light of the sun has been allowed to enter houses, to the prejudice of the meritorious manufactures with which we flatter ourselves we have accommodated our country, a country which, in gratitude, ought not to abandon us now to a strife so unequal.

We trust, gentlemen, that you will not regard this our request as a satire or refuse it without at least previously hearing the reasons which we have to urge in its support.

And, first, if you shut up as much as possible all access to natural light, and create a demand for artificial light, which of our French manufactures will not be encouraged by it?

If more tallow is consumed, then there must be more oxen and sheep; and, consequently, we shall behold the increase of artificial meadows, meat, wool, hides, and, above all, manure, which is the basis and foundation of all agricultural wealth.

If more oil is consumed, then we shall have an extended cultivation of the poppy, of the olive, and of colewort. These rich and exhausting plants will come at the right time to enable us to avail ourselves of the increased fertility which the rearing of additional cattle will impart to our lands.

Our heaths will be covered with resinous trees. Numerous swarms of bees will on the mountains gather perfumed treasures, now wasting their fragrance on the desert air, like the flowers from which they are derived. No branch of agriculture but will then exhibit a cheering development.

The same remark applies to navigation. Thousands of vessels will proceed to the whale fishery; and, in a short time, we shall possess a navy capable of maintaining the honor of France, and gratifying the patriotic aspirations of your petitioners, the undersigned candlemakers and others.

But what shall we say of the manufacture of articles de Paris? Henceforth you will behold gildings, bronzes, crystals, in candlesticks, in lamps, in lusters, in candelabra, shining forth in spacious warerooms, compared with which those of the present day can be regarded but as mere shops.

No poor Resinier from his heights on the seacoast, no coal-miner from the depth of his sable gallery but will rejoice in higher wages and increased prosperity.

Only have the goodness to reflect, gentlemen, and you will be convinced that there is, perhaps, no Frenchman, from the wealthy coal-master to the humblest vender of lucifer matches, whose lot will not be ameliorated by the success of this our petition.

We foresee your objections, gentlemen, but we know that you can oppose to us none but such as you have picked up from the effete works of the partisans of free trade. We defy you to utter a single word against us which will not instantly rebound against yourselves and your entire policy.

You will tell us that if we gain by the protection which we seek the country will lose by it, because the consumer must bear the loss.

We answer:

You have ceased to have any right to invoke the interest of the consumer; for, whenever his interest is found opposed to that of the producer you sacrifice the former. You have done so for the purpose of encouraging labor and increasing employment. For the same reason you should do so again.

You have yourselves obviated this objection. When you are told that the consumer is interested in the free importation of iron, coal, corn, textile fabrics—yes, you reply, but the producer is interested in their exclusion. Well, be it so. If the consumers are interested in the free admission of natural light, the producers of artificial light are equally interested in its prohibition.

But, again, you may say that the producer and consumer are identical. If the manufacturer gain by protection he will make the agriculturist also a gainer, and if agriculture prospers it will open a vent to manufactures. Very well; if you confer upon us the monopoly of furnishing light during the day, first of all we shall purchase quantities of tallow, coals, oils, resinous substances, wax, alcohol, besides silver, iron, bronze, crystal, to carry on our manufactures; and then we and those who furnish us with such commodities, having become rich, will consume a great deal and impart prosperity to all the other branches of our national industry.

If you urge that the light of the sun is a gratuitous gift of nature, and that to reject such gifts is to reject wealth itself under pretense of encouraging the means of acquiring it, we would caution you against giving a death-blow to your own policy. Remember that hitherto you have always repelled foreign products, because they approximate more nearly than home products to the character of gratuitous gifts. To comply with the exactions of other monopolists, you have only half a motive; and to repulse us simply because we stand on a stronger vantage ground than others would be to adopt the equation, $+\times+=-$; in other words, it would be to heap absurdity upon absurdity.

Nature and human labor co-operate in various proportions (depending on countries and climates) in the production of commodities. The part which nature executes is always gratuitous; it is the part executed by human labor which constitutes value, and is paid for.

If a Lisbon orange sells for half the price of a Paris orange, it is because natural, and consequently gratuitous, heat does for the one what artificial, and therefore expensive, heat must do for the other.

When an orange comes to us from Portugal, we may conclude that it is furnished in part gratuitously, in part for an onerous consideration; in other words, it comes to us at half-price as compared with those of Paris.

Now, it is precisely the gratuitous half (pardon the word) which we contend should be excluded. You say, how can national labor sustain competition with foreign labor, when the former has all the work to do, and the latter only does one-half—the sun supplying the remainder? But if this half, being gratuitous, determines you to exclude competition, how should the whole, being gratuitous, induce you to admit competition? If you were consistent, you would, while excluding as hurtful to native industry what is half gratuitous, exclude, a fortiori and with double zeal, that which is altogether gratuitous.

Once more, when products such as coal, iron, corn, or textile fabrics are sent us from abroad, and we can acquire them with less labor than if we made them ourselves, the difference is a free gift conferred upon us. The gift is more or less considerable in proportion as the difference is more or less great. It amounts to a quarter, a half, or three-quarters of the value of the product, when the foreigner only asks us for three-fourths, a half, or a quarter of the price we should otherwise pay.

It is as perfect and complete as it can be, when the donor (like the sun in furnishing us with light) asks us for nothing. The question, and we ask it formally, is this, Do you desire for our country the benefit of gratuitous consumption, or the pretended advantages of onerous production? Make your choice, but be logical; for as long as you exclude, as you do, coal, iron, corn, foreign fabrics, in proportion as their price approximates to zero, what inconsistency would it be to admit the light of the sun, the price of which is already at zero during the entire day!

Mr. MASON. Mr. Chairman, I was much pleased but not surprised at the knowledge of the gentleman from New York who just took his seat [Mr. COX] of the wardrobe of the devil. [Laughter.]

His scarlet pants and coat of blue,
And a little hole for his tail to come through—were very beautiful; but if the devil was half as patriotic as I suspect him of being he bought his garments, of whatever color, hole and all, in the recesses of hell. [Laughter.] I can imagine from the acquaintance the gentleman shows with his satanic majesty that when his earthly career is closed he will approach the gate, and, after having been refused admittance by Peter, he will approach that other warmer spot and give his name, "SAMUEL SULLIVAN COX, late of New York." The devil will say: "Why, Mr. COX, could you not make it up there?" "No." The devil: "F. T. ?" "Yes; free-trader; couldn't make it." Whereupon his majesty says: "Walk right in, Mr. SAMUEL SULLIVAN COX; we take everything that comes to this shore; it is the only free-trade corner in the universe." [Applause and laughter.]

A farmer once having left home received the following letter from a fox: "My dear Mr. Farmer: I am informed and believe that your hen and chickens are not well, and I desire to tender you my most earnest solicitude and my attention as their physician. Please have your man leave the hen-house open nights, that I may treat them. Your true friend, A. Fox." To which the farmer modestly replied: "My dear Mr. Fox: Your kind and neighborly letter has just been received. Your relations with me and my chickens in the past have not been such as would warrant me in employing you as their physician. The doctor should be the friend of his patient. I expect to be at home after the 4th of March next, and I will look out for my own chickens. Respectfully yours, A. Farmer."

So you understand, after the manner of Æsop, we do not want him to doctor our chickens. The tariff chicken belongs to the Republican party, and your anxiety to doctor it leads us to suspect you are more interested as an undertaker than as a physician. [Applause.]

I represent a Republican district, a district in favor of tariff reform, and I stand ready to vote for any bill to reform the inconsistencies of the tariff consistent with the best interests of the industries of this country.

I charge that the Democratic party, or a majority of that party, is in favor of free trade. The Republican party is in favor of protection; and while many of us believe there should be are form of the tariff, as I have suggested, still the great underlying difference between the two parties is there to stay.

To prove that the Democrats are free-traders I make a very few extracts of the many that could be cited to prove my position.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARE] said:

I believe that a tariff for protection is the foundation and principal cause of all the complaints and unrest that has either threatened or actually disturbed the public peace and quiet for years, because it fosters one industry at the expense of another, it transfers the labor and production of one class and gives it to another, thereby building up a small class of great wealth and impoverishing the great body of our people.

I am opposed to any tariff whatever for protection simply.

If we did not require money to defray the expenses of Government, I would be an absolute and uncompromising free-trader.

The argument of those who favor protection is (among other things) that such tariff is necessary to protect labor and production, and, to prove it, it is shown that the laborer is paid higher wages in America than anywhere else on the globe.

Admitting the fact that in dollars and cents the United States pays higher wages than England; that England pays more than other countries in Europe, and that Europe pays higher than India, yet it is also an established fact that the laborer in the United States can not, as a general rule, save anything from the result of his toil at the end of each year; nor can he do so in England, nor elsewhere in Europe, nor in India. It is equally as well established that in all those countries the laborer does eat and wear clothes adapted to his country and climate. Then what is the difference between earning $1 per day or 10 cents per day, if the result is the same, namely, sufficient to eat to preserve life and sufficient to wear to protect the body?

Think of it! "Sufficient to eat to preserve life." Is the average Democratic heart not too kind to the laborer? Life can be "preserved" on 20 cents per day or less. Is he afraid our laborers if they get $1.50 per day they would die of the gout? Will even a free-trader say the workingmen are to have nothing but a bare sufficiency for the stomach and back? Is there to be no home and home-life for him? No food and clothes and books for his children; no pictures to light his wall and no music or ray of refinement in his home? God pity this nation when such despair shall settle upon the hearts of those who labor.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANE] says "the nations of the earth are striving to draw near to each other." Yes, every nation in the world employing pauper and cheap labor are trying to draw near to us. Every tramp he meets on the street will try to draw near to him. The filth and vermin on the tramp will try and draw near to him in order to indulge in free trade. But why does my colleague draw back from the festive tramp? Why erect a Chinese wall between yourself and the tramp? Oh! he says, I am on a different plane of life; I do not need him. But my country should get down and trade freely with any other country in the world.

Do you not know and can you not see that in this country every citizen, however humble his trade or calling, is his own master, and that our country, therefore, as compared with most others, was built under the Providence of God by brave ancestors upon a more certain foundation, and a higher plane?

Mr. MILLS, chairman of committee, and the acknowledged leader of the Democratic party, says:

We will increase wealth if we lower the duties and let importations come in of those things which can be produced cheaper in other countries than our own.

There is not a manufactured article on this earth wherein the raw materials are common and wherein labor creates a part that can not be produced cheaper in any other country in the world than in our own. Why? Simply because the labor is cheaper. No man can live in this country on the wages paid in other countries; not because he can not "exist," but he must clothe and educate his children or violate the public sentiment of his country, which sentiment is our chief honor and glory.

This proposition of Mr. MILLS, carried to its legitimate results, would do one of two things. It would either close every manufacturing and labor-employing establishment in this country or reduce those employed there to the cheap wages of other countries. This would drive the children of the laborer from the school-house to the factories and mines, and may the Great Father of nations long delay the day when the American youth (the foundation stones of our future glory) shall be dwarfed in mind and body by this free-trade process.

The wealth of a nation does not consist of its surplus in money, its railroads, its factories, nor its farms, but rather in that great wealth of humanity, educated and loyal, which is the sure guaranty that our future will be greater than our past.

Mr. MILLS further pleads for "freedom to buy the products of others" where we please, while the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] asks for the same thing when he asks the right to purchase labor where it can be purchased the cheapest.

I have quoted enough to show my proposition to be true that the Democratic party is in favor of free trade.

The Northern Democrats say, "Oh, no; we are not free-traders; we believe in tariff reform, and tariff for revenue only." Gentlemen, you know as well as I do that "the tail goes with the hide." You remember a few days ago when we were in the deadlock, and you Northern Democrats walked up and down with a feather in your hat and a chip on your shoulder, and said you did not propose to be bossed by the brigadiers. King Caucus tapped the bell, and you went in like good boys and laid down your bundles.

The brigadier rings the caucus bell;
The dough-face cries "For shame!
I'll not be bossed by the brigadier;"
But he gets there just the same.

[Laughter.]

And when the great Democratic party shall have assumed control of the Senate and of the White House and of this House of Congress and of the Supreme Court, and the edict goes forth that free trade shall be the policy of the party, you Northern Democrats, being but the caudal appendage, the mere tail of the great Democratic dog, will meekly and modestly enfold yourselves between the hind legs of your owner and wait patiently for information from the business end of that dog whether to wag for free trade or for protection. [Great laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I have never been in favor of sending a man to the penitentiary for preaching free trade. I do not think that is a good cause; but when a man like the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of this House stands up here and talks by the hour in favor of free trade, and then tells us that it is all for the benefit of the laboring men in this country, it makes me tired. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Here comes an American shoemaker who says to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. "Mr. MILLS, I understand you are in favor of buying your shoes where you can buy them cheapest?" "Oh, yes!" "Why do you want to buy them where you can buy them cheapest?" "Why, just to help you poor American shoemakers." [Laughter.] The next man is a spinner of yarn or a weaver of cloth, and he says: "Mr. MILLS, you say we ought to have free trade; that we ought to be permitted to buy our clothes wherever we want to and wherever we can get them cheapest. You can buy your clothing cheaper in England, I believe." "Oh, yes," says Mr. MILLS. "Won't you tell me," says the American clothman, "why you want to buy your clothing in England?" "Oh, yes; it is to help you poor American clothiers," says Mr. MILLS. [Renewed laughter.] And here comes a man with swarthy brow and horny hand, an iron-worker, who says: "I understand, Mr. MILLS, you want to buy your shovels and your hoes and all your ironware in England, where you can get them cheap." "Oh, yes," says Mr. MILLS, "but it is all for the benefit of you poor American iron-workers."

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I said before, while I do not believe in sending a man to the penitentiary for preaching free trade, yet when a man stands up here and talks free trade, and says that he does it all for the benefit of American workingmen, I do think he ought to be sent down for six months twice a year for fifty years for hypocrisy. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

And, Mr. Chairman, the workingmen are going into convention, and are going to adopt a preamble and a resolution somewhat like this:

Whereas the Democratic party, or rather the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, believes that he should have the right to purchase the products of labor wherever he can buy them the cheapest;

And whereas he also says that he wants that right for the benefit of the working people of this country:

Therefore resolved, That the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee for elasticity of conscience, for monumental gall, and magnificent patriotism takes the whole bakery. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, occasionally you will find a retired business man who is a free-trader, but always you will find the college professor who has competed for the prize of the Cobden Club; and always the dude: "Aw, dawn't ye knaw, its a blawsted shame, ye knaw, ye cawn't buy these gloves and neck-ties in New York for less than twice what they would cost in dear old Paree." All these are free-traders, and also that other class of gentlemen, who are not to blame for it, because they have been brought up in a country which a few years ago adopted a constitution which was cited here lately by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS], containing as two of its fundamental principles absolute free trade with all the world and the right of capital to own its labor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to devote a few moments to the question of trusts. The favorite peroration of the Democratic orators here is to charge the trusts to the tariff. Now, for the sake of the argument we will admit that the sugar trust is fostered by the tariff. We will accept your proposition upon that question for the moment. But if that is true, why do you not take that trust and throttle it with the Mills bill? Is not that a simple proposition? I had the honor, as a Republican and a protectionist, of introducing a resolution upon that subject, reciting that it was alleged that the tariff fostered the sugar trust and asking for information and legislation, but I understand from members of the committee investigating the general subject that although they have employed an attorney and taken a great deal of evidence, not a word has been put before the witnesses to show to the country what effect, if any, the tariff has upon the trusts.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The gentleman is entirely mistaken upon that point. I am a member of that committee and I know that that question has been gone into quite thoroughly.

Mr. MASON. I received my information from another member of the committee. I am glad that you have learned something upon the subject, and I hope that some result will come out of that committee which will be of benefit to the people of this country.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I merely wished to correct the gentleman.

Mr. MASON. That is right. You know very well that if the controllers of the Mills bill should protect the producers of sugars in this country, and should at the same time uncover the refiners, those who have organized the "sugar trust," and force them into the markets of the world, you would kill that "trust" in twenty-four hours; but you have not the courage to do it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. If the gentleman had done me the honor——

Mr. MASON. "What are the wild waves saying?" [Laughter.] If I can have two or three minutes' extension of my time, I have no objection to yielding to the gentleman.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. If the gentleman had listened to my remarks this morning he would have found that in our dealings with the sugar schedule we not only make a reduction of $11,000,000 on the sugar tax, but, superadded to that, we make a reduction of $11,000,000 additional that the "trust" can charge the people for refined sugar.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman will pardon me if I could not, while sitting in my seat, hear his remarks distinctly. But I suppose the gentleman will admit that the committee still leaves the tariff on the kinds of sugar produced and sold by the sugar trust; is not that so?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Certainly; but——

Mr. MASON. If you would uncover them would they not have to corner the markets of the world? But are you not afraid to uncover them?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. If we should "uncover" the refined sugars and at the same time keep the tax on raw sugar, we should thereby not merely destroy the "trust," but destroy also the refining industry.

Mr. MASON. Why could you not protect the raw material by a bounty? You have brains enough; but you have not the courage.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I admire the courage of the gentleman in so distinctly avowing the doctrine of "bounty." That is the "true inwardness" and essence of your whole protective policy.

Mr. WILKINSON rose.

Mr. MASON. I can not yield. If I can have my time extended I am willing to yield to all these gentlemen.

The gentleman from Mississippi the other day said he wanted to "cook" this sugar trust; but he did not; he wanted to feed it, and he started into comic opera. But I would suggest to him and the gentleman from New York, inasmuch as they are poets, and as they propose by this bill to protect the sugar trust, that they try the old-fashioned lullaby:

Rock-a-by, Sugar Trust, you're on the tree top
And while we're in power your cradle will rock;
But if the duty on sugar should tumble and fall,
Down comes the Sugar Trust, Mills bill and all.

[Laughter.]

Or if poetical genius should inspire them to rise to the heights of Mother Goose I would suggest:

Little boy blue, come blow your horn nice,
Blow hell out of mutton, but do not touch rice.

[Laughter.]

In fancy I see the gentleman from Mississippi holding the infant "Sugar Trust" in his arms, and saying, "Ah, there, stay there! [Laughter.] I wanted to cook the little tootsey-wootsey the other day, but I did not mean to cook you. Oh, no, that was a bluff." And he passes the infant "Trust" to the gentleman from Texas, who says, "Tootsey-wootsey, little Sugar Trust, don't cry; you shall have all the sugar in the United States; the Cobden boys can have everything else their way, but dear little Sugar Trust should not be hurt, oh, no." And the gentleman from New York fondles and coddles it, and says, "If poor little tootsey-wootsey was to die we would not have anything left to throw at the Republican party."

The gentleman from Mississippi also said that the cows in his State did not give as much milk as those in New England, and his hens do not lay as many eggs. I want to say to him now that if there is anything under God's heavens that will dry up a good cow, and stop a hen from laying, it is being brought up in a free-trade country.

I was pleased when he boasted of the beautiful women of the South; everybody knows that all the ladies are pretty—some better looking than others; but it surprised me somewhat when the gentleman from Mississippi said that they had brainy men. I said to myself, "Possibly that is true; but it is another illustration of the old saying, that you can never tell the kind of goods a man keeps by the sample he puts on the road." [Laughter.]

The remarks of my friend from Missouri pleased me very much. After laboring like a mountain he finally proved that all the States of the Union that had taken advantage of the existing tariff laws had become prosperous; and when the gentleman from Maine asked him whether he proposed to stop this progress, he appealed to the clock. I find that clock is the most popular thing to appeal to on the Democratic side when members there are asked questions that they can not answer. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Missouri closed his speech by a prayer that the American flag should be seen in all the harbors of the world. That is a very pretty but a very soft sentiment. I never want to see the American flag masquerading on an English mast. I stood with many of my colleagues a few days ago and saw that magnificent vessel, the Yorktown, as she slipped from the cradle that had held her since her first rib was set down to the mighty waters, and one thing that made me proud was the fact that every pound of iron in her magnificent sides sprang from American soil in response to the blows of American citizens. And when, on the ship setting sail, every pound of iron, every foot of timber, every bolt and spar and rope comes from the labor and genius of American citizens, she speaks not only of the power and wealth of this country, but is a floating monument to the industries of the country. Then, and not till then, should the colors of our country be nailed to her mast. [Applause.]

The most popular party to-day in England is the Democratic party of the United States. [Laughter and applause.] The most popular individual to-day in England is the President of the United States of America, for he recommends to this body legislation in the interests of every country under God's heaven but our own. [Renewed laughter and applause].

I heard a gentleman on the other side of the House, and I heard that great Democratic Senator from Indiana—that is, what is left of him, [laughter]—I heard them ask, "When was the American workman more degraded and poorer paid than now?" That is, what we have heard. I will tell you when; why, every day the Democratic party was in power in this country. [Laughter and applause.]

I remember in 1857, when my own father, who was a skilled mechanic and a builder of wagons, worked for seventy-five cents a day.

You remember the carpenter who went South and applied for a situation as a carpenter, about that time, of a planter, and the planter said, "I am sorry I can not give you employment; just bought two carpenters yesterday." [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN, of Mississippi. Are we to judge of his father's skill by the gentleman himself as one of his products?

Mr. MASON. Is this the same gentleman? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield for interruption?

Mr. MASON. Yes, if it does not come out of my time. Anybody who does not like my style of architecture knows where he can find me when I am not busy. I am busy now. [Laughter and applause.]

I was about to say when interrupted by a gentleman who represents a brainy district [laughter] that if his party had continued in power every man who earns his living by the sweat of his brow would stand to-day not only with the products of other countries of the world brought to our doors, but in direct competition with slave labor upon his own soil. Yet they say they are the friends of the laboring man and want to buy the products of labor in other markets for the benefit of the laboring people here! [Laughter and applause.]

One more thing. There has been a great deal of talk in this country amongst the best people that there should be some commercial union with Canada. There has been an honest difference of opinion about it. But everything we had to trade on in that direction is absolutely frittered away by the Mills bill. [Applause.]

It has been a great pleasure of the Democracy, and words that they have rolled under their tongue as a sweet morsel, that the Republican party was in favor of free whisky. I am here to answer simply for myself, responsible to no one but my conscience and to my constituents, and say that I never have been, and am not now, in favor of free whisky. I am in favor of whisky helping to support the poor-houses and prisons which it fills, and next to being a breeder of paupers it is the greatest producer of Democrats known to modern man. I am in favor and will vote to take off the tax on all alcohol used in the manufactories, and there are thousands and thousands of dollars of it used in manufacturing soaps, which would help somewhat to reduce the surplus, and would be of benefit to those manufacturers who use it and to the consumers of soap. I do not expect the Democrats to vote for this proposition. No Democrat can consistently vote to reduce the price of soap.

I wish to call the attention of the House to this fact, that, while it is true that but a small percentage of the laborers of this country are employed in industries that are protected by the tariff, yet every unskilled laborer engaged in any kind of work is in the market in competition with every other unskilled laborer in the country, and it is impossible to benefit even a small percentage of our unskilled laborers without benefiting every other unskilled laborer in the country. Some one must labor. The old Democratic idea that to labor was degrading is passing away, and this country to-day, which is the greatest known to history, points with pride and joy to the men who have gone from the tow-path and from rail-splitting and from the humblest walks of life to the highest office within the gift of her people.

The real trouble is here, Mr. Chairman: The gentlemen who compose the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means come six out of eight from those States lately in rebellion, who have been taught from infancy that free trade is right. Now, gentlemen, when you came here first after the war the prodigal-son racket worked well, but it is getting old. [Laughter and applause.] You used to talk about the prodigal son, who is represented in the Bible as coming in and telling his father, "I have been off in a far country; I have lost all I had; I am not fit to be your son; make me your servant." But that is not the kind of a prodigal son you are. [Laughter.] You came in the front door; you wiped your feet on the carpet, and we have been told some of you drink out of the fire-extinguisher in the hotels, and others of you set your watches by the street-car enunciators! [Laughter and applause.] You do not sit down and wait for the fatted calf. You put your feet on the best table and say, "Pap, what we want is veal." [Great laughter and applause.] But the people are getting tired of that sort of thing, and next fall they are going to take the prodigal son by the nape of his neck and the seat of his government and set him out among the husks of a defeated Democracy [laughter], and your great leader, your Moses, His Accidency, His One-termitiveness Grover Cleveland, will be promoted to the highest office known to the world, an American citizen in private life. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this bill as it stands ought not to pass. It is a step backward. Let me give you a few samples of its consistency. Take the article of soap manufactured in this country. They place that upon the free-list. Thousands of men are employed in the business here, and millions of capital invested in small and large soap factories. There are eight or ten different chemicals used in the manufacture of soap which cannot be supplied here, which the soap-makers have to import and pay a duty upon. The duties upon these chemicals are not removed, and yet, so far as the manufacturers of soap are concerned, they are the raw material. A man who manufactures soap outside of this country pays no duty. If he shipped them to us in this country he would have to pay a duty, but if he manufactures them into some article to compete with some American manufactured article he can ship them in free. "Consistency, thou art a jewel." Take the article of brushes. The manufacturers in this country have to pay a duty on the raw material used. This bill proposes to reduce the duty, and substantially puts brushes upon the free-list, and yet leaves the American manufacturer to pay a duty upon the bristles—an invitation to the brush factories of this country to move. This bill is substantially the same in jute and flax, and every part of it, so far as the industries in my district are concerned, is an invitation to those factories to go where they can get labor and raw material cheaper and import them free.

I have seen it charged that the Committee on Ways and Means have been running around loose with representatives of the English manufacturers.

I have seen it stated editorially, in responsible papers, that the agent of the English manufacturers has wined and dined the majority end of our Ways and Means Committee, and has in turn been wined and dined by them, and that he has had constant access to the committee. One paper offers to prove, if it is denied, that this man is the agent of English manufacturers, and that he has materially assisted in forming this bill. After that publication I expected to hear it denied by some member of the committee. I knew they had refused to hear American manufacturers on the bill in which they are so deeply interested, and did not think the committee would like to rest under the imputation that they were allowing foreign manufacturers privileges not allowed our own citizens. That denial, so far as I can learn, has not been made.

How far that English influence has gone I do not know, but from some of the features I find in this bill I suspect an English parentage. [Renewed laughter.] And I say to you gentlemen on that side (I represent a district largely composed of working people) that if one item of that bill is there by the suggestion of a representative of the English manufacturers, the man who consented to it is as mean and contemptible a traitor to the industrial interests of this Government as his predecessors were twenty-five years ago when they tried to destroy it. [Derisive laughter on the Democratic side.] Yes, that is what I say; that is what I mean. It lacks what your fathers had—the element of bravery. But the man who refuses a hearing to an American citizen and consents to be advised by an English manufacturer in a great measure of public policy in this country is a betrayer of public trust and is unfit to occupy a seat in this House or in any other legislative body, except it be the British Parliament. I am responsible for what I say, and if my language is not parliamentary the gentleman can make the most of it.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if every man in the State of New York was a millionaire this country would be that much richer and stronger for it. Illinois and Missouri would be richer and stronger. There are no State lines except upon the map and in the heart of a Democrat. The wealth of one State is the wealth of all, and when I eat or drink or put on my coat or buy any of the things that I have to buy, rather than give one cent profit to any man in any country but our own I would give one dollar profit to that man who stands with me under the same flag, under the same government, who is bound by the same laws, who is bound to fight as I am for the defense of the honor and integrity of our common country.

I am like the boy who hired his sister to make his shirts. Some one said, "You could have taken those shirts to the factory and had them made and saved $2." "Yes," said the boy protectionist, "Sister Sally got a pretty fair price. She always pays me well for what I do for her. That two-dollar bill is still under the same roof with me, and if sickness or trouble or hard luck comes to any of our family that money is there in the house."

The free-trade boy calls his sister a New England tariff robber.

Every dollar of wealth in New England is there to stand levy in times of peace or war for our common good. Yet the average Democratic orator holds her in no closer bond than he does any foreign country. We are taunted daily by her growth and wealth. She is great and strong. I thank God for it, for therein lies a part of the strength of our common country.

I hail not from New England, and can speak without prejudice. The history of our country has neither beginning nor end with the history of New England left out. Her great statesmen, soldiers, and poets fill the brightest pages of our history, and we would prosper more if we spent less time finding fault with her, and more time in imitating her habits of industry and frugality.

The South finds fault because other sections of the country have taken advantage of the tariff laws, while she has left her natural resources undeveloped. And this committee of Southern gentlemen seek by this bill to protect every article of manufacture or agriculture produced in the South, and if in the protection to the South any Northern enterprise shall be accidentally protected we are welcome to it.

But the gentlemen say that I am drawing sectional lines. Mr. Chairman, I am not. I draw attention only to the sectional lines that they have already drawn. This bill and every other bill coming from the majority of the Ways and Means Committee has been a direct attempt on the part of the majority to protect the interests lying in the South, regardless of the interests of the North, the East, and the West; and when I go through my district and see laboring men and manufacturers there and know that under protection there is better promise than ever for the future, it grinds me to know that their affairs and their business are in the hands of such men. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I am not drawing sectional lines; you are drawing them. I am calling attention to history.

This bill is a standing monument to the incapacity of the committee—a standing menace to the best interests of this country.

And in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would say again, we believe that protection protects the laboring man; and I call upon history to bear witness that every nation under the sun has prospered just in proportion as they have reached down to the struggling and laboring classes and lifted them to a higher and more dignified citizenship. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that in the early dawn of creation, when the waters and the earth were divided, and that great smiling valley of the Mississippi looked into the face of its Creator, He blessed it, and said that at some time there should spring up a race upon its fertile soil which should stand as a monument of self-government, chief among the nations of the world. And I believe that when our infant nation took its first uncertain and tottering steps on the untried shore of self-government and our life was assailed, that same power gave us a Washington and a Continental army. And when the foul stain of slavery, that gave the lie to our boast of freedom, was to be stricken, with secession and treason, forever from our soil, the same Great Keeper of the destinies of the world gave us a Lincoln, a Grant, and a Grand Army of the Republic. [Applause.]

And now, Mr. Chairman, in this Fiftieth Congress, when the industries of the country are assailed by a foreign foe, I believe that somehow something will be stirred in the hearts of the American people, something that will move them to action that will awake the giant of the Republican party, which has been sleeping for four years, and again place it in power; and standing in every harbor and port of entry in the land, it will say to the foreign invader offering labor products produced by cheap and pauper labor from abroad, "Thus far and no farther." [Renewed applause.] And under the influence of Republican doctrines the country, with new assurances of safety and protection, will have new life and new hopes and make greater strides in the march of civilization and progress than has ever heretofore been accomplished in the history of the world. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Chairman, this prolonged debate upon the revenue policy of the Government is invited by the recent message of the President of the United States submitted to this Congress. In it he announces that—> the amount of money annually received through the operation of the present laws, from the industries and necessities of the people, largely exceeds the sum necessary to meet the expenses of the Government.

This surplus revenue, he says, has continued to accumulate, until it—> is estimated to reach the sum of $113,000,000 on the 30th of June next, at which date it is expected that this sum added to prior accumulations will swell the surplus in the Treasury to $140,000,000.

With this condition confronting us he tells us that—> an opportunity for safe, careful, and deliberate reform is now offered.

He then suggests a remedy for this disordered condition of the body-politic, which he informs us is produced by—> a tariff or duty levied upon importations from abroad and internal-revenue taxes levied upon the consumption of tobacco and spirituous and malt liquors—in excess of the legitimate demands of the Government.

The remedy proposed is in the revision of these tariff laws.

> These laws—

He says—

> raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subjected to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties.

Then, while he admits that "comparatively a few use the imported articles," yet he claims that millions of our people pay for the same kind made in this country "nearly or quite the same enhanced price which the duty adds to the imported articles." A reduction of duties on raw material used in manufactures or its free importation is recommended.

These form the basis and this is the reasoning for the proposed revision of the existing duty. Pursuant to these recommendations the Ways and Means Committee have submitted to this Congress a measure to secure this legislation.

That there should be a revision of the tariff none deny. This far it is not a party issue. Differences occur as to the manner and extent of this revision, and herein arises two distinct theories, involving principles which underlie the prosperity, if not the perpetuity, of our Governmental system.

HOW TO REDUCE THE SURPLUS.

Preceding this, however, and that which inspired the President to address this body, is the immediate question as to the disposal of the surplus revenues of the Government, and the necessity for the pending legislation to reach this end.

Upon this we at once take issue. Not as to the disposal of this revenue, for this the country has been demanding in thunder-tones, but it is as to the means employed and the principle involved that we differ.

This legislation is not necessary to reduce the existing surplus. The surplus is a mere pretext. Concealed within this pretended necessity is the initial movement of the policy and practice of free trade.

A nation like an individual should expend its idle surplus in the betterment of its affairs, in the repair of its establishments, in the payment of its debts, or in generous remembrance of past obligations.

CHEAPEN WATER-WAY TRANSPORTATION.

In the marvelous advance of this Republic, in its grand march to empire, experience has demonstrated that much of our material prosperity is due to the water ways of the country. The inland commerce of the United States is the wonder of the world. The highest interests of state and the sound application of ordinary business principles all appeal to us to have a care to the judicious improvement of our rivers and harbors. The necessity of such control and development is concurred in by the engineers who are in charge of these interests. For the present year these officers estimate that there can be profitably expended $160,000,000 for this purpose.

Had the President manifested the same zeal in the study of the problem of cheap transportation for our own people as he does to the admission by another people of their foreign imports free, his services might result in substantial benefit. We have our own great home markets. To reach these from our widely-extended parts, in the least possible time and with the least possible cost is a matter of vast moment to the industries of the whole nation.

The more numerous the avenues of transit the greater the competition for traffic, and the greater the competition the cheaper the rate. While this may not always be the result as to land transportation, and indeed often finds competition producing combination, yet as to the navigable water ways of the nation we can always rely upon them to offer us a secure refuge against the extortion of monopolies and of unjust discrimination in transportation.

By so much as these exceed just and reasonable charges the producer is impoverished, the consumer is taxed, the laborer is deprived. The producing regions of this nation lie parallel with the great rivers and lakes. No exclusive transit on these waters can ever be secured. These are the highways of all the people. The flat-boat, the skiff, and the barge of the poor man find the same welcome tide and the same propelling current as those which float the yacht of the rich man or the mammoth freight-carriers of the corporation. No combination, no trusts, no rebates, no discrimination can reverse the currents or blow a stronger wind for the rich than the poor. Here, then, is "an opportunity for safe, careful, and deliberate reform." Let us have more free trade and more fair trade on our own waters. Let us reach the farm of the farmer, the mill of the miller, the product of the factory on cheaper highways. We hear much elocution over the "poor man's coat" and the "cheap blanket" as they shall come from the hands of the foreign workman, but little is said as to the monopoly of carriage of the poor man's bread. He pays a far greater tribute on home transportation than he does through custom-houses. We had far better improve and cheapen the ways to our rich home markets.

What can more appeal to the sympathy of the nation on the one hand, or excite its just indignation on the other than the oppressive tax on transportation which is levied on the products of labor on the wide and fertile domain of the Pacific Northwest? There we behold a river, the third on the continent, and which drains an area equal to one-fifth of the nation, excluding Alaska; a river which carries on its own bosom the deep-draught ships of the ocean further inland than any other of the Republic, and yet not one bushel of grain, not one pound of wool can find a way to our own markets until it has surrendered one-fourth of its own value in freight tariff to the imperial "custom-house" of railway monopoly. Every bushel of grain carried 87 miles by rail, from The Dalles to Portland, is taxed 12 cents a bushel. Along almost the entire distance, and parallel with the rail, often washing its bridges and culverts, flow the deep and majestic waters of the proud Columbia.

This exceeds the freight rate from Chicago to New York by water, 1,000 miles in distance.

Let me beg the attention of the representatives of the Illinois, Iowa, and Minnesota farmers to their happy condition in contrast with the farmers of the Columbia River basin.

And when it is said foreign import duties should be abolished or revised in order that our producers may reach a foreign market to buy as well as to sell, is it forgotten that of the 17,000,000 bushels of wheat awaiting export from the tributaries of the Columbia every bushel is charged a greater tax for its transit of 87 miles along the Columbia by rail than it costs to ship it 4,000 miles by water from New York to Liverpool?

Could the distinguished President not here see "an opportunity for safe, careful, and deliberate reform?"

The representatives of the people in Congress assembled, under their constitutional right to "regulate commerce among the several States," voted liberal appropriations of the immense surplus in the Treasury to improve the water ways of the country and thus to relieve our people from the burdens imposed by excessive charges on land transportation. Twelve million dollars were voted. This would have reduced the idle surplus and "restored it to its place among the people," and 90 per cent. would have found its way to the wage-earner in labor, and he could have received an honest day's wages for an honest day's toil. Consumption would have been increased, production stimulated through the expenditures, and incalculable benefits conferred on the whole people. But the President prevented this reduction of the surplus. He did not question the constitutionality of the appropriation. He did not assert the impolicy nor the extravagance of the proposed expenditure, nor did he deny that it could be profitably expended.

He says in his message:

> This condition of our Treasury is not altogether new, and it has more than once of late been submitted to the people's representatives in the Congress, who alone can supply a remedy.

And yet when they "supply a remedy," he vetoes it! This he does in the face of a condition which he warns us "is more than ever presaging financial convulsion and widespread disaster." Who, we can well ask, is more responsible than himself for the continuance of this very disaster which we are all so anxious to remedy?

RELIEVE THE OLD SOLDIERS OF THE REPUBLIC.

The people's representatives would also supply a remedy in the payment of a just and sacred obligation to the old soldiers of the Republic, for now is a time to be remindful of those brave men who preserved us in war. Several hundred thousand of them still survive, with a few of other wars, including those against the hostile savages of our own frontiers.

Age and infirmity have already reached most of them, while poverty and pain are the companions of many. Thousands of them, penniless and in want, have at last sought an asylum in the almshouses of the country when relief was denied them by the Government which they saved. We instinctively revolt at the thought that it is possible that one of that noble throng who volunteered their lives for the Republic should now, in its hour of supreme prosperity, suffer them to become subjects of neglect and ingratitude.

They can well recall the day when they went forth to battle, that the Treasury had no surplus to trouble the nation. They saw it in debt, and paying ruinous interest to maintain its sinking credit.

Their work sustained the integrity and unity of the Republic. As the old Emperor said of Rome—that he found it of brick and left it of marble—so the old soldiers may say of their Government, that they found it a bankrupt, but will leave it the richest, the most prosperous, and the most powerful on earth.

Let us, then, while they live, be generous to these faithful guardians of the nation. Whatever we may do in their behalf let it not be forgotten we shall still owe them a debt—the debt—which we shall never, never be rich enough to pay. When they are gone let us remember in liberality their widows and orphans. Let us single out the few survivors of those who endured the agonies of prison life—whose systems will ever remain poisoned with the virus absorbed amid the vapors and disease of their dungeon exile.

Let us remember in particular the one who was a private in the ranks and who may not have epaulets and distinction to commend him. Let us equalize the pay of the soldier who received his compensation in depreciated greenbacks, while the banker and bondholder received theirs in appreciated gold. Mere justice—common honesty—will dictate the payment at least of the difference. The soldier's dollar should be equal to the bondholder's dollar. One offered his life to save the Republic, the other his money. Let us be just. Then repeal, what I conceive to be the unjust distinction made in the arrearage act. This erects a bar depriving those applying after a certain date for arrears, while allowing its benefits to those vigilant enough to apply before, although the merits are equal. Besides this, the bounties should be equalized. Let us be honest and pay the old pioneers of the West who furnished supplies and services to the Government in her Indian wars, and who have been begging for years for compensation for their homes and property destroyed by hostile Indians. Keeping in remembrance the numerous Presidential vetoes of measures in relief of those old veterans, it seems almost vain to hope that any portion of the surplus will be permitted in appropriation for these noble objects with executive approval.

IN TIME OF PEACE PREPARE FOR WAR.

The people's representatives would supply other remedies for reduction. We have as a nation a long line of defenseless seacoast, which in time of war will permit dangerous inroads for the enemy; while at the same time the towns and cities within reach must at once be abandoned or suffer destruction without the least attempt in self-protection. The entrances to our bays and rivers are without guard, garrison, or fortification, and the inshore may be laid waste with no timely retaliation. No other nation on the globe is so perfectly indifferent or thoroughly defenseless in this respect. The wise admonition of the great Washington appeals to us now with earnest significance, "In time of peace prepare for war." Experience has taught us that national defense is self-defense, and self-defense is the first law of nature.

LET US PAY OUR DEBTS.

But should there still be a disinclination to reduce the surplus for either of the objects mentioned there should be no hesitancy to apply it, and every dollar of it, in payment of the indebtedness of the Government. In three years hence there will mature $230,000,000, bearing 4½ per cent. interest. That these bonds might be purchased and retired gradually before maturity to the extent of the accumulated surplus, the President was expressly authorized by act of March 3, 1881, in the following language to so use the surplus:

> That the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds.

But he did not do it. The law was ignored. He permitted the surplus to accumulate. Every effort to reduce it by appropriations failed. The dependent pension bill passed Congress appropriating $20,000,000. This he vetoed. The river and harbor bill passed Congress appropriating $12,000,000. This he vetoed. Still the surplus remained locked up and retained from circulation among the people. It continued to increase.

On January 1, 1891, as I have before shown, our bonded indebtedness of $230,000,000 will fall due. Had the surplus money in the Treasury been paid to our creditors and the bonds taken up, but little of the debt would have remained at maturity. We could well afford to have paid the premium upon the bonds, and been a great gainer, than to have permitted the interest to grow while the surplus millions were accumulating in the vaults of the Treasury. A government should be at least as prudent as an ordinary business man. What would he have done with his notes outstanding and not yet due, and money accumulating in his business for which he had no use? He would have met his creditors and proposed to call in his notes to the extent of his surplus money, paying principal and interest and a reasonable premium. This would afford an inducement to the creditor, and largely so to the debtor.

WHY WAS THE SURPLUS NOT REDUCED?

When this law of Congress was so entirely ignored and the surplus still retained, a widespread impression was at once created that this mountain of gold and silver was purposely and persistently allowed to accumulate, so that the country might be alarmed, and that it could be said, as the President at last said, that the situation was "more than ever presaging financial convulsion and widespread disaster," and then by a combined attack on the protective policy of the country assume that the crisis was due to the unnecessary continuance of the duties on foreign imports. Had the surplus been reduced in expenditures on river and harbor improvements, on dependent pensions, on sea-coast defenses, on the rebuilding of our Navy, or in the redemption of the bonded indebtedness, it can readily be seen that no surplus would exist, and hence that the chief argument now urged for so sweeping a reduction of the tariff could likewise not exist.

The President, when the country became aroused at his decided refusal to obey the law and thus reduce the surplus, at last explains that the law was—> subject to the supposition that it was intended as temporary and limited in its application, instead of conferring a continuing discretion and authority.

This is his own language.

The law says:

May at any time apply the supply money in the Treasury * * * to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds.

Can any one misinterpret the full scope and meaning of this? Can language be more comprehensible? Can any limitation in its application here be implied? Who could "suppose" that it was intended as temporary? But he bases his supposition on the fact that the law is found in an appropriation bill. This gave rise to a scruple as to its permanent character. But it has been well observed that the President evidently does not entertain the same supposition and doubt when it comes to the President's increased salary, which was provided for in a law in an appropriation bill. Has he refused to receive any of this increased salary? Other laws are passed in appropriation bills and obeyed and enforced. This Congress is continually enacting such, and they are approved by the Executive.

But this authority was ordained in 1881. If he had the doubt and supposition now relied on, why is it that this doubt was not communicated to Congress and a recommendation submitted that more clearly-defined authority by special act be conferred upon him? The law having passed Congress, it became a mandate of the people; it was their instruction to him; and whether he approved of the policy or not he should, in deference to their sovereign will, have requested a construction of the act or a more specific enactment, and not have waited since his election to express this doubt and until the surplus had accumulated to $60,000,000, and then raise the alarm of "financialconvulsion and widespread disaster," and then admonish us that the surplus will amount to $140,000,000 in June, 1888.

OUR NATION STILL LARGELY IN DEBT.

But what of the indebtedness of the nation? Not one word is found in the entire message as to our entire outstanding obligations. It would not have answered the purpose of the President to have brought these facts into prominent notice. That would have exposed the fallacy of his reasoning. It would have shown at once that no surplus could exist if our debts were paid. Nor does he explain how this indebtedness is to be paid if the revenues are reduced to the minimum proposed by him and the Ways and Means Committee.

OUR PUBLIC DEBT.

Let us examine our condition in this respect.

Amount of public debt outstanding, as per public debt statement for month of June, 1887	$1,688,229,630
Present outstanding interest-bearing debt	1,260,000,000

Has this been forgotten? How shall we provide for that with tariff for ordinary expenses only? In 1891 there will mature the funded loan of $250,000,000; in 1907 there will mature the funded loan of $737,800,600.

OUR REVENUES AND OUR EXPENDITURES.

For a more satisfactory study of this great subject, it is well to view the great balance-sheet of our country, and there find from whence our revenues are derived and for what purpose expended, and this is seen in the following:

The ordinary revenues of the Government from all sources for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1887, were:

From customs	$217,286,893.13
From internal revenue	118,823,391.22
From sales of public lands	9,254,286.42
From profits on coinage, bullion deposits, and assays	8,929,252.83
From tax on national banks	2,385,851.18
From fees—consular, letters patent, and land	3,301,647.16
From customs fees, fines, penalties, etc	1,053,037.86
From sales of Indian lands	1,479,028.81
From Soldiers' Home, permanent fund	1,226,259.47
From sinking-fund for Pacific railways	1,364,435.87
From repayment of interest by Pacific railways	914,793.13
From sales of old public buildings	624,882.20
From sales of Government property	262,832.32
From immigrant-fund	258,402.50
From tax on seal-skins	317,452.75
From deposits by individuals for surveying public lands	94,289.76
From revenues of the District of Columbia	2,367,869.01
From miscellaneous sources	1,458,672.04
Total ordinary receipts	371,403,277.66

The ordinary expenditures for the same period were:

For civil expenses	22,072,436.27
For foreign intercourse	7,104,490.47
For Indian service	6,194,522.69
For pensions	75,029,101.79
For the military establishment, including rivers and harbors and arsenals	38,561,025.85
For the naval establishment, including vessels, machinery, and improvements at navy-yards	15,141,126.80
For miscellaneous expenditures, including public buildings, lighthouses, and collecting the revenue	52,002,647.46
For expenditures on account of the District of Columbia	4,085,251.39
For interest on the public debt	47,741,577.25
For the sinking fund	47,903,248.15
Total ordinary expenditures	315,835,428.12
Leaving a surplus of	55,567,849.54

On the 1st of December last there was in the Treasury of available funds after every ordinary obligation had been provided for $55,258,701.19. On the 1st day of February last this had increased to $85,230,746.09. If the will of the people as expressed in the act of March 3, 1881, had been obeyed, not one dollar of this money would remain in the Treasury. While the reductions proposed by the representatives of sixty millions of people have either been vetoed or studiously ignored, still the necessity exists for some action. This is admitted by all parties. But how will the President agree to dispose of the surplus in the Treasury? If we have any intimation at all, it is through the suggestions of his Secretary of the Treasury. He advises that the money lie in banks, and as by diminished taxation the annual revenues will be less than the appropriations, to this extent this surplus then in the banks could be used for the ordinary expenses of the Government.

By the time this money could be so spent "the revenues would have so increased as to be equal to proper annual expenses." And this again explains why it is that every effort to expend this money directly among the people for public improvements, for the relief of the old soldiers of the Republic, or in the redemption of Government bonds has met the sturdy resistance of the Administration. The banks could not obtain the benefit of it! Here we see the all-pervading influence of Wall street. The voice of the people as against such inspirations is a myth!

As thus it is proposed to retain the present surplus our consideration is next invited to the great scheme of preventing any further revenues beyond the actual and ordinary expenditures of the Government, and to do this the destruction of that policy which has nursed this nation in its hour of affliction and bankruptcy and raised it to its present proud eminence among all the nations of the earth.

For one, I believe in removing various tariff inequalities. Some duties, as I view them, are entirely unnecessary. I am, sir, this far a revenue reformer, but not for the mere purpose of reducing the present surplus nor preventing future surplus revenue beyond ordinary governmental expenditures.

I am a believer in the "general welfare" clause in the Constitution of the United States, and in that other clause therein, "To regulate commerce between the States," and to this end the liberal expenditure of public money in the improvement of the water ways of the nation and the various other requirements to which I have referred.

THE TWO CHIEF REVENUES.

We find the two chief sources of revenue to be:

From customs	$217,286,893.13
From internal revenue	118,823,391.22

The first is that which is imposed as a duty or tax on all imports, and is not borne directly by the people, but is collected through the custom-houses of the nation. It may be said to be a tax on foreign production, paid by the foreign producer, except where like articles are not largely produced here, when the consumer pays it in the added cost. The second is that direct tax upon certain objects within the country, and is at present derived as follows:

Internal-revenue taxes for the year ending June 30, 1887.

Spirits	$65,829,321.71
Tobacco	30,108,067.13
Fermented liquors	21,922,187.49
Oleomargarine	723,948.04
Bank circulation	4,288.37
Penalties, etc	220,204.83
Collections under repealed laws	15,373.65
	118,823,391.22

THE MAJORITY FAVOR A TARIFF FOR REVENUE ONLY.

The greater portion of the majority of this House propose a revision of the former class largely to the extent of a tariff for revenue only, and where incidental protection is permitted it is only as a compromise. Ultimately this party will favor a duty on only such foreign imports as are not produced here, excepting, with discreditable partiality, such staples in the South as sugar, rice, tobacco, etc., as is done in the pending bill. Under this system we relieve the foreigner of taxation, and American consumers pay all the duties.

The foreign production in other respects will find here an open market and unrestricted competition with American products and American labor. Many of these advocates deny with much warmth the imputation that they are "free-traders." "Incidental protection" can not save them, for this is no protection at all, and is practical free trade.

What are we to understand by "protection?" That imposition of a duty on all such objects imported as are produced here, and just so much as will equal the difference in foreign and American labor. This is protection.

Remove this difference and you have free trade. As labor in almost everything in traffic constitutes the chief value in the article, so it is labor virtually which is made subject to either protection or free trade. If the article in one country is the product of cheap labor, it must, with free trade, supplant that of the other country where labor is not cheap. We say we shall have "cheap goods," "cheap wool," and "cheap lumber," but it would be more appropriate to say we should have cheaper labor in these articles.

Well may we sympathize with that misguided man who is a toiler with his hands, when he boasts that under free trade we shall have cheap goods. When he raises the gate of protection and allows ingress to the Trojan horse of free trade, it will open its flanks and overwhelm him in his own citadel with its armed conquerors.

He is forging a chain with which to manacle his own limbs. The most conclusive arguments, however, are results. It is to these we turn to resolve our doubts as to the superior virtue of protection or free trade.

A COMPARISON OF WAGES.

As wages is the price of labor, and labor is the capital of the workman, is it not natural that he should prefer that policy or that market that pays him the most on his capital? As the merchant takes his wares, so the workman takes his labor to the market of greatest profit.

Under our present system the laborer is much better off than is his competitor on free-trade shores. He obtains superior wages, and pays but a small advance in price for his necessaries.

A few instances will suffice:

Carroll D. Wright, chief of the Massachusetts bureau of labor statistics in 1882, made a comparison of the difference in wages and living between a weaver and his two children in Massachusetts and a like number in Lancashire, England. The former earns per week $10.30, the latter earns $6.96—an excess of $3.34 to the Massachusetts weaver.

COMPARISON OF LIVING.

The same statistician presents the expenses of a family in England and one in Massachusetts.

It is thus shown that wages are better and living but a trifle greater under protection America than in free-trade England. But it is said by the free-trader, "We pay dearly for this enhanced price on American labor in being deprived of buying in a cheaper market." And then the poor man is appealed to and eloquent perorations are uttered and many feigned tears shed in defense of this oppressed victim of the robber manufacturer. The cost of a blanket or a suit of clothes is the most common illustration. The price in England is quoted and to this they add the import duty, and then defiantly remind the American laborer that for similar manufacture in the United States he must pay this sum and thus pay tribute to the robber tariff. With this they then proclaim that the duty becomes a tax. "If it is not what is it for?" they ask.

PROTECTION BEGETS CHEAP PRICES.

To refute this absurd and misleading impression that a duty is a tax it has been shown in this Chamber, in the case of the "poor man's blanket" recently imported from England, that a similar article, a five-pound American blanket, was selling here for $5.20, whereas, if the free-trader's theory is correct, the account would stand:

Cost in England at wholesale	$4.45
Duty	4.25
Customs fees	.65
Total	9.35

The protectionist answers in this wise:

Cost of blanket in England at wholesale	$4.45
Higher price paid American labor	.75
Wholesale price of American blanket	5.20

The duty on calico is 5 cents a yard, and yet its retail price is that now. When this class of industry was in its infancy in this country, machinery crude, operatives unskillful, and the custom patronizing its old foreign markets, the free-trader's present statement contained truth, for in that period of the struggling industry even a higher duty than the present added to the English cost could not breathe into it the life of competition.

But protection nursed it, fed it, and guarded it from attacks by the full-grown, skillful, and vigorous wolf of "free trade," until at last it has lived to manhood, and now in its consciousness of acquired skill it promises in a brief period to meet "free trade" at its very doors and compete for the mastery of its own markets.

Many other American industries have already reached this proud vantage ground.

Cutlery, hardware, tools, reapers, mowers, drills, harness, trace-chains, American saws, shovels, forks, are all exported to England to-day and sell in that market.

American watches and clocks are found in every portion of Europe, as well as American boots and shoes and American cotton fabrics. The American laborer can also buy his furniture, his carpet, and his nails cheaper here than in England. The farmer can buy his wagons cheaper here than an Englishman can make them, together with his mowers and thrashers. With a little more encouragement and a little more of our intense spirit of rivalry and competition among ourselves, and soon not a product of American manufacture can be made cheaper in Europe, and with improved skill and improved machinery and our fertile inventive genius, we shall become the cheapest and best as we are now the greatest manufacturing nation on the earth.

COMPETITION DID THE REST.

All must concede that prices have gone steadily down as the American home manufacturers have increased in skill and obtained home patronage. Twenty years ago the farm wife paid $1.50 for a calico dress of 10 yards, while now our manufactures have so improved and their trade so increased that 60 cents will buy the same article. Twenty years ago protection was in its infancy, and see how it has cheapened prices since. But contrast the prices under rigorous free trade before 1860. A calico dress would cost then $2.50, and thus with everything else. But now these articles are, many of them, sold cheaper than in free-trade England. To compete with us the foreign import must be sold as cheap. What then becomes of the President's philosophy when he tells us that the price is raised to consumers by "precisely the sum paid for such duties?" Let us always remember that the great secret of the continued advance in cheap prices with us is due to our own competition. Among ourselves we have free trade, but as against the foreigner we have protection. It is internal competition on the one hand and external competition on the other.

Protection has already secured the one and will soon secure the other, as it has in many instances. Here is where our situation is unlike that of any other nation. We are many nations in one. We have every diversified industry and every known resource. The States engage in reciprocal traffic. They have everything within themselves. They are dependent on none. They have their own market. They find here an exclusive sale for those perishable articles of production which can not bear export. It is this new problem which the professors fail to comprehend.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF PROTECTION.

The whole philosophy of protection and ultimate cheap prices may be resolved into an axiom: Protection begets production, production begets competition, and competition begets cheap prices. This is demonstrated by experience. It is even illustrated in the cross-roads store. It is the pioneer of the country, and protected by the conditions which surround it. Prices are high. Soon population increases and the demand increases, and competition is the result and an opposition store is induced to come. Prices cheapen. This invariable result demonstrates the absurdity that the manufacturers of the country are becoming millionaires by reason of their immense profits. Does it not stand to reason that if such inducements were held out to capital that still more would embark in the business? Why is it that at a moment's notice this Government could borrow millions of dollars at 3 per cent. and less of interest? Is it reasonable to assume that this could happen so long as opportunities existed to realize from 8 to 15 per cent. in manufacturing?

The more we buy from England the more she must manufacture for us and the less we shall manufacture for ourselves, and soon we shall have little to sell. We shall then buy more than we sell. The balance of trade will be against us. Our surplus money will go to England. Scarcity of money at home cripples trade, diminishes labor, lowers wages, increases interest, reduces consumption, and lessens the demand. In this condition a nation soon becomes a slave to a foreign market. We had far better sell in a highly protected market where we can have something with which to buy than to buy in a free-trade market where we shall have nothing to sell. When we surrender our diversified and protected home market to the cheap producer of foreign lands we surrender our best resources for buying.

It is much easier to-day for a poor man to purchase a suit of clothes with a saving of ten days' labor than to have purchased a like suit in the days of free trade with a saving of twenty days' labor. It is not so much that clothing is cheaper now as that wages are much higher. If our manufacturing, our wool-growing, our lumbering, etc., is to be done in foreign countries it is there, and not here, the wages will be paid. To us it will be the killing of the goose that lays the golden egg.

In that contingency it is possible that some things may be cheaper, but let it always be remembered that nothing is cheap to him who has nothing with which to buy.

An old settler was known to be very fond of boasting to those later in the country, when everything had advanced and prospered with civilization and enterprise, how once he could have bought there so cheaply. Pointing out vast farms of rolling meadows and golden grain he would say that he knew the time when he could have bought them for a pair of old boots. When asked to explain why he did not purchase on such inviting terms, he would reply, "Well, I did not have the old boots."

OUR LUMBER RESOURCES.

An immense industry both on land and water, in external and inland commerce, is our vast lumber business. This is among those to be placed under the free-trade guillotine. Our rich lumber market is offered to the foreign lumber merchant. The effect of this legislation will perhaps prove more disastrous to the Pacific coast than to any other portion of the Union.

THE PACIFIC COAST.

The extent and increase of this business on the Pacific are shown in the output for 1880 and 1887, as follows:

	Feet.
California	304,795,000
Oregon	177,171,000
Washington	160,176,000
Idaho	18,204,000
Nevada	21,545,000
Arizona	10,715,000
Total in 1880	692,606,000

There were employed to manufacture this 4,784 men. The feet of lumber cut in 1887 may be thus given:

Washington	600,000,000
Oregon	300,000,000
California	400,000,000
Miscellaneous	70,000,000
Total	1,370,000,000

THE TIMBER BELT OF THE PACIFIC.

The varieties as well as quantity of the Pacific coast lumber for commercial purposes are far famed. The hard-woods, such as maple, ash, and myrtle, are found on the Coquille River and other streams as well. The unrivaled Port Orford cedar, the fir (Oregon pine), spruce, and sugar pine on Coos Bay, Puget Sound, Umpqua, Columbia River, Gray's Harbor, Shoalwater Bay, Tillamook, Siuslaw, and on Humboldt Bay and other points lower down, with the world-renowned redwoods of California, embrace an area on the Coast Range not less than 25 miles in width, and lie between 44° and 52° north latitude, 8 degrees or 560 miles in length. On the Cascades and Sierras is found in greatest abundance the sugar pine.

In Alaska are extensive forests of yellow pine covering an area almost as large as the rest of the coast west of Nevada. Like the forests of Norway, those along the Pacific, owing to the humid atmosphere, are reproductive, and when denuded soon recover a new and rapid growth of the parent species. Not only is manufactured lumber here of value for local export, but millions of feet are now shipped by rail to points as far east as Chicago, and already over one-twelfth of the annual product is exported to foreign countries, as the following statistics show:

PROSPERITY EXISTS.

Wherever you find a lumber manufacture you find prosperity within a wide radius of it. The forests of the Pacific afford one of the most majestic sights of the world. Often they seem like immense parks, and as if regulated and selected by the foresight of man. Trees of an ever varying foliage exist. Some tower so high as to reach a height of 200 to 300 feet. The diameter of many will average 8 feet, and of most from 3 to 5, while some remarkable red woods are known to have so huge a trunk as when sawed through will permit the passage of a wagon and team through the standing tree. Some acres are often found to yield 2,000,000 feet, board measure.

These great parks are merry with the music of the mills, the ring of the ax, the fall of the tree, and the moving of the timber. A constant demand for well paid labor exists. A home market is at hand to the small farmers and settlers. Here they sell at remunerative prices their flour, butter, milk, eggs, lard, bacon, fruits, berries, vegetables, hay, and barley. Many of these products, and indeed the most profitable of them, could not reach a foreign market, because of their perishable nature. For 300 miles on the Oregon coast this excellent home market exists for the farmer. The merchant, the blacksmith, the cattle dealer, the butcher, the gardener, and the farmers are all invited to partake of the revenues supplied by these lumber industries. They create a demand. A reciprocity of trade exists. All are protected by our existing tariff.

There are on our coast over 35,000 people engaged in the lumber business, and over 400 American vessels, aggregating 175,000 tons, and most of them moving up and down the coast, entering even the smallest rivers and bays and bringing business to communities which have no other commerce or any outlet to market; for these coasters in addition to lumber transport the farmers' produce. But how is it elsewhere? Nearly every State has large lumbering interests. In 1880 there were 147,956 men employed; wages paid, $31,845,974. The nation's lumber product value was $232,268,729. It exceeds that of the iron, cotton, or woolen trades of the nation. Our timber resources, protected, are so abundant that local competition will always keep the prices at a minimum.

THESE INDUSTRIES IMPERILLED.

Sir, I admonish gentlemen of the serious results which must follow to the great and active business of the lumbermen on the Pacific coast and elsewhere in the nation should the proposed repeal of the duty on lumber be effected. As to the region of the Great Lakes and in the New England States, as well as on the Pacific, our situation is peculiar. There they lie adjacent to a foreign country. We behold the inexhaustible forests of the Dominion of Canada. Shut out largely at present by our present tariff, we have fortunately had no occasion to realize the effect of competition of free lumber. By water, as well as by land, the avenues will open. Already, so cheap is their labor, they can overcome the duty and enter our rich markets with many products. The Dominion lands may be purchased for $1 per acre, and as high as 640 acres to any one person. They also have a homestead and pre-emption law.

Of their occupied lands in 1881, 21,899,982 acres were returned as improved, of which 15,112,284 acres were under crops and 6,385,562 acres were in pasture. In that year they produced 150,000,000 bushels of oats, wheat, rye, and barley, with immense yield of other products; but immeasurably greater in resources is their lumber. In their eastern forests already extensive mills are in operation. On their British Columbia shores we find forests next to our own in quality and inexhaustible in quantity, stretching northward from Victoria and Vancouver and Burrow's Inlet to the Alaskan boundary. Remove the duty from their lumber exports and at once you remove the margin of labor profit from our own lumberman. You drive him either to compete with cheap competing labor or to retire from business; and Americans can not and will not endure this most laborious and often dangerous occupation for less wages and less profit than at present. As it is now, but few loggers realize much more than a comfortable livelihood, and during the recent depreciation in the lumber market it was a struggle for many mill companies to escape bankruptcy. With this repeal they must retire, their mills they must close, their camps abandon, and all operations cease. As if by magic an air of desolation will pervade our forests and mills. Other industries will feel the decline.

But in the Canadian and British Columbia forests active operations will at once commence. Progress will be great and rapid. There will be cheap lumber on cheap lands and by cheap labor. To those discouraged and long-waiting Canadian people it will be the dawn of a new day. At once the stimulus of trade and traffic and labor so recently ours will be transferred to these foreign shores. Our home market this far will vanish. Their great prize will be the American markets. Our farmers can not follow our industries. Cheap farm labor and Canadian tariffs will shut them out.

CHINESE IN MILLS AND LUMBER CAMPS.

We shall also find there an element in the transferred industry we did not expect. Cheap Chinese laborers peering across from their innumerable Asiatic throngs will welcome an invitation to this new field of labor. Here will be a haven for this degraded class. But what shall be said of us? Tell me, you defenders of American labor with whom I have associated and united in this Congress for just and neo-essary legislation in behalf of the toiling masses, what say you who vote to tear down the wall of protection to American lumbering interests to the effect you produce in bringing this cheap, starving labor of China to compete with American citizens—the honest laborers of our own country?

Can you vindicate your inconsistency? By our restrictive anti-Chinese legislation we drive these Mongolian slaves from our shores and thus protect American workmen against competition from the cheap labor of a degraded class. Yet, in the face of this, and by free-trade legislation, you make it possible—aye, desirable—that these same people may manufacture and labor and produce on Canadian soil and enter their products in our American markets in defiant and exultant competition with our own labor then unprotected. If we are the friends of labor, let us demonstrate it. Let us be sincere. Let us look to results more than to theories.

For these reasons we assert that the repeal of the buty on lumber is a mischievous, unwarrantable, and grossly-injurious measure.

American labor, American capital, and American home markets will all suffer a common fate in an unavoidable disaster.

Another industry, next in value, but more extended among the people, is that of wool-growing. This has been singled out and denounced in the Executive message. The President complains that the profit of the wool-grower is enhanced to the extent of the duty, and this alone, he says, equals about one-third the price of the wool of the former.

The tariff then raises the prices of the wool, according to the President, and this every wool-grower has found to be true. But Mr. MILLS thinks differently. In a speech delivered in February last at Providence, R. I., where it was doubtless thought the manufacturers desired cheaper wool, he said:

In 1860 they wanted more tariff, and they were successful in retaining it, and wool commenced going down. In 1867 was made the celebrated tariff which excluded all wool from the country except low carpet wool, and it has been going down lower and lower, and that is what the high tariff has done, making a lower price for wool.

If he is right, then explain to us what the President means when he says of this duty on wool:

And that it constitutes a tax which with relentless grasp is fastened upon the clothing of every man, woman, and child?

And that—

It is in order that the price of their wool may be increased?

Now, we are asked to compete on equal terms with the degraded labor of Australia and the Argentine Republic. In the latter we find 100,000,000 sheep, and herders are paid $3 per month, while in Oregon they receive from $20 to $40 per month. Is it any wonder that with the present tariff these people have entered our markets, increasing the imports from 1,715,699 pounds in 1882 to 14,038,030 pounds in 1887? Who is so blind as can not see that free trade in wool is the death-knell to American wool industries, and means the slaughter of our sheep and the consequent scarcity and increased price for mutton, the favorite meat of the poor man.

Under what system of economy or sound business method, laying aside all patriotic principles, do the President and the Ways and Means Committee justify their course in favoring free importation of foreign wools, which last year returned a duty of $6,000,000, and which yields to our own American producers of the North and West an annual income of $75,000,000, saying nothing of the $15,000,000 worth of mutton sheep sold in our markets? And yet, with all this, that these same "revenue reformers" should protect the sugar of the South, yielding only about $15,000,000 income, for the protection of which the American consumers are asked to pay an annual tax of $60,000,000, is a subject of grave reflection to all. Wool only imposed a "relentless grasp" of 12 cents on each inhabitant, while the duty on sugar "fastened" a tax of $1 on every man, woman, and child in the land. If all the wool tariff were removed, it would only reduce the surplus to the extent of $6,000,000! Is it for this so great a sacrifice must now be made?

WOOL-GROWERS' PROTEST.

Flock-masters everywhere ask for the retention of the present duty. They even desire a higher protection, and petition for a restoration of the duty of 1867. If a higher duty produced diminished prices is it reasonable to believe they would desire its enactment?

The Wool-Growers' Association, which assembled last fall at Washington, Pa., unanimously adopted the following:

Whereas there are those who are untiring in their efforts to destroy our industry by placing wool on the free-list in the tariff system of our country; and

Whereas, by false classification and fraud in our custom-houses, foreign wool is being admitted at but a nominal duty, thereby nullifying the protection now promised us on the face of the law; and

Whereas this threatening attitude of the free-trade element in legislation and the enormous importations now made in third-class wools, paying but from 2½ to 5 cents per pound duty on wool that should be imported as first class and second class, and requiring a duty of 10 and 12 cents, is the leading cause of the present depression and low price, and also the present admitted practice of importing scoured wool as unwashed at 10 cents per pound when it should pay 30.

At a meeting of Ohio wool-growers, held at Columbus last August, the committee reported—

That all are of opinion (wool growers and manufacturers) that the several interests are in great danger of serious injury from efforts to be made at the next session of Congress to pass unfriendly and disastrous laws in regard to their business.

When we view the astounding growth of the wool industry, the great per cent. of population employed in it, and the revenues it yields our own people, we are amazed to find intelligent persons seriously threatening to annihilate it. From 60,264,913 pounds in 1859 it increased to 302,000,000 pounds in 1885, while the imports of foreign wool increased from 26,282,935 pounds to 70,596,170 pounds. Has any member ever received any petitions from wool-growers asking that wool be made free? Have any petitions or resolutions from any other bodies come to us with this request? No more scathing rebuke was ever administered than that contained in the resolutions of the Wool-Growers' Association which assembled in this city in December, which are as follows:

The wool-dealers and wool-growers of the United States, representing a capital of over $500,000,000 and a constituency of a million wool-growers and wool-dealers, assembled in conference in the city of Washington this 7th day of December, 1887, having read the first annual message of the President to the Fiftieth Congress, declare that the sentiments of the message are a direct attack upon their industry, one of the most important of the country, and in positive violation of the national Democratic platform of 1884, as interpreted by the party leaders and accepted by the rank and file of the party; that the argument made by the President for the removal of our protection against foreign competition is the old one, repeatedly made by the enemies of our industrial progress, and effectively answered in nearly every school district of our land, and so thoroughly disproved by the logic of facts and the demonstrations of experience and history, as to need no answer from us. We acknowledge that our "small holdings," our scattered and unorganized condition, make us the easy prey of the free-trader, but we had a right to expect something different from the Chief Executive of the nation, at once the most happy, prosperous, and contented of any of the world, made so by a policy of protection and development which he now seeks to destroy. We had a right to expect our President would favor the wool-growers of the United States, and confess our deep disappointment that instead he favors the interests of our foreign competitors.

In 1883 a severe blow was struck at this great wealth by the reduction of the duty, and at once the flocks of the country began to decrease until at the commencement of this year they only amounted to 43,544,755 from 50,626,626 in 1884, a loss of nearly 6,000,000 sheep, or about $12,000,000.

OREGON INJURED.

This legislation will affect my own State seriously. The flocks of Oregon increased from 634,400 sheep in 1875 to 2,593,029 in 1887. The wool yield for last year is estimated at 14,000,000 pounds. It gave then to our people about $3,000,000, not counting the sales of mutton sheep. Millions of acres are utilized there in this industry which will prove unprofitable in any other. We are now the fourth State already as to number of sheep, hence it can be seen what we shall suffer under this "reform."

ENGLAND CONFESSES.

And yet with all this our nation is quietly but surely driving to the wall the wool industry in free-trade England. A little more protection and their works must at last fall before the all-conquering energy of the American. A most significant acknowledgment of this is from England's royal commission, which was appointed to "inquire into the depression of trade and industry in Great Britain." Hear what they say in their report as to their wool and woolen industry:

The seriously diminished value of our exports of woolens during the years 1880 to 1884 as compared with the years 1870 to 1874 must be accepted as a clear proof that foreign tariffs are the great cause at work to prevent the natural and healthy growth of this important industry in this country. How rapidly they must have been growing in France, Germany, and the United States, whilst comparatively languishing here, is strikingly shown in the tables on the preceding page. In the eight years from 1876 to 1884 France, Germany, and the United States increased their annual consumption of wool by 325,000,000 pounds, or, allowing for the estimated diminution of the home production of France and Germany, 295,000,000 pounds—that is, 45 per cent.—while ours increased by only 12,000,000 pounds, or 3¾ per cent. * * *

This is illustrated by the extraordinary fact that whilst the value of our exports of worsted and woolen manufactures in the five years from 1880 to 1884 exhibited, as compared with the five years from 1865 to 1869, a decrease of 43.1 per cent., the value of our imports, comparing with the same period, showed an increase of no less than 214.9 per cent.

This fact confirms the evidence given before us by witnesses connected with the various industries that in the case of countries like Germany, possessing in ample measure the population and other resources required for successful manufacturing enterprise, the adoption of a system of import duties on manufactures, and even on primary articles of food, has not disqualified them from successful and growing competition with us in the home and colonial as well as in the neutral markets.

OUR MARVELOUS PROGRESS.

This best of all admissions should satisfy any mind what is for the best interest of our country. Free-traders are the friends of Britain. They would destroy our barriers to save the "natural and healthy growth of this important industry" to England. Why will any American favor such suicidal policy? Are we not each decade making marvelous progress in this industry? Look at the figures: 1865, 155,000,000 pounds produced; 1875, 192,000,000 pounds; 1880, 240,000,000; in 1886, 285,000,000! Our manufactures of woolens are annually increasing, and each year becoming cheaper and cheaper to the consumer. Our importation of foreign woolen goods has relatively decreased, and hence the wail of the "royal commission." Between 1850 and 1860 imported woolens averaged $1.09 per capita; 1860 to 1870, 91 cents; 1870 to 1880, it fell to 86 cents. Our home-grown wool has increased per capita: 1850 to 1860, 2.3 pounds; 1860 to 1870, 4.2 pounds; 1870 to 1880, 5 pounds.

OUR WOOLEN FACTORIES.

And behold this magnificent monument to American skill, energy, and labor! Workmen, look at this:

Year.	Woolen establishments.	Capital.	Wool consumed.	Wages paid.	Employés.	Value of product.
1860	1,263	$30,922,654	83,608,468	$10,153,938	43,738	$65,596,364

WE MANUFACTURE ALL OUR WOOL.

Are we ashamed of this grand record? Do we desire to transfer this wonderful element in our mighty progress to alien lands and alien hands? We consume all we produce. We have no export surplus for foreign markets. We manufacture all we produce, and in 1887 had an import demand for 114,000,000 pounds which found here a market from foreign shores, in addition to our own home production of 265,000,000 pounds, reduced by reason of great importations. When we add to the raw wool import the 133,899,788 pounds of imported wool in manufactured goods we have in round numbers 248,000,000 pounds of foreign wools imported here, and in view of the frauds in importations we can safely assume that to-day we manufacture and consume twice as much as we produce. And yet we are asked to abandon our home production and give the entire production up to foreigners! We already produce more wool than any other country on the globe, except one—Australasia. We have but this one yet to outstrip, and in the face of our marvelous advance thus far, who is to deny our ability to accomplish even this result?

SUGAR INDUSTRY.

This of all the protected industries of our nation has shown the least progress as the result of attempted stimulation. For the predominating sentiment of protectionists is to draw a line between those branches capable of developing a self-sustaining and independent growth and those not found so capable. We aim to foster and encourage the former, but where, after experience it is discovered that protection can be assured of no such results, the object is defeated, and the shield should be withdrawn. Protection is to be continued as to this but denied as to those great industries which have made astonishing advancement, and which take from rather than add to the cost on the necessaries of life.

To support and sustain this industry against foreign competition the people have paid each year of the last ten years an average of $45,000,000. And yet not to exceed one-twelfth of the sugar supply is produced here. Less, indeed, is now produced than in 1861'-62, and less the last year than that previous. In the mean while the foreign importations have increased. In 1880 they amounted to 1,869,173,808 pounds; in 1885 to 2,578,993,335, and the last year to 2,781,159,646 pounds. The duty collected in 1880 was $39,107,256; in 1885 it was $50,885,916, and last year it was $56,507,495. This article placed on the free-list, with alcohol used in the arts and for medicinal purposes, may not prove an injudicious reform. Every other protected industry has advanced and made marvelous progress. This has made none.

SUGAR A NECESSITY.

We are also reminded that this, of all articles, enters most closely into the necessaries of the American family. It is partaken in the tea and coffee and the humble meal of the poorest of the land. Formerly a luxury, it has become a necessity. We have admitted tea and coffee free; now let us advance one step more and admit their companion—sugar—free.

BEET SUGAR.

But I would still not suffer the American sugar-planter of the South to go to the wall, for one section of this Union is as dear to me as another. I should favor the system of a bounty, not only to the Southern planter of cane sugar, but to the Western planter of the sugar-beet. A new process has been discovered, and so perfect is the system of extraction of sugar from the beet that it is now found that 70,000 tons of beets will yield 10,000 tons of sugar.

In answer to questions submitted by me to Carl Spreckles during the sugar-trust investigation, that gentleman expressed the opinion that with proper encouragement we can in eight or ten years raise all the sugar that America would consume. California produced 600 tons in 1885 and 754 tons in 1886. A million tons could be produced in California and an equal quantity in Ohio and Oregon, and largely in Kansas. Many lands will yield $100 per acre in sugar-beets which now yield $10 in wheat, and will enrich, not impoverish the soil. Mr. Spreckles says:

You can raise enough sugar here to supply the world.

A BOUNTY ON SUGAR.

France and Germany offer bounties for beet-sugar production. In Germany the bounty system has quickened the beet-sugar industry and now it produces an excess over consumption and exports largely to other countries. The bounty is on the export raw, as well as refined beet sugars. The internal taxes received last year nearly equaled the bounty paid. Let us imitate these countries in their success, and infuse a new life among our farmers and thus stimulate them in the development of this new industry in our nation.

THE FARMERS WILL SUFFER.

Of all classes few will suffer like the American farmer. To-day there are about 9,000,000 people engaged in agriculture. As a class they outnumber all. They know that farming is profitable in proportion as consumers are greater than producers. Manufactures invite consumers. These build up the home market. Four million people in commerce and manufactures will consume, it is said, the surplus production of 6,000,000 farmers. This market is always sure, but a foreign market is often uncertain. We seek the nearest markets first. In every campaign it has been triumphantly charged that the Republican party, when in power, alone protected the manufacturer at the expense of the farmer. The facts, however, prove that this party has ever stood out as the consistent friend of the agricultural industries of the land. Nearly every production of the farm is now found upon the protected list, and I favor a higher protection so that American markets shall be more for American farmers.

The policy as well as the necessity for such legislation is at once apparent when we observe the immense importations of the foreign farmer, even with the payment of duty. This is for the three last months of 1886:

Imports.	Quantity.	Value.
Barley, with duty 10 cents ..... bushels...	6,621,793	$4,086,694
Corn, with duty 10 cents ..... do.....	15,096	7,650
Oats, with duty 10 cents ..... do.....	20,095	7,546
Wheat, with duty 20 cents ..... do.....	102,683	78,620
Butter, with duty 4 cents ..... pounds...	146,310	23,788
Cheese, with duty 4 cents ..... do.....	2,087,366	233,376
Beans and peas, with duty 10 cents ..... bushels...	256,888	254,952
Potatoes, with duty 15 cents ..... do.....	541,664	115,966

EXCLUSIVE CANADIAN FARM IMPORTS.

The cheaper farm labor of Canada is even now largely able to overcome our tariff duties, which the Canadians pay on many products and then compete with us. For instance, the following imports for 1880 and 1887 will show the quantity and also the increase:

Imports.	1887.		1880.
Cattle ..... head...	59,653	$1,086,645	.....	.....
Horses ..... do...	25,525	3,430,594	.....	.....
Sheep ..... do...	450,175	1,215,437	.....	.....
Barley ..... bushels...	10,351,855	6,170,660	7,126,436	.....
Eggs ..... dozens...	13,682,914	1,930,844	7,662,068	.....
Hay ..... tons...	78,255	789,129	.....	.....
Potatoes ..... bushels...	1,228,406	339,163	660,656	.....

In 1880 Canada sold into the United States nearly $14,000,000 in agricultural products, and in 1887 they had increased to $18,000,000. When the duty is removed let our farmers answer how much more these importations will cut the farmers' home market. Why should our nine million farmers suffer the cheap labor of Europe and Canada to enter this country with $2,500,000 worth of vegetables alone? Think of cabbages from Holland and potatoes from Scotland and Nova Scotia! Think of seventeen million dozens of eggs imported, and many come from Denmark, Norway, and Sweden into our markets! With all these articles on the free-list and no duty to pay, how formidable will be this competition to our farming interests.

But not content with this already formidable competition with our own farm products, it is proposed in the Mills bill to give the farmer a final blow. By reference to this measure we find on the free-list such products of the farm as flax, hemp, jute, beeswax, soap, vegetables, plums, prunes, currants, meats, game, poultry, milk, eggs, beans, peas, bulbs, feathers, grease, garden seeds, linseed, flaxseed, broom-corn, tallow. These are usually the products of the small farmer, as many a poor family is wholly maintained from the sale of their poultry, vegetables, and fruits. It may be asserted that these products have little competition from abroad and hence no harm can result from placing them on the free-list. Let us see. There were imported last year from foreign countries the following:

Articles.	Value.	Duty.
Eggs (now free)	$1,960,405.39	.....
Seeds	845,560.84	$172,437.63
Feathers for beds	204,961.55	.....
Fruits and nuts	15,088,073.82	210,098.64
Flax	1,908,845.00	154,508.63
Hemp, etc	9,971,276.00	1,778,831.39
Vegetables	2,276,204.47	547,509.99

With free trade for all these we can at once perceive how greatly these importations must increase.

Fruits, which our nation produces in such abundance, in such varieties, and of such incomparable quality are now protected by a tariff on the foreign import. They are to go on the free-list. Many vast orchards exist in this country and numerous canning and preserving establishments are located in every State of the Union and employ many thousands of people of all ages. Over $15,000,000 in fruits and nuts were imported last year from abroad, paying $4,210,098.64 as duties to share our rich market. But still the tariff was sufficient to stimulate our own fruit-growers, and this market developed an immense demand. Many poor families derive a livelihood in producing the smaller fruits, while millions of dollars are invested in more extensive dealings and properties.

My own State is about entering upon the fruit industry with renewed energy and hope. The Oregon apple is already world-renowned. Peach and prune orchards have been planted in all sections, the former chiefly in Southern Oregon, and already very remunerative returns have rewarded these energetic people for their toil and risk. No climate in the world is so well suited for this purpose, and the usual pests which annoy the fruit-growers of the East are comparatively unknown. The soil varies according to the location, but the fertile lowlands supply every requisite for the tree growth. The prune, of all the fruit varieties, seems to find in that climate the most congenial requisites and attains a perfection not surpassed in France or Germany. The American Horticultural Society says of the Oregon prune that it must be pronounced unqualifiedly the best that ever came to its notice. It will possibly not prove very glad tidings to these hopeful constituents of mine to learn that Americans are not wanted to produce fruits in this country.

Sir, my time will not permit me longer to dwell upon the various features of the measure before us. I can not bring my mind in aid of its approval. Those whom I have the honor to represent could justly assert that their best interests were sacrificed. Viewing it as a whole it is inequitable, partial, and sectional. It strikes at the farmers of the nation, taking from them many safeguards, and leaves them no compensating equivalent. It discriminates unjustly against the agriculturist of the North and West, while it continues protection to the planter of the South. It exposes and ruins the wool-grower, while it enriches what its friends have so incessantly termed the "robber manufacturer." It takes the means of livelihood from the wage-earner by encouraging British industries, while it strangely professes hope for the "poor man's blanket." While claiming high wages to the American laborer, it invites competition with the cheap labor of Europe. What it collects from the poor man's sugar it delivers to the rich importer.

The voices which plead to us through this measure are rather the entreaties of Birmingham and Leeds than of Chicago and Philadelphia. They should rather reach the people of the United States from the Parliament of England than through the American Congress. The principle is anti-Democratic and anti-Republican as well. Let us rather be admonished by the great statesman of our earlier decades as well as by the warning voices of the fathers of the Republic.

It was the immortal Washington who said:

> The safety and interest of the people require that they should promote such manufactures as tend to render them independent of others.

The clarion tongue of Henry Clay once uttered these words:

> The home market is first in order and paramount in importance.

The unyielding old patriot, Andrew Jackson, said:

> We should become a little more Americanized, and instead of feeding the paupers and laborers of Europe feed our own.

And it was our beloved Abraham Lincoln who said:

> I am in favor of the internal-improvement system and a high protective tariff.

No, sir, it is neither patriotic nor business like that our farms should be on one side of the ocean and our workshops on the other. It is not right that our raw material should be transported to Europe and then brought back again after leaving 90 per cent. to alien labor for manufacture. It is not right to say that any nation can be independent while it is a slave to a foreign market. It is not right that American industries, soon in their very zenith and splendor of perfection and growth, should now be destroyed by their own beneficiaries. Let us, sir, rather stand by that noble policy which has conferred on toiling man the highest wages on earth, which makes him comfortable and free, and decorates him with a dignity of citizenship with which the "golden fleece or Roman eagle" afford no parallel.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa, was recognized.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me to make a suggestion? Only five minutes remain until the time for taking a recess. He has the floor and will retain it. Will he now yield to a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Iowa. I should prefer doing that, resuming the floor in the morning.

Mr. BYNUM. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9051) had come to no resolution thereon.

CLEMENT A. LOUNSBERRY.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Private Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 2524) for the relief of Clement A. Lounsberry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Clement A. Lounsberry, late postmaster at Bismarck, Dak., the sum of $1,214.51, that being the amount expended by said Lounsberry in the payment of clerks necessarily employed in said office from April 1, 1881, to June 30, 1882, and for rent, fuel, light, and other expenses from July 1, 1883, to the 30th day of September, 1885, and which amount was disallowed in the settlement of his accounts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. What is the amount?

Mr. NELSON. A little over $1,200. The bill has been favorably reported.

Mr. BYNUM. Let the report be read.

The Clerk commenced to read the report (by Mr. SIMMONS).

Mr. NELSON (interrupting). I think I can make a brief explanation, which will take up less time than the reading of the report.

Mr. BYNUM. Very well; let the gentleman make an explanation.

Mr. NELSON. This claim is for clerk-hire paid out during what was called the boom period in Bismarck, Dak. The claimant was postmaster at Bismarck. A great amount of business was done during a short period, the boom period, and he was compelled to hire extra clerks. For what he paid out no compensation has ever been allowed him.

The bill has twice passed the Senate. It was favorably recommended by Mr. Frank Hatton, then Assistant Postmaster-General; and it has been favorably reported unanimously by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman mean the Committee on Claims of the last Congress?

Mr. NELSON. No, sir; I mean the Committee on Claims of this Congress. In the last Congress the bill came from the Senate too late to be considered at all.

Mr. BYNUM. The trouble about allowing this is that it is just such a claim as hundreds of others now arising on account of increased business.

Mr. NELSON. This was only a temporary matter.

Mr. SPRINGER. I suppose it is all right. I do not think the gentleman from Minnesota would ask anything that is not right.

Mr. BYNUM. I shall not oppose the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NELSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The hour of 5.30 p. m. having arrived the House, pursuant to order, is in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p.m., and was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN as Speaker pro tempore.

TARIFF.

Mr. MAISH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill the title of which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9051) to reduce taxation and simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenue.

[Mr. HOLMES withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. FELTON. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt to discuss this great economic question as a whole or as to the relative merits of the principle of protection versus free trade, it having been ably, and I may say exhaustively, discussed during the long period that has been consumed in its consideration, but will confine my remarks to one item of the free-list schedule in the bill now under consideration, which not only interests the people of the United States, but especially those of the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

Sir, I am opposed to the putting of quicksilver on the free-list, being of the opinion that such action will in nowise conduce to the benefit of the consumer or add to the nation's wealth, but, on the contrary, will enhance its value, cause the removal of the millions of dollars now annually received for this product from our coffers to those of other nations, and force those now engaged and employed in its production in this country to other avenues of industry, there to compete with those now engaged and laboring in them, as such action will effectually paralyze this home industry.

Mr. SPRINGER. May I ask the gentleman from California a question?

Mr. FELTON. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. Do I understand the gentlemen to say that if the tariff is taken off quicksilver, as proposed in the pending bill, the quicksilver mines of California will be closed? Will it not pay to work them if the duty is removed?

Mr. FELTON. In my opinion that would be the effect. If the gentleman will kindly favor me with his attention, I think he will concur with me.

Mr. Chairman, it is necessary to a correct understanding of and conclusion on this subject that we review the history of the production of this metal and ascertain the facts in connection therewith as well as the present situation; it should be instructing, it may not be uninteresting.

The sources of the production of quicksilver in all the past and at the present time are practically but four—Spain, Austria, Italy, and California, in the United States.

The great Almaden mine in Spain was discovered over four hundred years before Christ, For twenty-two centuries it has been in course of development, always paying a profit, though its production previous to the fifteenth century was comparatively small (it being principally used for the making of vermillion), when in 1557 its amalgamating qualities with the precious metals was discovered, thus creating a large and increasing demand. It is the most perfect metallic deposit ever discovered of cinnabar, or perhaps of any other metal; consisting of three parallel veins or fissures, about 100 feet equidistant, penetrating the earth almost perpendicularly, they varying in no place over 10 degrees, growing richer and wider in metal each foot penetrated until a little over 1,000 feet is reached, where the bottom is richer than at any point above. There are immense reserves of ore in its lodes above the lower level, which are thought to contain sufficient metal to supply the world's demand for the next half century; for the last twelve years the average percentage of metal per ton of ore was 9 per cent.; for the last two years 10.50 per cent.; wonderful and fabulous as it may seem. Its product since 1850 is about equal to the entire production of the eighteenth century.

The Idria mine, in South Austria, was discovered at the close of the fifteenth century. Next to the Almaden this is the richest mine, the bottom of the lode showing no diminution either in the quantity or quality of its ores; for sixty-three years ending in 1880, its average yearly profits were $164,000. Its reserves of ore are estimated to contain 900,000 flasks of 76½ pounds.

It will be here noted that these two mines are respectively owned and controlled by the Spanish and Austrian Governments, and worked for their account; their policy always having been wise and conservative in producing only sufficient to supply the demand at good prices, having large reserves and invariably holding its surplus products for a good market.

Of the Italian mines I have been unable to obtain any reliable history or facts of its production other than that their yearly product amounts to a sum of between two and five thousand flasks, an amount too insignificant to affect the commercial value of the metal.

Cinnabar was discovered in California during this century, and its development commenced in 1850, cotemporary with that of the discovery and working of its gold mines, from which time it has steadily been prosecuted with varying results as to amount produced and profits realized. In 1850 the ruling price was $114.50 per flask of 76½ pounds, or $1.50 per pound; it now is $37 per flask, or 48.32 cents per pound; though great fluctuations in price have occurred during the thirty-seven years of its production in California (the highest figure reached being $118.55, the lowest $25.25), yet, notwithstanding these fluctuations, its price has in the main been steadily declining.

I have prepared a table which I desire to have printed with my remarks, showing the yearly production and prices from 1850 to 1888, or thirty-seven years, in California. A careful examination of the table will show that the prices during all that time have ruled in accordance with the California production; as the product increased, prices declined; as it decreased, prices increased; when the production for a term of years was uniform, the price practically remained so, taking into consideration the surplus stock and occasional unexpected demand. I therefore assert that the California production for thirty-seven years has controlled the price of the world, the conservative and wise policy of the Austrian and Spanish Governments being a material factor in the result.

Amount, production of quicksilver in California, and prices from 1849 to 1888.

1887	33,800	48.00	36.00
Total	1,485,170	118.55	25.25

In 1878 California had some thirty producing mines; in 1887 she has but ten. The decrease was largely owing to the decline of prices and the uniform low prices prevailing, at which they could not be profitably worked.

A comparison of the factors entering into the cost of mining in Spanish Almaden and the California Almaden will illustrate how unequal is the struggle in the production, namely:

"The whole of the underground working in the Spanish mine, after twenty-two centuries of working, can be comprised in a rectangular block 700 feet long, 350 feet broad, and 1,027 feet deep," having produced since 1850 to 1868, 1,239,776 flasks of metal. The exploration and ventilation is accomplished by three shafts. In 1883–'84 the total amount of material taken from the mine was:

	Tons.
From ore-chambers	17,557
From barren ground	1,900
Total	19,457
Ore raised	17,557
Ore worked	17,101
Worthless	456

Number of tons of ore reduced, 18,465.57, yielding 45,765 flasks, or 9.485 per cent.

The California Almaden workings extend over a very large area, "comprised in a rectangular block 5,000 feet long by 6,000 feet wide, and 2,300 feet deep." They do not cover all the area here indicated, being very irregularly distributed within it. The workings are accomplished through six shafts.

In 1885 the total amount of material extracted was:

	Tons.
From ore-chambers	78,452.86
From prospect and barren ground	56,095.70
Total	134,548.56
Ore raised	78,452.86
Ore worked	33,524.68
Worthless	44,928.18

Number of tons reduced, 39,534.65; yielding 21,400 flasks, or 2.07 per cent.

The wages paid at the Spanish Almaden mine, so far as I have been enabled to obtain them, though incomplete, are reliable:

Miners, ore-chambers contract, average per day	$0.81
Miners, barren-rock contract, average per day	.57
Masons in quarries, contract, average per day	1.03
Lumbermen (day pay)	.55
Furnacemen (day pay)	.40

These departments probably command the highest wages, and if the assumption be correct we may conclude the average wages to be from 50 cents to 60 cents per day. The cost of production in 1882–'83 being $7.10 per flask.

The amount of wages paid in the California Almaden mine for relative positions is:

	Per day.
Laborers in labores	$2.00
Miners on yardage contract	2.80
Laborers on surface	2.00

Firemen	1.75
Timbermen, including captain	3.20
Carpenters	3.04
Blasters	2.75
Surface mining	1.50

While the above table is incomplete, it will serve to illustrate the difference paid in wages, the lowest being $1.50 per day; and the statistics of this mine show that for the year 1885 the average wages paid, including all employés, was $2.43 per day, and the cost of producing quicksilver per flask $26.38, $19.28 in excess of the cost of production in the Spanish Almaden mine. This large advance of cost in the production is owing to the large amount of waste material necessary to excavate, the difference in the richness of the ores worked, and the higher prices paid for labor, the latter averaging four times greater than that paid by the Spanish mine.

And now, sir, in order to be fair in my statement to the House, in justice to the intelligence and skill of the mine managers and employés of this mine, it is incumbent on me to state that the statistics of the expenses of the working of the two mines develop the following facts: That in 1885 eight times the amount of material was extracted from the American mine that was taken from the Spanish mine in 1883, its production, however, averaging only 20 pounds of quicksilver per ton for that year, while the Spanish mine's production was 200 pounds per ton; that the average number of tons handled for each worker in the Spanish mine was only 6 23 tons, while at the American mine there was extracted over 63 tons per worker, or ten times the amount extracted in equal time; that the cost of production, as before stated, of the Spanish mine was $\frac{17}{100}$ of that of the American mine. It costs no more to extract and reduce rich ore than poor, and were the American ores equal in richness to the Spanish the production of the American mines would be ten times as great, and cost $2\frac{64}{100}$, equal to $2.64. Add for flasking $1, and we have $3.64 as the cost of production, as against $7.10 in the Spanish Almaden—a striking illustration of the benefits to be derived from an intelligent and well-paid labor, a labor only created or maintained by fair and commensurate wages, and only to be found in the United States.

Of California's production from 1850 to 1888, the New Almaden mine produced 873,259 flasks; estimated value, $35,321,350; from other sources, 611,911 flasks; estimated value, $24,751,799. Total value, $60,073,149, directly received from this home industry. But would we have its true value to the nation we must add its indirect value to the consumers, which should at the lowest be estimated at a sum equal to the amount directly received for the product, making a grand total of $120,146,298. Its use being a necessity, if not produced at home it must be purchased from foreign production, and consequently foreign producers receive in this instance such a figure as they choose to name; as, notwithstanding our production for 1887 was 33,000 flasks, our importation in January last was 36,041 flasks, and in March 13,844 flasks.

The United States is one of the largest of the few large consumers of this metal, if not the largest, owing to our great and increasing mining industries, which have no equal in extent or wealth, and consequently we are correspondingly interested in the price of the mineral consumed by them, amounting to millions of dollars annually. It may be said that upon its price will depend the continuance of many of the producing mines and the development of many others.

Now, sir, in view of the facts herein set forth, taking into consideration the position now occupied in this industry by the Spanish and Austrian Governments; the remarkable and unparalleled extent and richness of their mines, in which centuries of production has made no perceptible change or diminution in their ore bodies, with continuing and increasing percentages of value; their great reserves of explored ore; the large amount of surplus stock of metal (that of the Spanish mine being 64,000 flasks); the continuing and compact ore bodies rendering the exploration and extraction of its rock proportionately cheap; their present cheap labor and certainty of its continuance, and that, but for California's production, they would be practically the only owners and producers of this metal—in short, monopolizing its production and consequently its market price; that taking into consideration the facts connected with California's production, the poverty of its ores at the present time (their value being only from one-fifth to one-tenth the value of the Spanish ores); their want of concentration in continuous and compact ore bodies; the large area requiring exploration and development, thus causing additional cost for excavating and working of the ore; the handling of large quantities of refuse rock, occasioned by the diversity of the distribution of metal in the large areas of the lode; that American labor in this industry receives four times the amount paid to the foreign, for which reasons it costs about 3½ times more to produce it in America than in Europe—now add to the present cost of production, namely, $26.38 per flask, the amount of the present tariff, 10 cents per pound, or $7.65 per flask, and you have $34.03; take the present market price, $37, and you have a profit of $2.97 over cost and tariff.

Remove the present protective tariff of $7.65 per flask from the present market price and you have $29.35, at which the foreign importer could sell without losing his present profit, which is $22.25 per flask less freight and charges, and yet would only leave the home producer a margin of $2.97 per flask, an amount too insignificant to pay for wear and tear and the depreciation of plant, wholly ignoring interest on plant and capital invested.

No one could be induced to invest under this actual state of affairs; but those now engaged in it are forced to continue the struggle, hoping for favorable developments of ores in the future and an increased protection from the Government. But remove the present tariff and those left must suspend operations. As heretofore shown many of our mines have already been compelled to shut down at these and higher prices.

Now, sir, I submit to the very able chairman and the intelligent members of the Ways and Means Committee who now preside over the material interests and destinies of this nation, under this statement of facts, which are reliable, will they continue to keep this mineral on their free-list schedule, cause the consumer to pay at least twice the present price, and drive from this industry into others five thousand laborers earning unequaled wages? For this will be the inevitable result of such determination. Sir, in my opinion it would be wisdom to increase the tariff to 15 cents per pound, to insure the continuance of this industry to compete with a monopoly of nations in an article that has no equivalent; hence our consumers must have it at some price, or abandon enterprises requiring its use. Such a course would violate no principle of protection or free trade, as this industry is an exceptional one, subject to no principle rule or argument, except that of nature's first law, self-preservation.

Sir, could the committee visit the Spanish Almaden mine and behold the misery and often want of its laborers, observe their vices, and absolute ignorance, the accumulation of centuries of ill-paid labor and overpopulation, and then turn to the American Almaden mine, whose model village sits enthroned upon a mountain whose sides are dotted with plantations of the olive and the vine; gaze upon the spires of its churches, public schools, and libraries rising from among its vine-clad and flower-enframed cottages beneath the fraternal shades of its evergreen oaks; observe the manly bearing of its stalwart laborers, the intelligent countenances of its inhabitants beaming with smiles of content and happiness, all reflecting credit on its superior and humane management and intelligent laborers, a living monument of individual liberty and high priced labor, they would pause ere they made of this beautiful scene a deserted village of ruined homes.

Mr. THOMAS, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury we learn that it will require $326,530,000 to meet the obligations of the Government during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1888, and ending June 30, 1889. The estimated income of the Government from sources other than taxation for the same period is $35,000,000. Taking this amount from the sum $326,530,000, estimated to meet the probable obligations of the Government, and there will remain $291,530,000 to be provided for either by a loan or taxation in some form. No party in this country proposes to borrow the money to meet the deficit. The only legitimate resource is a resort to taxation and this has already been provided for by law. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that during the next fiscal year there will flow into the Treasury from—

Customs	$228,000,000
Internal-revenue sources	120,000,000
Making the sum	348,000,000

This would be $56,470,000 more than the estimated needs of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1889. The Secretary of the Treasury in his last report also stated that the receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, were $371,403,277.66, that the expenditures for the same period were $315,835,428.12, which left a surplus of receipts over expenditures of $55,567,849.54. He also stated that the receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1888, actual and estimated, are $383,000,000, and the expenditures for the same period $316,817,785.48, leaving a surplus of $66,182,214.52. From this it will appear that the aggregate surplus for the three years amounts to $178,219,270.80. This would be an average of $59,406,423 per year. In the reduction of the revenue Congress is limited to the result thus disclosed. We may and doubtless will differ in respect to the methods of reduction, but all will agree that the revenue the Government is now receiving should be reduced.

It is both unwise and unjust to the people to collect more revenue than is demanded to defray the proper purposes of the Government. All experience shows that an increasing and accruing surplus in a State or Federal Treasury invites a profligacy in the expenditure of money, and in the end brings in financial disaster and ruin. It seems therefore plain that there must be such a change in our tax laws as will bring about a reduction of the revenue to the basis of the probable annual expenditure of the Government. If the reduction of the surplus was the only result to be attained the problem could be solved without difficulty.

To cut off, indiscriminately, sufficient revenue would bring about the desired result. But the chief end to be attained is not the reduction of the revenue. The serious conflict of opinion, and the main point in the controversy, is the method by which that reduction is to be brought about. We are confronted with a multitude of probable results as soon as we come to consider the question of reduction. We should be governed with great care in our movements, for the result of ill-advised and inconsiderate action would do more harm to the public interest than a great surplus in the Treasury.

This is the only nation in the world disturbed with a surplus revenue; other nations are worried in devising measures to enlarge their revenue; their statesmen become skilled in the methods invented for the imposition of more taxes, and the amount of their debts and taxes has increased with the years of their progress. Taking the decade from 1870 to 1880, taxation increased in Great Britain, France, Russia, Sweden and Norway, Germany, and all other governments, great and small, of Europe 28 per cent., England being the lowest at 20 per cent. and Germany highest at 57 per cent.

For more than a hundred years we have looked to Great Britain for examples of legislative wisdom, but in ascertaining ways and means for the reduction of the surplus revenue of this country we must examine our own case and treat it in the best light we can. We stand as a noted exception in this respect in the line of nations. Debts in other countries are increasing, while in this country the opposite condition exists. In 1866 our public debt was $2,678,123,103.87. On January 1, 1888, it was, less cash in the Treasury, $1,225,598,401.99, being a reduction of $1,452,527,701 in the short period of twenty-two years. The average increase of percentage of taxation in European countries from 1870 to 1880, as before stated, was 28 per cent. What was it in the United States for the same period? There was no increase, but, on the contrary, there was a decrease of 9.15 per cent.

Our national debt is fast disappearing; the rate of taxation is being diminished; the revenues are greatly in excess of our expenditures. Our financial condition is most satisfactory, exceptional when compared with that of the nations of the world. We have a large annual surplus, and the all important question before the country is what are we going to do with it?

How shall the reduction be brought about? Shall the proposed reduction be taken from internal revenue, or shall it be taken from customs revenues, or shall it be taken from both; and if the reduction is to be taken from both, then in what proportion from each? These are questions of great importance to the people of this country, and upon these questions the Republican and Democratic parties divide.

The revenues of the Government are derived from two sources, that is internal taxation and a tax on imports. From this it will be seen that we have a double system of taxation—the one direct, the other indirect. It has not been the settled policy of the Government to permanently maintain both systems. The founders of the Republic had a choice of the two methods, and they determined to raise the revenue which was necessary for the support of the Government by imposing a duty on imports from foreign countries. While that method has undergone modifications, it has never been wholly abandoned at any time, and I think I can safely say that it has been the approved method of raising revenue to provide for the ordinary expenses of the Government. While direct taxation has been resorted to upon two occasions before 1862, to meet great national emergencies, it has always been abandoned as soon as the necessity passed away.

In 1791 direct taxation was resorted to in order to replenish an empty Treasury of the new Government, and in 1813, in our second conflict with Great Britain, we again resorted to direct taxation to raise the necessary means to carry on that war. The act of 1791 was repealed nine years after its passage; and the act of 1813 was repealed in the year 1817, during the administration of President Monroe. From the organization of the present National Government, in 1789, to 1862, a period of seventy-three years, not more than $22,000,000 of all our revenues were derived from direct taxation.

In 1862, to meet the extraordinary demands of a great civil war, we again resorted to internal taxation, and we have continued that system to this time, and the result has been that we have a large surplus in the Treasury.

The Republican party believes that in imposing duties upon imports that these duties should be so levied as to give encouragement to American enterprise, the employment of American labor, and the investment of American capital; and that party insists that the duties on imports should be levied not with a view to raising "revenue only," but also with a view to encourage American industries and the employment and protection of American labor.

The Democratic party, under the lead of President Cleveland, denounce the system as "vicious and illogical," and assert it to be not only unwise but unconstitutional. It must be remembered that that party of late years has been the peculiar guardian of the Constitution. That party insists that duties on imports should be levied "for revenue only," in the language of their last national platform; that the end to be attained is revenue and the accidental protection is a mere incident. If we should follow the advice of the President and secure a reduction of the revenue in the manner he proposes—that is, by a revision of the tariff without touching our internal revenues—we would, in effect, be putting in operation the doctrines of free trade, and such a course would lead to the destruction of our protective system. Here, then, is a question of policy which we must settle before we undertake to consider the bill reported by the committee. We will approve or condemn the bill as we are in favor of the doctrine of protection or in favor of a doctrine which favors and encourages free trade.

As before stated, it has been the uniform policy of the Government under the Federal, Whig, and Democratic parties to rely solely upon revenues collected from duties on imports to meet the expenses of the Government, and when a resort to direct taxation was necessary it was abandoned as soon as the emergency had passed. The Republican party has been criticised in this debate for continuing the established policy of the Government in the reduction of the revenue; that is, first reducing the direct taxes before interfering with the tariff. Under this policy the Republican party in eleven years reduced taxation more than $362,000,000, while the Democratic party since 1866 has been in control of the House of Representatives for eleven years only reduced taxation a fraction over $6,000,000.

By putting tea and coffee on the free list and other modifications of the tariff we reduced taxation $78,000,000, and by removing internal taxes we reduced the revenue $284,000,000. These were war taxes which had been imposed to raise money to carry on the war; and if they had been retained the protective system must have been destroyed, because we were raising more money than we needed and had to make a reduction from the internal revenue or reduce the duties on imports. The Republican party will never consent to the substitution of direct taxation for that policy which yields revenue sufficient to carry on the Government and at the same time encourages American industries and protects American labor. In the reduction of $6,000,000 made by the Democrats while they had a majority in the House of Representatives they lost sight of the poor man's clothing and the necessaries of life, and relieved that portion of our people who were suffering under the load of taxed whisky, snuff, and tobacco.

When the first Congress under our national Constitution assembled we had an enormous debt, no credit, and no money in the Treasury. To provide sufficient money to meet the national obligations was the first duty. Under the new Government Congress had the power of taxation and the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations. How should this power be exercised? Should the duties be so imposed as to develop American industry, or should they be imposed to raise "revenue only?" They devised a plan not only for raising revenue, but they laid the foundation of that great American system which achieved our industrial independence and resulted in making this the richest and the most powerful Government in the world. To the act imposing duties was a preamble in this significant language:

> Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and for the encouragement and protection of manufacture that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported: Therefore, etc.

From which it will be seen that the fathers of the Republic in the very beginning took the bold ground that duties were to be levied not only for revenue but to encourage and protect American industries. The Government, under the Articles of Confederation, was not able to protect our manufacturing interest or to advance our commerce. It was the commercial interest of the country as much as anything else which secured the adoption of the present Constitution. One of the leading statesmen of that period said that—

> To be independent for the comforts of life we must fabricate for ourselves. We must now place our manufactures by the side of the agriculturist. The grand inquiry now is, shall we make our own comforts or go without them at the will of a foreign nation? He, therefore, who is now against domestic manufactures must be for reducing us either to dependence upon that nation or to be clothed in skins and live like beasts in dens and caverns.

This is the language of Thomas Jefferson, the great apostle of Democracy. He enunciated an idea which has stood the test of time, and that is, "We must place our manufactures by the side of the agriculturist." He also said that—

> Experience has taught me that manufacturers are now as necessary to our independence as to our comfort.

President Washington said to Congress in his annual message:

> Congress have repeatedly and not without success directed their attention to the encouragement of manufactories. The object is of too much consequence not to insure a continuance of their effort in every way which shall appear eligible.

The policy of protection has been confirmed by a hundred years of national experience and it has been approved by the foremost men and statesmen of this great country. From the 4th day of July, 1789, when the first tariff act was approved by President Washington, to this time, we have tried the system of a protective tariff and a tariff for revenue only. What has been the history of the country during that period as to prosperity? Did the country flourish more during the time a tariff "for revenue only" was in existence, or did we have the greatest amount of prosperity during the existence of a protective tariff?

An appeal to history will show that the eras of free trade or a revenue tariff have been times of depression and disaster, and that during the periods of protection this country has witnessed the greatest amount of prosperity. The British Government during our colonial history prevented the establishment of manufacturing industries in this country, and by an act of Parliament a manufacturing establishment was declared a public nuisance and abated in South Carolina, and this same State of South Carolina in 1833 tried to destroy the Union because the Government had established a policy of protection. It was the policy of the British Government that we should not be permitted to establish manufactures in this country. We were to be confined to agriculture, and our markets for our products was to be in England. We must buy all manufactured articles in England. There must be no home market for our products. We were at the mercy of England. Then we had free trade, but upon such terms as England thought proper to concede to us. Do the people of this country wish to be placed in that condition again? Free trade will bring it about. The act of July 4, 1789, gave to this nation industrial independence and destroyed the dominating voice of British statesmen in the affairs of this country. In 1824 a measure was enacted which gave sufficient protection to guaranty capital and labor from foreign ruinous competition. The tariff before that date, while a great protection to home manufactures, was not deemed sufficient, and the result was that our manufacturing industries were of uncertain growth. The embargo of the war of 1812 stimulated the industries of the country, but as soon as peace was declared in 1814 a flood of foreign importations brought disaster to our manufactures.

England was determined not to lose her American market, and foreign goods were placed upon our market at a loss to the manufacturer in order to destroy our industries. Her statesmen declared that it was well worth while to incur loss upon the first exportation in order by the glut to stifle in the cradle these infant manufactures in the United States which the war had forced into existence contrary to the natural order of things. If the tariff is reduced to a revenue basis England will again attempt her old policy of exporting at a loss in order by the glut to stifle in the cradle our infant industries.

The tariff of 1824 and 1828 enthused new life into our industries, which had been languishing by reason of British competition, and the country witnessed a period of marvelous prosperity. A writer of that day said:

> So soon as the tariff of 1824 went into operation the whole aspect and course of affairs changed. Capital was invested, labor came into demand, wages advanced, mines were opened, furnaces built, mills started, shops multiplied, business revived in all its departments, revenue flowed copiously into the coffers of the Government; the debts created by two expensive wars were entirely paid off. Such a scene of general prosperity had never before been seen by our people.

Unfortunately for the country the compromise tariff of 1833 was passed, and this act provided for a gradual reduction of duties until they should reach an average of not to exceed 20 per cent. The effect of this change of policy was that our manufactures one after another went down under excessive foreign importations. To save itself capital invested in industrial enterprises was withdrawn. American labor stood idle. Then came the panic of 1837, which created more wide-spread desolation than any event of the kind in the history of the country. In 1840 the people of this country demanded a change, and in the election of General Harrison in that year by the Whigs a change was brought about. The tariff act of 1842 was passed, and the protection system again resorted to. The result was that in a short time our industries, which had been destroyed under the operation of the tariff of 1833, were revived, and instead of disaster we had wide-spread prosperity.

In 1844 the Democrats defeated Henry Clay by the cry of "Polk and Dallas and the tariff of 1842." At least that was the issue in Pennsylvania, and that State was carried for Polk on that issue, and he was elected. The result was the tariffs of 1846 and 1857, and men now living know the disastrous consequences which resulted to the country from the passage of these revenue-tariff acts. The Government, in times of profound peace, was forced to borrow money at ruinous discounts of from 12 to 30 per cent. as the Treasury was empty. This brings us to a new era of protection in the year 1861. In March, 1861, the Republican party assumed control of the affairs of the country, and then commenced the most important movements in the history of this nation. The party which then took control of the Government has demonstrated that it had the capacity and the courage to control a great country during the period of a great civil war.

A lack of either courage or capacity in the Republican party would have brought disaster and ruin upon the country. But that party did not fail, but took up its great work, the preservation of the Union, and it succeeded in its purpose as no other party in this country or any other country ever did. It required supreme courage and boundless wisdom in Congress and executive capacity of a high order to meet the startling and extraordinary circumstances which confronted the country at the time. We had no money and we were without credit. We had to have both, and both were essential to success. Credit had to be created and money had to be created, and both were created in such a volume that the continuing demands of one of the greatest wars that ever afflicted a nation did not exhaust them.

In taking upon itself the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of the Republic the Republican party clearly demonstrated that it possessed the essential qualities to govern the country in time of great peril, and no partisan criticism can deprive that party of the honor of carrying the country successfully through the great conflict. As before stated, in 1860 we had no credit at home and none abroad. How is it to-day? People seek our securities for investment, and they command a premium here and in Europe. We were then borrowing money to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government and paying an exorbitant rate of interest. We now authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to anticipate our obligations with money taken from an overflowing Treasury.

In 1860 our manufactured products amounted to less than $2,000,000,000 annually. Now they amount to about $7,000,000,000 annually. In 1860 this country was the third in rank of the manufacturing nations of the world. Now we are in the front rank. How about our farmers? If they could be present at the debate in this House they would conclude that they were the worst oppressed people in the world; that their farms were depreciating annually; that their annual harvest was of less value each year. We find that our farm values in 1860 were about $3,000,000,000. In 1880 they were more than $10,000,000,000, and producing an annual harvest value of more than $3,000,000,000.

England in 1860 boasted of a national wealth of $30,000,000,000. At that time our aggregate accumulations were only $16,000,000,000. But what have we done under these years of protection since 1860, under the most adverse circumstances of a great civil war? In 1880 we were the proud possessors of more than $60,000,000,000 of accumulated wealth. In 1860 England boasted of her great wealth and claimed that it was the result of her free-trade policy. How is it now? We have passed her in the great industrial race. She is now behind, with only $42,000,000,000 of accumulated wealth.

After saying this much it seems to me that it can be said that the protective system, after a century of national experience, has been confirmed as the true policy of this country, and a policy of taxation sanctioned by the fathers of the Republic and confirmed by experience ought not to be abandoned and destroyed.

The majority of the Committee on Ways and Means propose to assail and demolish our protective system. A reduction of $78,000,000 annually is proposed, what is, $24,000,000 from internal taxation and $54,000,000 from duties on imports.

It is proposed to transfer from the dutiable to the free list a large number of articles, such as wool, lumber, salt, flax, and other products of the factory and the farm, upon which $22,000,000 revenue was derived last year, and the balance of $32,000,000 is sought to be obtained by placing the duties at a lower rate. This reduction is upon the theory that if you lower the duty you will reduce the revenue. This is a false theory, for by lowering the duty the importations are increased and the revenue will not be diminished.

We are collecting annually $120,000,000 from internal taxation. It is proposed by the bill under consideration to take only $24,000,000 from that source. The President, in his message opposed the reduction of the internal-revenue taxes. It would seem that he is anxious to assail and impair our protective system. He was anxious to relieve the Treasury of its plethoric condition, but insisted that the result should be reached through the methods of free trade.

But what do the majority of the committee propose in their revision of the tariff? We find that the great wool-growing interest of the country is to be exposed to a ruinous foreign competition. Foreign competition will be the destruction of that great interest. Wool-growing is a matter of prime necessity to a civilized people. In this country that great interest is only in the infancy of its development. If the wool-growing interest is properly protected and encouraged we could produce the material for the clothing of all our people. The majority of the Committee on Ways and Means in their report on this bill advance the idea that free wool means cheap wool, and that cheap wool means cheaper clothing, and that the farmers will obtain cheaper woolen goods and they can afford to submit to the destruction of sheep husbandry.

It may be and no doubt will be true that wool would be cheaper while our foreign rivals are destroying this domestic industry. But when they have destroyed the industry and driven our flocks to the slaughter-pen and taken from our market an annual production of 300,000,000 pounds of domestic wool what will be our condition? Will we not be at the mercy of the foreign producer, manufacturers and consumers both alike? Will there be any restraint upon the cupidity of the man who furnishes foreign wool in our markets?

The farmers are not manufacturers. They produce raw material. In the true commercial sense everything grown by the farmer on his farm is raw material. I speak of the productions of the farmer in the commercial sense. We hear a great deal said about the oppression of the farmer by the existing tariff. What relief is proposed by the President or by the revenue bill under consideration to the farmer? His prejudice is appealed to. The President says that if the manufacturers get raw material free of duty they can stand a reduction of import duties, and still they would maintain their profits. From this it would seem that the President does not want to interfere with the profits of the manufacturers. His object is to reduce the revenue.

It is plain this can not be done without casting the burden on some other industry and injuring the persons engaged therein. Where does he place the burden? He places it on the producers of raw material. Every article produced on the farm is raw material. Labor represents a large percentage of the gross cost in raw material. The policy proposed by the President is hostile to agriculture and labor, for he proposes to unload the burdens from the manufacturing industries and place them on the farmer and on the labor of the country. I do not think I am mistaken in respect of the doctrines promulgated by the President in his message; I do not mean to misconstrue the language used by him.

I think the President is an honest and conscientious man. I am glad that he has brought his party square up to the issue of a tariff for "revenue only." He has been aided in arriving at this conclusion no doubt by one of the most accurate and able writers in favor of free trade in this country. I mean Mr. Henry Watterson, of Kentucky, a thoroughly honest man, and dangerous because he is honest. In order that the farmer may purchase woolen goods at cheaper prices he must consent to a repeal of the duty on wool. This will preserve the profit to the manufacturer, and then he can reduce the price of the goods. Who is to pay the cost of this transaction? The farmer by selling his wool at a lower price pays the cost. The repeal of the duty on wool puts the farmers of this country in competition with the products of foreign countries, and the result is the depression in price and the suppression of that industry.

The production of wool under protection rose from 60,000,000 pounds in 1860 to 308,000,000 in 1884, the year after the change in duty. In 1886 it was 285,000,000 pounds, and according to the estimates of the Agricultural Bureau, 265,000,000 pounds in 1887. The reduction of the tariff duty (act of 1883) caused it to fall off 43,000,000 pounds. Importation of foreign wool has increased from 63,016,769 pounds in 1882 to 114,404,174 pounds in 1887. Here we find an increase of 50,387,405 pounds of imported wool. In 1860 the farmers of the United States owned 22,471,275 sheep. In 1870 this number had increased to 28,477,951. In 1880 the number was increased to 35,192,074.

By our last national census it is shown that our farmers produced in the year represented therein 1,754,861,535 bushels of corn, 459,479,505 bushels of wheat, 407,858,999 bushels of oats, 44,113,495 bushels of barley, 19,113,495 bushels of rye, 35,205,712 tons of hay, 11,817,327 bushels of buckwheat, 110,131,373 pounds of rice, 26,546,378 pounds of hops, 169,458,539 bushels of potatoes, and 5,737,257 bales of cotton. These are all raw material in the proper commercial sense, and labor constitutes the greater percentage of the cost of production. All of these articles can be produced in this country in quantities beyond the home demand. But still we imported them in 1887 to the extent of about $15,000,000. The reason for this importation is the fact that articles are not sufficiently protected against foreign producers. In 1887 we imported of other products of our farms (excluding sugar, molasses, and tobacco in the unmanufactured condition) over $50,000,000, making an aggregate of about $65,000,000.

The farmers in the Western States produce about 12,000,000 bushels of flax-seed. This result has been brought about by reason of the tariff duty on flax-seed. The farmers receive a fair price for the product by reason of protection against cheaply raised seed of foreign countries. A large number of oil-mills have been erected in proximity with the production of the raw material, and the result has been that the price of flax-seed oil, which ranged from about 80 cents to $1 per gallon before these mills were established, now ranges from about 36 cents to 55 cents per gallon. It was the duty on the seed which induced these results. If the duty placed on many articles manufactured in whole or in part from the flax fiber was increased, it would induce the establishment of plants for the manufacture of articles from flax fiber; but as it is the foreign manufacturers of such articles control the American market to a great extent.

The President in his message seems to believe that a duty imposed upon an imported article by the amount of the duty paid enhances the cost of such article to the consumer, and he says that it is a direct tax upon him to the amount of such duty, and he claims that by reducing the duty the article would be lessened to the purchaser to the extent of the duty paid, and he affirms that the duty imposed upon an article imported into this country not only raises the price of the foreign article, but advances at the same time in equal degree the price of the domestic product. In order that I may not do the President injustice I quote from his message as follows:

> But our present tariff laws, the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation ought to be at once revised and amended. These laws, as their primary and plain effect, raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties. Thus the amount of the duty measures the tax paid by those who purchase for use these imported articles. Many of these things, however, are raised or manufactured in our own country, and the duties now levied upon foreign goods and products are called protection to these home manufactures, because they render it possible for those of our people who are manufacturers to make these taxed articles and sell them for a price equal to that demanded for the imported goods that have paid customs duty. So it happens that while comparatively few use the imported articles, millions of our people, who never use and never saw any of the foreign products, purchase and use things of the same kind made in this country, and pay therefor nearly or quite the same enhanced price which the duty adds to the imported articles. Those who buy imports pay the duty charged thereon into the public Treasury, but the great majority of our citizens, who buy domestic articles of the same class, pay a sum at least approximately equal to this duty to the home manufacturer. This reference to the operation of our tariff laws is not made by way of instruction, but in order that we may be constantly reminded of the manner in which they impose a burden upon those who consume domestic products as well as those who consume imported articles, and thus create a tax upon all our people.

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means asserts the same theory, and in his speech on the bill under consideration he assumes that a duty is a tax paid by the consumer.

Let us look for a moment, as an illustration, at the steel-rail industry of the United States. In 1865 the first Bessemer steel rail was made in this country. There was a duty of 45 per cent. on the foreign product at that time. This continued until January 1, 1871, when the act of Congress which imposed a specific duty of $28 a ton went into effect. Steel rails in 1867 were selling in our market for $166 a ton in currency, or $138 in gold. The price had fallen to $106.75 in 1870 when the duty was imposed. Now, if the President is correct in his theory, the imposition of the duty of $28 per ton would have had the effect of advancing the price from $106.75 a ton to $134.75 a ton.

But what has been the result? In 1867 our steel-rail mills produced 2,277 tons. In 1887 they produced 2,101,904 tons. How about the price? A ton, in 1867, was sold in our market at $166; a ton, in March, 1888, sells for $31.50. What becomes of the President's theory that the duty enhances the cost of the article and becomes a tax to the consumer? But in this connection we must not lose sight of the fact that millions of capital have been invested in this industry by reason of the encouragement extended by the act of 1870, and that thousands of laborers have been employed in this great industry.

But to further illustrate the unsoundness of the President's theory we have only to refer to the manufacture of soda-ash in the United States. Before 1884 there was none manufactured in this country, and we imported every pound at a cost of about $48 per ton. We consume about 175,000 tons in the manufacture of glass and other products. A duty of $5 per ton was imposed. A company was organized and commenced manufacturing in January, 1884, with a capacity of 50,000 tons annually. Was the duty of $5 per ton added to the $48, thereby advancing the cost to $53 a ton? That is the President's theory. The $5 per ton was not added to the costs, but on the contrary the price fell in the American market in three years as low as $28 per ton, and thus the people paid annually $20 a ton on the entire consumption of 175,000 tons, or $3,500,000.

But why multiply instances? The instances are as numerous as our industries. Every product of a protected American industry has been cheapened by reason of protection. The price of a commodity does not depend upon the rate of duty, but upon a law universal in its application, and that is the great law of supply and demand. If the demand for an article is great and the supply is limited the price will be high, but if the demand is limited and the supply abundant the price will be low. While it may be true that the immediate effect of a tariff will be an increase in price, the ultimate effect will be the contrary. Alexander Hamilton, a man who impressed his ideas upon the age in which he lived, and the greatest intellect of his time, said a hundred years ago:

> But though it were true that the immediate and certain effect of a tariff was an increase of price, it is universally proved that the contrary is the ultimate effect with every successful manufacture. When a domestic manufacture has attained to perfection, and has engaged in the prosecution of it a competitive number of persons, it can be afforded and accordingly seldom or never fails to be sold cheaper, in process of time, than the foreign article for which it is a substitute. The internal competition which takes place soon does away with everything like monopoly and reduces the price of the article to the minimum of a reasonable profit on the capital employed. This accords with the reason of the thing and with experience.

It has been suggested that the protective system is crippling our commerce. In 1860 our exports were only $336,576,057, our imports $356,616,119, being balance of trade against us of $20,040,062. In 1880 our exports were $835,638,658, our imports $667,954,746, which leaves a balance in our favor of $167,683,912. In 1860 our total commerce was only $687,000,000, while in 1880 it reached the enormous sum of $1,500,000,000. From 1848 to 1860, during the low tariff, there was but one year in which the balance of trade was in our favor, and during these thirteen years the net balance against us was $396,216,161, and this sum was drawn out of the country in gold to pay for goods manufactured in foreign countries. In the last thirteen years there has been but one year in which the balance of trade was against us, while we have the immense sum of $1,612,659,755 in our favor, and this has been achieved under the operation of a "vicious tariff."

We have heard a great deal said in this debate about cheap clothing and cheap food for the poor man. No articles are of more universal use (and they are always placed in the list of necessaries) than sugar and molasses. They are found in the home of the poor man, and are consumed by all of the people. Why not place these articles on the free-list? The yearly collections from sugar and molasses are $58,000,000. The repeal of the duty would reduce the price to consumers to the extent of the revenue derived from it. The demand for consumption in this country so far exceeds the amount we produce that the element of competition between our producers and foreign producers is wholly excluded from the case.

When this is the case the amount of duty paid becomes a part of the costs, for the duty paid follows the article into the possession of the consumer. During the year 1886–'87 we imported 2,377,289,920 pounds of sugar and 36,477,626 gallons of molasses. The domestic production was of sugar, 299,533,920 pounds; of molasses, 21,508,732 gallons. From this it will be seen that the element of domestic production is quite insignificant. The effect of the protective policy is almost unappreciable in respect of the development of the home manufacturer.

We wish to reduce our annual collections from revenue about $60,000,000. It will be seen that we collect $58,000,000 per year from sugar and molasses. This vast sum of $58,000,000 is added to the cost of these articles to the consumers. This results from the fact that the domestic production falls so far below the demand for home consumption that competition disappears from the case.

The average lowest price for sugar for sixty-one years, running from 1825 to 1886, appears to have been 7½ cents per pound, and the average highest price for the same period was 10½ cents per pound. For the year 1886 the highest price was 5½ cents per pound and the lowest 4⅜ per pound. It seems from this to be true that, while the consumers of sugar have been paying the duty, the article has been lowered in price. This has been the result of the increased production and the changes in the general conditions of the industry. But the statement is true that the consumers of sugar in this country pay the duty levied on it because, as before stated, the home consumption is much greater than the domestic production. We could put an end to our financial troubles by wiping out the $58,000,000 of annual collections from sugar and molasses. A reduction of $60,000,000 is demanded. Take off the $58,000,000 would leave the insignificant sum of $2,000,000, which would not require a great effort to dispose of.

But I do not wish to destroy the sugar industry of this country. Let us provide for paying a reasonable bounty for the production of sugar in the United States by adopting the plan that has worked so well in European countries. The consumption of sugar in the United States in 1876 was 37.1 pounds for each person in our population. This rate had increased in 1885 to 51.4 pounds, and is still increasing. In 1864 we produced 56 per cent. of all the sugar consumed in the United States.

As disclosed by the statistics of 1884, in twenty years our production supplied only 9¾ per cent. of the total consumption. In 1872 the total production of sugar from the beet in Europe was 873,000 tons. In 1884 this was increased to 2,305,000 tons. A few years ago Germany did not produce sugar in quantity equal to the demand for home consumption. She now manufactures over 1,000,000 tons, and of this she exports 600,000 tons. This is the work of the bounty system. The agricultural industries of the European countries adopting this system have been greatly promoted.

But there is another way by which we can get rid of the surplus without injuring our two industrial conditions. For the last fiscal year there was collected from spirits the sum of $65,829,321.71; from fermented liquors, $21,922,187.49, making a total collection under the internal-revenue law of $87,751,509.20 on the several kinds of liquors and the traffic therein. The total revenue collected for the same period from customs duties, internal revenue, and from all other sources, was $371,403,277.66, from which it will appear that nearly one-fourth of our gross revenue was derived from the internal tax on intoxicating liquors.

Do those who manufacture and deal in intoxicating liquors object to this tax? They do not. They are in favor of the preservation of the tax. The removal of a tax is always hailed with joy and satisfaction. Why should the whisky interests be different from all others in this respect? Do they wish to fix permanently in our revenue system the business of making and selling intoxicating liquors? Shall we make it a necessary presence in our revenue system by giving to it the enduring support of law? One-fourth of the gross revenue of the Kingdom of Great Britain is derived from intoxicating liquors, and in that country it is regarded as a fixed and permanent part of their system of taxation. The habit of use in that country has grown and the volume of consumption increased. All other interests in the kingdom are opposed to any reduction of the taxes on intoxicating liquors.

This determination on the part of the Government of that country to continue that tax has brought about habits of wastefulness which have prevented the acquisition of homes and comforts by the people. I see it stated that intoxicating liquors cost our people $900,000,000 per year. Is this vast expenditure accompanied by any counteracting good? If it were possible any good could be said of it, a multitude of evils would be offset against it. It subordinates every other interest to the promotion of its own ends. It has no politics and it has no religion, except such as it can control to its own purpose. It does nothing to promote the happiness of the people and has nothing in common with any of those elements that are essential to their prosperity. It is the enemy of the best type of humanity. It insists on being let alone and never interferes in elections, and cares not as to political results if its interest is protected. But it is the active enemy of all persons and parties who propose to put restraints on its sale.

It unsettles the moral convictions of the persons engaged in the business, and the demoralization growing out of it often obstructs the administration of justice. In some localities it elects the judges and controls the courts. The whisky interest is a power in this Republic. It never looks to see what good is moving in the political field, but its malign purpose seems to be to see to its own interest alone. But I am asked, why take the tax off this business, which is so injurious to the best interest of the country? I will tell you why. I have learned that numbers will make any cause, however odious in the beginning, respectable. In 1860 Abraham Lincoln, a native son of Kentucky, and the greatest man produced in the tide of time, received 1,300 votes in that State for President. It was then odious to be a Republican in the State. In 1887 the Republicans cast 127,000 votes for Colonel Bradley, the gallant leader of the party.

It is now respectable to be a Republican anywhere in Kentucky. It is the same with any business. Let a large amount of money be invested in any business, that business will become respectable in the eyes of many well-meaning people. Was there ever a more odious system in this or any other country than African slavery? Yet the vast amount of money invested in that wicked institution not only made it respectable but was the cause of one of the most unjustifiable wars that ever afflicted a brave people. Look at the desolated homes in the country, the loss of half a million of men, a public debt of immense proportions—all incurred by reason of an institution in this country which was condemned by the civilized world.

Whisky can be produced at 15 to 20 cents per gallon. A large capital can not be invested in whisky at 15 to 20 cents per gallon. The Government puts on a tax of 90 cents per gallon—about six times the original cost. To pay this tax and take the whisky out of bond requires an immense capital. Now, the business becomes respectable by reason of the capital that must be raised to carry it on. The whisky can be bought at 15 to 20 cents per gallon, but the tax of 90 cents a gallon must be paid and the product put upon the market.

If the whisky tax is repealed the monopoly in the production would be destroyed. The whisky trust is the strongest political power in this country. The rich distillers of the States form the combination. It controls more men in political life than any other interest represented in State or Federal legislation. There is no organization in this country which can raise as large a fund for political use. It controls every liquor store and drinking saloon in the United States, and holds the solid vote of the drunkards and liquor-sellers, a million in number, under its control. They say, "In getting rid of the surplus don't you touch the whisky tax. You may tear down the tariff and destroy American industry if you want to. The tax of 90 cents on the gallon is necessary to our monopoly. If that is abolished our business will be ruined by unchecked competition which we can not control, either as to the quantity to be produced or the price at which it may be sold in the market. We now control the price and the quantity to be produced. The supreme power in this country—that is the United States Government—is our partner in the business. This partner puts our whisky in a warehouse, takes care of it, keeps a small army of men to shoot the poor devils in the mountains of Kentucky and other States who attempt to distill a few gallons, gives us three years to pay the tax till it commands a good price, and then if the market is depressed we are allowed to export our product to escape payment of the tax. Yes, the arrangement between us and the Government suits us as it is now arranged. If you want to be re-elected don't you disturb our partnership. Oh, yes, smash the tariff if you want to; destroy the industries of the country; turn thousands of laboring men out of employment; bring on a financial disaster such as has not been seen in this country since that fatal year, 1837, but don't touch our business." Many a man in this country will take off his hat and then and there swear fealty to the whisky ring. I appeal to the laboring men of this country (and those who know my early history know that I have cause to be their friend, for I have felt the stings of poverty) will you permit the shops and factories in which you now earn your wages to be closed by a reduction of the tariff, and suffer yourselves to be turned idle into the streets that the whisky ring may maintain its enormous monopoly?

Let us make a start towards the ultimate elimination of the liquor tax from our system of taxation. We must not permit the tax upon the manufacture and traffic in intoxicating liquors to become permanent in our system of revenues. We must take our revenue from sources that will promote our industries and maintain the wages of the people who work for a living. If there must be more protection in order to effect this result, then I say let it be extended. If we wish to promote the general welfare let us encourage right and desirable industries and scatter manufacturing plants all over the country and bring the producer and consumer in close proximity.

I know some of my friends will not agree with me in the ideas I here express. I appeal to them to read and carefully study what I have said and I think they will come to the conclusion that it would be a great mistake to intrench this worker of evil in the revenue system of our country so as to enable it to successfully retard and resist the active efforts of the Christian men and women for its ultimate extinction. I am not willing by my vote to give aid and assistance to the most malign foe of organized society. You may ask, what do you propose to do. I propose to remit to the States this whisky question, and if there is to be a revenue to be derived from it let it go to the people of the counties or States. I do not think prohibition is possible in the large cities.

Public sentiment is law. Where prohibition can be enforced let the people adopt it. Where it can not be enforced I would adopt high license. I take humanity as I find it and not as I want it, and I would legislate accordingly. I do not agree with the Prohibitionist, for I think they are trying to accomplish the impossible in this day and generation. Let us build churches and school-houses and educate the people and create a healthy public sentiment, and in that way we may be able to control the appetites of men, as we certainly can not control their appetites by legislation. The Prohibitionist in 1884 did their cause great harm and lost the sympathy of thousands of temperance people when they deliberately organized their party with a view to defeat the greatest and the grandest man this country ever produced, the man who was the great leader of the only party which has ever done anything for the temperance cause in this country.

Before I close I wish to inquire, Why do we find this large surplus in the Treasury? Who is to blame? Have the President and those in authority under him done their duty? I find that an act was passed March 3, 1881, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase United States bonds with the surplus in the Treasury. The second section of said act is as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury may, at any time, apply the surplus money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds: Provided, That the bonds so purchased or redeemed shall constitute no part of the sinking fund, but shall be canceled.

That act has stood upon the statute-books until now, and subsequent administrations without question redeemed and bought up $182,241,750 of the bonds of the United States.

The President's own Secretary of the Treasury under the same law has purchased not only the 4½ per cent. bonds due in 1891, but has also purchased the 4 percents due in 1907, paying for the former 108 cents on the dollar, and for the latter 127 cents on the dollar, and expending in the purchase of $18,088,000 of such bonds $21,665,500 of the surplus under this authority, which the President said in his message was "subject to the suspicion that it was intended as temporary and limited in its application."

The President refused to proceed under the act of March 3, 1881, because he said that it was "subject to suspicion." Has the law been repealed? Has any court decided against the law? Where does he get the power to set aside a law at will? Where does he get the authority to nullify an act of Congress? If the President had caused this law to be enforced from the time he went into office, March 4, 1885, would there be any large surplus in the Treasury at this time?

There is another question to be considered in this connection, and that is the granting of pensions to the soldiers of the late civil war. If the President had signed the bill passed by Congress upon this subject the surplus would have been greatly reduced in carrying out the provisions of that law. I hope to see that bill passed again. In paying the bondholder, which is all right, let us pay another debt with more merit in it—that is, the debt which we owe to the brave men who went to the front in time of great peril, and by their heroic efforts made it possible for this Government to pay the bondholder his money. I want to see the day when every honorably-discharged soldier of the late civil war who is now in need is granted a sufficient pension to provide for him and his family.

I shall vote for such a law, and also for a law giving to the widows of soldiers a pension. Pay the soldier, the widow, and the orphan what they are justly entitled to out of this vast surplus in the Treasury, and by so doing you will place upon the statute-books of the country an act which will teach the coming nations that this is the greatest, grandest, and the most just and liberal nation to its brave defenders that has ever existed in the tide of time.

[Mr. MAISH withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

[Mr. SPOONER withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

[Mr. ROMEIS withholds his remarks for revision. See APPENDIX.]

Mr. SAWYER. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to take any part in the discussion of the general principles of the tariff bill now under consideration. Gentlemen on both sides of the House, distinguished for their experience in public life and for their familiarity with all aspects of this question, have already spoken, and I do not profess to have either the ability or experience which would enable me to add anything to what has already been said.

My only excuse for saying anything is the fact that I have the honor to represent a district which has one of the largest salt industries in the United States, and I am led to believe that this industry will be seriously injured by the proposed legislation.

I desire to speak in behalf of these interests, and in so doing I shall not discuss the question as a party issue, because several gentlemen upon the other side of this House represent districts whose interests on this question are the same as those of the district I represent.

The three great salt interests in the United States, naming them in the order of their development, are the Onondaga reservation, in New York, the Michigan, and the Warsaw district, comprising portions of the counties of Wyoming, Livingston, and Genesee, New York.

The Onondaga reservation has been worked a little over ninety years. Its production has increased from 5,095 barrels in 1797 to 1,220,351 barrels in 1886, the largest yield being in the year 1882, when it was 1,810,775 barrels. The estimated product for the year 1887, as I learn from a speech made in the New York Legislature the present session, was 1,177,145 barrels. The production at this point for the past few years has been slowly diminishing. Salt at these works is made almost entirely by solar evaporation.

The development of the salt interest in Michigan practically began about the year 1860, since which time the production has rapidly increased, especially since 1869, when provision was made by law for its inspection.

Its production has increased from 4,000 barrels in 1860 to 3,667,257 barrels in 1886.

The production for the year 1886 was graded as follows:

	Barrels.
Fine salt	3,548,731
Packers'	22,221
Solar	31,177
Second quality	71,235
Common coarse	3,893

"Common coarse" simply means a salt of imperfect grain but standard purity, and making this a separate brand leaves "fine salt" more uniform and of a higher grade.

The yield in this district for the year 1887 was 4,200,000 barrels, as I understand.

In this district the salt is almost exclusively evaporated by artificial heat, the fuel being very largely the refuse of these lumber mills, slabs and saw-dust. Down to 1882 the two competing points in the manufacture of salt were the Onondaga reservation and the Michigan districts.

The Warsaw Salt Company, I believe the oldest company in the Warsaw district, sunk the first well in the spring of 1882, and began the manufacture of salt November 22, 1882. The production of salt in this district has increased from 120,000 barrels in 1883 to 1,213,212 barrels in 1886, and the yield for 1887 is estimated at 1,660,000 barrels. In this district there are now twenty different companies having in operation sixty-five wells, besides one company largely engaged in mining salt.

The capital invested by these companies in this industry in this one district is $3,000,000, and employment is furnished to over two thousand persons in the different processes of manufacture and the work connected therewith, besides the large additional numbers directly supported by their labor, making, at a low estimate, three thousand persons directly supported from this single industry in this one district. The development of this industry has greatly increased the growth and business of the country surrounding these salt establishments.

Salt in this district is evaporated by artificial heat, the fuel being principally coal and coal-dust.

For the finer grades after evaporation it is refined by kiln-drying, grinding, and sifting, and if from too much heat or any other cause the salt is off color, and not because of the impurity of the salt itself, it is sold for agricultural purposes.

As to the cost of fuel and labor in this district, one company during the months of December, January, and February last past made 165,033 bushels of salt, at a cost for fuel of $5,000.93, or a little over 3 cents per bushel or $1.25 per net ton; and during the same time the same company paid for labor the sum of $440.03, equal to 2.66 cents per bushel or $1.06 per net ton. So that the total cost of the manufacture of the salt during this period for fuel and labor was 5.26 cents per bushel or $2.29 per net ton.

If to this are added a reasonable interest on investment and a reasonable amount for depreciation of machinery and utensils, some idea may be formed of the cost of salt production.

The average price at which salt has been sold in this district has been 6 cents per bushel, or $2.25 per net ton, delivered on board the cars, packages not included.

In this district there is one company, the Retsoff Mining Company, that mines its salt, raising it through a shaft from a depth of about 1,000 feet. This salt is largely used in large lumps for salting cattle on the plains and elsewhere, or crushed into small pea-sized fragments for salting hides, manufacture of acids, and other purposes.

The entire salt product of the United States for the year 1886 was 7,707,081 barrels, being three-fourths of the entire consumption, of which 6,108,820 barrels were manufactured in Michigan and New York, and 1,598,261 barrels were produced in the other States and Territories, as follows:

	Barrels.
Ohio	400,000
West Virginia	250,000
Louisiana	229,091
California	214,285
Utah	164,285
Nevada	50,000
The other States and Territories	240,000

PRICE.

Previous to the development of the salt industry in Michigan the cost of salt along the Great Lakes was about $2.35 per barrel, or 47 cents per bushel. In 1868, after the Michigan works had been in operation about six years, the price had fallen to $1.80 per barrel. In 1883, when the Warsaw works had fairly begun operations, it had fallen to 81 cents per barrel. In 1886 it had fallen to 60 cents per barrel, and in 1887 it was freely offered at 55 cents per barrel.

The above prices mean salt delivered on board the cars at the works and include the barrel, and estimating them at 25 cents each, would leave cost of salt on board the cars at the works 30 cents per barrel, or 5 cents per bushel.

The coarser grades of salt used for agricultural purposes and for salt-ing stock can be bought in the Warsaw district by the car-load, delivered on the cars, at prices varying from $1.75 to $2 per short ton, or about 4 cents per bushel.

Dairy or factory-filled salt brings at the works in Michigan and New York from $5 to $6 per short ton, in sacks holding about 200 pounds each, the sacks costing about 4 cents each; the cost of such salt being about 15 cents per bushel.

The margin of profits upon salt manufactured and sold in the Warsaw district for the past two years has been so small that no dividends have been made. The business has been conducted without profit, and in most instances at a loss, although this may be due in part to expensive improvements made to improve the quality of the salt made. Some of the companies have suspended.

A firm in the city of New York, largely engaged in the importation of salt and holding a monopoly in the celebrated Ashton salt, has sent to members of the House a circular for the purpose of increasing the sale of foreign salt at the expense of our own domestic manufacturers.

In it they say that the "cost of mining and crushing salt at Piffard," the Retsoff Mining Company, "is from 50 cents to $1 per ton."

I have the letter of an official of that company stating that this statement is untrue, but that the cost of mining this salt and putting it on the cars is fully $2 per ton.

The same firm says that this company are receiving very large profits upon their salt sold.

To show the contrary to be true I have a copy of returns made by this same firm upon a consignment of over 13 gross tons of salt shipped by this same company in April, 1887, which shows that the net receipt of this shipment, exclusive of commissions, was $8.70, being about 66 cents per ton of 2,240 pounds. Certainly this is a clear illustration of the correctness of their statement.

It is claimed that the quality of American salt is inferior to the best foreign salt.

Whatever truth there may have been in that statement in the past, it is certain that it is not true now.

The most noted producer of creamery butter is the Elgin Butter Company of Illinois, and they use American dairy salt exclusively.

Mr. W. H. Hintze, the president of that company, in a letter to the Genesee Salt Company of the Warsaw district, says:

> After making the most thorough tests we have substituted the Genesee salt for the Ashton heretofore used in all our creameries, and have used nearly two cars of it. We believe the salt to be fully equal to Ashton in purity and perfection of grain, and greatly superior to it in strength. The salt has a great sale. All our customers are using it, and their experiments fully confirm our own and give the Genesee a greater make-weight power than is possessed by any other salt.

At the meeting of the National Butter and Cheese Association held in Chicago in 1886 the majority of the prizes for butter and cheese were taken by users of American salt, and at a meeting of the same association held at Manchester, Iowa, in November, 1887, fifteen premiums were awarded on butter, of which thirteen were taken by butter salted with American salt.

The principal packing-houses in Cincinnati, St. Louis, and Kansas City rely almost exclusively on American salt. One salt company in my district during the six months ending December 31, 1887, shipped to the packers in one Western city over 2,000 tons of salt. Dr. Englehardt, formerly New York State chemist, states as the result of his analysis of Ashton salt, the best foreign salt, that he found pure salt 97.75 per cent., and on an analysis of three samples of different American salt the lowest per cent. of pure salt was 98.48 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, I have principally spoken of the salt industry as it exists in my own district. But taking into consideration the entire salt industries of the United States, from the best information I can gather, more than $10,000,000 capital is invested in this business and over seven thousand persons engaged in the several branches of its manufacture and more than nine thousand persons directly interested in and supported by its manufacture.

The statistics furnished by Dr. Switzler on this subject to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] and used by him in his speech on this subject were taken from the census of 1880, before this discovery of the large saline deposits in the Warsaw district, and do not include the increase of over 1,000,000 barrels in the Michigan district alone. They are therefore clearly and necessarily defective, as showing the present condition of this industry.

Foreign salt pays duty as follows: Imported in bags, sacks, barrels, orother packages 12 cents per 100 pounds, packages included; imported in bulk, 8 cents per 100 pounds.

The amount of salt imported in 1887, as appears by Dr. Switzler's report, and not including salt imported and used in curing fish, upon which the duty is remitted, is as follows: Imported in packages 327,379,530 pounds, valued at $999,504.78; duties paid $392,855.44; ad valorem rate of duty 39.30 per cent. Imported in bulk 355,012,544 pounds; value $356,442.18; duties $284,010.06; ad valorem rate of duty 79.68 per cent., making total amount imported 682,392,074 pounds, or 2,433,114 barrels; total value $1,355,946.96. Total amount of duty received was $676,865.50, and the average ad valorem rate of duty was 49.92 per cent.

From this official statement it appears how greatly mistaken the distinguished gentleman of Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] was when he stated in his speech made in this debate:

> Salt is also made free. The salt manufacturers of this country are protected by a duty on imported foreign salt equal to about 100 per cent. This has had the effect of building up a number or wealthy and powerful companies.
> Salt is a raw material in cheese-making, butter-making, and in meat-packing—three interests that exceed the salt-making interests tenfold—but our tariff policy forbids our dairymen and meat-packers from buying cheap imported salt, and compels them to buy from the protected home manufacturers in New York, Michigan, and Ohio, at a price which is nearly doubled by the tariff duty.

His statement that the tariff compels the purchase of salt from home manufacturers at a price nearly doubled by the tariff duty, or, in other words, salt could be bought at the rate of 3 cents per bushel were it not for the duty, is too absurd to need refutation in view of the facts above stated. Our strongest competition is with salt shipped from Liverpool, England.

Of the salt imported into this country for the year 1887 a little over 34 per cent. was imported from Liverpool. The importations of salt from this point, as stated in the circular, dated January 4, 1888, of Mr. Falk, one of the heaviest exporters of salt to this country, has been gradually lessening since 1880:

1880, tons of 2,240 pounds	261,687
1884, tons of 2,240 pounds	233,170
1887, tons of 2,240 pounds	169,136

From the same authority it appears that the price of salt at Liverpool, free on board ship, has been gradually falling.

Common salt:
1874, per ton of 2,240 pounds	$4.00
1880, per ton of 2,240 pounds	2.25
1887, per ton of 2,240 pounds	1.87½
Fine salt, including packages:
1874, per ton of 2,240 pounds	10.50
1880, per ton of 2,240 pounds	6.50
1887, per ton of 2,240 pounds	6.12½

FREIGHTS.

The same circular states that at that date, January 4, 1888—

Ocean freights have risen from 40 to 70 per cent. since autumn.

PRESENT FREIGHTS TO AMERICA.

	Per ton.
Southern ports	$1.25 to $1.75
Baltimore	1.00
Newport News	1.12½
Boston	1.00 to 1.25
New York	1.87½

From this it appears that the cost of Liverpool common salt delivered at the city of New York is as follows:

Delivered on board ship, per gross ton	$1.87½
Freight	1.87½
Total	3.75
Add duty	1.79
Total	5.54

So that with no duty the English exporter could as well afford to sell their salt in our markets at $3.75 per ton as they can now to sell at $5.54.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the cause of this constant decrease on the quantity and price of salt imported into this country?

Mr. Falk, in his circular above quoted, in speaking of the present English condition of the salt trade, says:

> The salt trade is at the most deadly crisis. Salt is being offered at 50 per cent. below cost. The external cause which mars the trade's progress is protection. To all nations we offer at fabulously low rates cheaper and better salt than any they can make.
>
> But governments, even those of civilized Europe, still force the interests of our small manufacturing class between us and their peoples. The great mass of consumers will doubtless correct this misgovernment at no remote date; and even now the President of the great Republic of the West has sounded the first note of freedom. President Cleveland has now suggested in very clear terms that all necessaries be freed from imposts.
> It is scarcely credible that his voice will not avail with the people and with Congress against the small clique of plutocrats which owns the United States salt works.

Now, what is the cause of the great decrease in the price of salt? Can it be owing to the great liberality of the foreign exporters of salt? Certainly not, for they complain of the fact that they are obliged to sell their salt at 50 per cent. below cost. Nothing but necessity forces them to this. But this decrease in amount imported and this great reduction of price is because of the discovery of the immense salt deposits in our own country, the energy and enterprise of our own people in the wonderful development of our salt industries, and the consequent increase of production and the competition necessarily arising therefrom, that there has been this gradual but rapid reduction in the price, so that now a bushel of salt at the works costs less than an equal bulk of sand, and during this time our own people engaged in this industry have been protected by a small tariff duty against foreign competition, and the consumers have been able to purchase the article at a constantly diminishing price.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER], in his speech discussing that question, says:

> I have said, sir, I would illustrate by one single article which the Committee on Ways and Means have ventured to put at last on the free-list. It is the article of salt, so essential, as I have said, in all the departments of industry, on the farm and in the curing of everything. On that article you have permitted a tax to be levied from the time salt first became an object of taxation to secure a revenue. Now it bears a duty of 12 per cent. on salt imported in bags and packages, and 8 per cent. on salt bought in bulk, except that you took the precaution to exempt from taxation the fish-curer on the coast of New England, which is the home of the protective-tariff system. To him you give a rebate of duty on this great necessity which should have been as free as the air or the water.

Is not sugar an essential article in every man's family, be he rich or poor? and has the gentleman forgotten that the people of this country paid for the year 1887 as duties on this article alone over $56,500,000, and an average ad valorem rate of duty of over 82.04 per cent., and this for the protection of a class producing only about one eleventh part of the entire quantity consumed?

Has the gentleman forgotten that the people of this country last year paid as duties on rice—another essential article in every man's family—imported into this country over $970,000, at an average ad valorem rate of duty of 64.01 per cent., and this to protect a class producing a little over one-half the rice consumed; and if the gentleman believes, as do many on his side of the House, that the amount of duties paid is so much added to the cost of the article bought and paid for by the consumer, does he not believe that the people of this country for the past year paid for these two articles a price increased by over $57,000,000 for the benefit of the producers of these two articles?

His rather sneering allusions to the fish-curers of New England are hardly consistent with his willingness that the people of this country should pay to the producers in his own section of these two articles of sugar and rice, even under the proposed reduced rates, an amount exceeding fifty times the amount claimed to be paid in consequence of the tariff on salt.

The gentleman speaks of the duty on salt as being a tax upon salt paid by the consumer to the producer, and quoting another he says:

You do not dare to say you want it as a tribute. You will put it on a tariff act, but it will come to be seen that it is a tribute.

Is he willing that the producers of sugar and rice should demand that the consumers of these articles should pay to them a tribute of over $30,000,000 even under their proposed reduction of rates?

I do not object to protection to the producers of sugar and rice, on the contrary I favor it. I would encourage the development of these industries, for I believe that under a wise system of legislation we may produce in our country all the sugar and rice our people need for their own use.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], in his speech, speaking of protecting labor, uses the following remarkable language:

The only way to protect labor in this country, or wage-workers, would be to reverse the system; that is to say, to let the cheap commodities that go into the consumption of life, manufactured by the pauper labor, so called, of other countries, come here and supply at cheap prices the laborer of this country. Thus laborers here would get the benefit of labor and capital abroad, and, on the other hand, to prohibit by law or by a tax all immigration or importation of any character of laborers from other countries to our shores to break down the labor market. This wage-workers in these protective industries are demanding at the hands of Congress in so far as to prohibit the importation of contract labor, but we know how easily this law may be evaded and secretly set at naught. Besides, immigration is free; people go and come as they choose, and this law is of no practical benefit.

These remarks are based upon the idea, which is undoubtedly correct, that foreign labor is cheaper than American labor, and also that "cheap commodities" should come in free of duty. Now, supposing that these "cheap commodities," sugar, salt, blankets, clothing, and "other cheap commodities that go into the consumption of life, manufactured by the pauper labor," should "come here free of duty and supply at cheap prices," in whole or in part, the markets of our own country, would it not seriously affect and reduce the wages of our own laborers engaged in the production of these cheap imported commodities?

Again, the gentleman would prevent by law or tax all immigration or importation of any character of laborers from other countries to our own shores for the reason that it would break down our own labor market.

Now, if it would be unwise, in order to protect our own laborers, to allow these foreign laborors to come here and pursue their particular avocations when the money they might spend for their own support would be spent among our own people, would it not be equally unwise to permit the productions of this foreign "pauper labor," so called, to be brought here free of duty and be sold in competition with the same class of articles produced here by our own laborers to their prejudice. I must confess that I am unable to understand why a manufacturer of salt in my own district should be prohibited from going into the salt district of England and there engaging by contract men working there at their low wages to come here and work at the same industry, and at the same time permit the salt manufactured by these same men at home to be brought here free of duty and sold, to the prejudice of our own manufacturers and laborers.

The gentleman from Kentucky, in speaking of the law passed in 1864, under the peculiar situation of the industries of our own country during the last years of the civil war, regulating the importation of foreign laborers by contract, says:

A Democratic House of Representatives repealed this entire act in 1885

But he forgot to say that the vote of a Republican Senate in favor of the repeal and the approval of a Republican President were just as essential factors in the repeal as the vote of a Democratic House of Representatives.

He also says, that—

A Democratic President approved an amendment to the act repealing it, which made the repealing act more effective, but forgot to say that a Democratic President could not approve an act which had not been previously approved by a Republican Senate.

But now it appears that a Democratic President favors receiving into our own country, free of duty, articles produced by these "foreigners and aliens" whom he is unwilling should come here under contract to labor and spend their earnings, and at the same time permit the importation of articles made by the same class to come here in competition with the same articles produced by our own laborers.

If our own laborers should be protected against the importation of foreign contract laborers, which I concede, it seems to me equally clear that our own laborers should be protected against the importation, free of duty, of the products of the same laborers at home.

Mr. Chairman, I think I have clearly shown that the production of salt in our own country has so largely increased that we now produce three-fourths of all the salt now consumed in the United States. That the quality is now, in fact, and is rapidly becoming known to be, equal to the best imported salt of the same grade. That the price has now fallen so low that it is sold by the barrel, free on board the cars at the works, at the low price of 55 cents per barrel, barrel included. That the competition of our own manufacturers has been so great as to force the English exporters to put their salt, they themselves being the witnesses, upon the market at 50 per cent. below cost.

Besides, it is well known that the price of labor in foreign countries exporting salt is much less than that paid our own laborers in the same employment; that the cost of iron, steel, and copper used in the construction of the machinery and appliances used in the manufacture of salt is much cheaper in foreign countries than here; that coal is cheaper in England than it is here.

It is also well known that gentlemen largely interested in this industry have been here urging that the duty on salt be retained and protesting against its being placed upon the free-list, claiming that this would be ruinous to their industry. These are gentlemen of high personal character and of different political faith, and while they may be interested, it seems to me clear that their reasons are so conclusive that their views should be adopted and their wishes regarded.

And now, sir, in conclusion, I would appeal to this House in view of the facts established, not to sacrifice by its action one of the most promising of American industries.

But a very small part of the vast area of our country underlaid with saline deposit has as yet been developed. This area is so vast that it contains more square miles of territory than is contained in the whole of England, our most formidable competitor.

This industry in our country is yet in its infancy. The energy, industry, and skill of our people will, by the continued development of these vast deposits, reduce the price of salt to its lowest possible sum—a price so low as to render competition from abroad impossible; and while by wise legislation we seek to foster and encourage the production at home of sugar and rice, two of the necessaries of life among our common people, let us be careful not to cripple or destroy one of the most useful of all our industries by placing the same on the free-list.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, Article II of the Constitution of the United States, defining the powers and duties of the President, reads as follows:

SEC. 3. He shall from time to time give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

George Washington, the liberator of the country, when he became President adopted a plan of communicating to each session of Congress a message either oral or written, in which he treated of all the questions that were expected to be considered by Congress; that is, of all which he deemed important. This custom has been continued—all the Presidents of the United States have followed it—and at every recurring session of Congress each has laid before that body a paper in which the President has discussed every grave and important question affecting both the internal and external relations of the country. Every President, I said, Mr. Chairman, has done this until the convening of the Fiftieth Congress, on the first Monday in last December, then President Cleveland departed from the rule laid down by the Constitution, carried out by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Jackson, and all the other distinguished men who have preceded him as the Chief Executive of this nation.

There are many subjects of grave importance that the Congress of the United States, now in session, should consider; questions of both foreign policy and internal rule, but the President of the United States did not seem to be aware of this fact. Grave complications were threatened with England and Canada because of the fishery question. Other questions of foreign policy in regard to the American continent, and the interference of European countries were also pending. The differences between labor and capital, threatening the very foundation-stones of our Government, the attempts of monopolists to control many of the articles necessary to the life and health of the people. All these and many other subjects demanded the attention of the people; but they surely were not known to the President of the United States, because he has failed to do what the Constitution required of him—speak of them to Congress.

Instead of doing this he has transmitted a message upon but one subject, and I regret to say, Mr. Chairman, in sending that message the President of the United States has not confined himself to such a strict statement of the facts as would be expected from one holding his high position. President Cleveland has declared that the only business which he considers important for Congress is to retain the internal-revenue laws and reduce the tariff. The leaders of his party, acting upon his recommendation, have so organized this House that nothing else can be attended to. The Speaker appointed a Committee on Ways and Means, and a steering committee, to control the business, and these intend to force the adoption of the President's recommendations; that is, the retention of the internal-revenue tax and the reduction of the customs dues. Here is what the President says, which constrains me, as a representative of the people, to rise and enter my protest:

> Our scheme of taxation, by means of which this needless surplus is taken from the people and put into the public Treasury, consists of a tariff or duty levied upon importations from abroad and internal-revenue taxes levied upon the consumption of tobacco and spirituous and malt liquors. It must be conceded that none of the things subjected to internal-revenue taxation are, strictly speaking, necessaries. There appears to be no just complaint of this taxation by the consumers of these articles, and there seems to be nothing so well able to bear the burden without hardship to any portion of the people.
> But our present tariff laws, the vicious, inequitable, and illogical source of unnecessary taxation, ought to be at once revised and amended. These laws, as their primary and plain effect, raise the price to consumers of all articles imported and subject to duty by precisely the sum paid for such duties. Thus the amount of the duty measures the tax paid by those who purchase for use these imported articles. Many of these things, however, are raised or manufactured in our own country, and the duties now levied upon foreign goods and products are called protection to these home manufactures, because they render it possible for those of our people who are manufacturers to make these taxed articles and sell them for a price equal to that demanded for the imported goods that have paid customs duty. So it happens that while comparatively a few use the imported articles, millions of our people, who never use and never saw any of the foreign products, purchase and use things of the same kind made in this country, and pay therefor nearly or quite the same enhanced price which the duty adds to the imported article.
> The farmer and the agriculturist who manufacture nothing, but who pay the increased price which the tariff imposes upon every agricultural implement, upon all he wears, and upon all he uses and owns, except the increase of his flocks and herds and such things as his husbandry produces from the soil, is invited to aid in maintaining the present situation; and he is told that a high duty on imported wool is necessary for the benefit of those who have sheep to shear, in order that the price of their wool may be increased.
